Another example of how these extra-canonical writings enrich our knowledge of Primitive Christianity is furnished by a quotation from the Apology of Aristides, which thus concludes: "Truly great and wonderful is Christian teaching for him who will consider and understand it; and truly this people is a new people, and there is a Divine element in it; and truly blessed is the race of the Christians above all men upon earth. Therefore, let their traducers leave off alleging against the Christians that which is not true, and rather worship with them the true God, in order to escape the terrible judgment which, through Jesus the Messiah, shall come upon the whole race of men" (p. 408).

This latter part of Pfeiderer's study is of great value in two respects. It broadens the reader's outlook upon the growth of religious life in the early Church, filling in the picture furnished by the New Testament records, both on the social side, and on that of inward religious experience; and it shows very clearly how various were the lines of doctrinal speculation active in the Christian community throughout the period, grappling with inevitable problems of thought, in the endeavour to establish the universal bearings of the faith, and to meet the criticism of opponents. The concluding section on the Theology of the Apologists is of particular interest in this respect, as showing how fluid was the doctrine of the Eternal Son and of the Spirit at that time. What we see is the endeavour, by means of current forms of thought, to give adequate expression to the religious experience which had come to the world through the quickening power of the personality of Jesus, and to the deep sense of a Divine and spiritual presence in their own midst, which came to the members of the Christian community, as they set themselves to live out that same true life. The various tentative forms of doctrine crystallised in time into the accepted formula of the Trinity, but the religious life, which had furnished the motive power for such speculation, could not permanently be content with that partial expression of the truth of the Divine Immanence in man. The service which philosophy rendered to religion in those early days has again to be repeated in our modern world, with its wider horizon and ampler field of knowledge, and its hunger for as deep experience of the things of God. Among the servants of truth, who have laboured in this field Pfeleiderer must always be remembered with honour. The study of Primitive Christianity is still a living movement, and points of view, as regards chronology and other matters of criticism, may have shifted somewhat even since the completion of his work; but he remains a stimulating teacher, even for those who may not find themselves in full agreement with his conclusions, and we are glad that in such an ample work as this his influence is brought permanently within the reach of English readers.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will shortly publish a complete edition of the works of the late Walter Bagehot, to which will be attached a volume entitled "Home Life and Letters of Walter Bagehot," written by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Russell Barrington.

MR. JONATHAN NIELD has translated a second volume by Professor Boutroux, entitled "The Beyond that is Within," which has just been published by Messrs. Duckworth & Co. The book consists of three addresses on religious and philosophical subjects, and has a special preface outlining the central problem of present-day thought by the author. The translations have been made under Professor Boutroux's direct supervision.

A MEMORIAL was recently presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury, inviting him to appoint a committee to correct the Authorised Version of the New Testament "in those places only where it was erroneous or misleading or obscure." His Grace, in replying to the deputation, which was headed by Bishop Boyd Carpenter and the Dean of Norwich, expressed a wish that the memorialists should provide a specimen to exhibit the kind of revision which they desired, and suggested the Epistle to the Hebrews as the book to be undertaken. The Archbishop's challenge has been accepted by two of those to whom it was addressed, and on July 16 the Cambridge University Press will publish "The Epistle to the Hebrews, An Experiment in Conservative Revision," by "Two Clerks." The desire of the two revisers has been to produce such a version as will, to the unlearned reader, appear to be none other than that with which he is familiar.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Beaumont and Fletcher. Vol. X. 4s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & Co.:—The Beyond that is Within: Emile Boutroux. 3s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—The Lady Next Door: Harold Begbie. 6s.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—The Labour Movement: L. T. Hobhouse. 3s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. F. WARNE & Co.:—Emanuel Swedenborg: George Trobridge. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Hibbert Journal, The Nineteenth Century, The Contemporary Review, The Cornhill Magazine, The Vineyard.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

II.

LAST week I promised to tell you something about the Civil War in which Cromwell played such a great part. The two armies were very different; the people who sided with the King were mostly nobles and gentlemen (though a good many of these were on the other side, too), and were called Royalists or Cavaliers. They dressed in gay clothes as the courtiers did, and looked much less serious than their enemies, whom they called Roundheads, because at first they consisted of the poorer people, who kept their hair cut short and did not wear it long like the courtiers. Another name that was given to the Roundheads was Puritans, because they were very particular in their conduct, and would not drink, or swear, or gamble like the Cavaliers. Cromwell was a Commander in the army of the Parliament. I have told you nothing yet about his looks—what sort of man he seemed to those about him. The first time we find him described is in 1641, just before the breaking out of the war. Lord Warwick, who was of the King's party, and so an enemy, we must remember, says this:—

"I came into the House one morning well clad [the Cavaliers took great pride in their smart clothes] and perceived a gentleman speaking, whom I knew not—very ordinarily apparelled; for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill (i.e., bad) country tailor; his linen was plain, and not very clean; his hat was without a hatband. His stature was of a good size, his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swollen and reddish, his voice sharp and untuneable, and his eloquence full of fervour. . . . I sincerely profess, it lessened much my reverence unto that great Council, for this gentleman was very much harkened unto."

This foolish Cavalier, you see, thought that because Cromwell had not gold lace on his coat, or frills on his shirt, he was a man not worth listening to, but he was very much mistaken! Soon after the wars began, the Royalists found that he was a man to be afraid of in battle, for he saw that it was of no use to try to fight the great nobles and gentlemen who were on the King's side with an army of poor adventurers who joined the Roundheads partly in the hope of winning some fortune for themselves by it. So Cromwell collected a troop of men who were religious as he was himself, and determined to fight the King because they believed he was harming religion in England. These men did not drink or swear, they were careful in their conduct and fought because they loved the right and wanted to free England from her enemies, and they therefore fought so well and won so many battles that they came to be called Cromwell's Ironsides. The first great battle they won was at Marston Moor in Yorkshire in 1644, where about 4,000 Royalists were killed. Among the Roundheads who were killed was a young man, the son of Cromwell's brother-in-law, Colonel Valentine Walton. There is a beautiful letter of Cromwell's written on the field of battle to Colonel Valentine Walton, telling him of the death of his son. It shows us that Cromwell was not hard-hearted or careless about the lives lost in this war. This is how he writes:—

"Sir, God has taken away your eldest son by a cannon shot. It brake his leg. We were necessitated to have it cut off, whereof he died. Sir, you know my own trials this way [he had lost his own son, Oliver, a young man of 20, in the wars], but the Lord supported me with this, that the Lord took him into the happiness we all pant and live for. He was a gallant young man, exceedingly gracious. God give you His comfort. Before his death he was so full of comfort, that to Frank Russell and myself he could not express it, 'It was so great above his pain.' This he said to us. Indeed it was admirable."

The next great battle won by the Roundheads was at Naseby, near Northampton, and this, too, was won chiefly by the Ironsides. It really put an end to the war, though there were small fights in between these two battles and after them, some of them won by the Royalists. But at Naseby the King's army was so completely beaten that they began to give in. Soon afterwards the Roundhead army took possession of London, and the King fled to the Isle of Wight. He left there again, and tried to lead an army on London, but the Parliament decided that he should be taken prisoner and tried as an enemy of the country. The Court decided that he had been guilty of acts which deserved death, and sixty Members of Parliament, with Cromwell amongst them, signed the warrant for his execution. He was beheaded at Whitehall in London, on January 30, 1649—the only English King who has been condemned to death by his subjects. Let us be sorry for him. If he had not been a King, but simply a country gentleman, he would have done no harm and might have been beloved by everybody, for his own friends were very fond of him, and he was a pleasant and accomplished man. But he had a very obstinate character, and wanted to have the English people under his thumb and govern without a Parliament, and that was his ruin.

After his death, England was declared by the Parliament to be a Commonwealth—a Free State, without any king at all; and things went on like this (with a great deal of confused fighting in Ireland, which Cromwell tried to conquer, and nearly succeeded; and in Scotland, where King Charles's son, afterwards Charles II., raised an army to fight Cromwell) until 1653, when the Parliament began to see that the country would be better governed with someone at the head of it. So they made Cromwell Lord Protector—a post in which he had as much power as the King, indeed far more than poor Charles had ever had, because all England respected him, and he used his power wisely. He was four years at the head of the country, and did many and good things during this time. He made England respected by foreign countries, he protected some poor Protestants in Savoy who were persecuted by the Duke of the country, and raised large sums of money to keep them from starving when they were driven from their houses. In many ways he brought order into England again. He founded colleges, he cared for music, science, and painting; he started new Colonies over the seas, and improved the trade of the country. His enemies said that this high position was what he had fought for, but his own words are truer: "I called not myself to this place," he said solemnly; "God and the people of these kingdoms have borne testimony to it." Indeed, it was a place with too much hard work and too much that was disagreeable about it for anyone to try to be put there from selfish reasons.

Cromwell had much hard work and much sorrow until his death in 1658; but as he only cared to serve God and to work for England, he went busily on until the end. One of his sorrows in these years was losing his mother, of whom he was very fond. She died when she was 94, and we are told that a little before her death she gave Cromwell her blessing in these words: "The Lord cause His face to shine upon you, and comfort you in all your adversities, and enable you to do great things for the glory of your Most High God, and to be a relief unto His people. My dear son, I leave my heart with thee. A good night." She knew, you see, better than his enemies, what Cromwell was trying to do. Another trouble was losing his favourite daughter, Lady Elizabeth Claypole, who died in 1658. His grief was so great at this that he fell ill too, and died only a month after her. It was on September 3, on the anniversary of the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, when he beat the Scotch and the young Pretender. His battles were all over now, but it seemed right that a great storm of wind and then of thunder should be raging at the time of his death, for his own life had been very stormy. There had been very little rest in it, as you see, but that is the way with all great characters—they don't say to themselves, "How can I make myself the most comfortable in life and get through it as easily as possible?" No, they try to find out what is right, and then they do it with all their might, no matter what troubles and difficulties it may lead them into.

Just before his death Cromwell made a short prayer, asking God to "go on to do good for" the people of England, and to forgive him what he had left undone. Almost his last words were, "Truly God is good. Indeed He is. He will not leave me—." Then he said, "I could be willing to live to be farther serviceable to God and His people; but my work is done." Nothing can be greater on this earth than to feel that one has done one's duty. Cromwell felt that he had tried to do all that God had commanded him, and so, although he knew that he was full of faults, as all human beings are, he had been a good soldier, and he died in peace.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. JOHN HARRISON.

We print below the address delivered by Dr. Cressey at the funeral of the late Mr. John Harrison, which we were unable to publish last week owing to pressure on our space.

We are gathered here to express by our presence our feelings of sorrow and loss, and to express them for the much larger number who cannot be with us, yet whose thoughts are here and whose feelings are ours. Some of us mourn a departed kinsman; some, a special benefactor; all, a friend. Here was his spiritual home, here his thoughts centred. This church was the object not only of his thought but of his love and devotion. There are in almost every congregation those who are ardently devoted to its welfare, but few have equalled Mr. Harrison in service of this character, in length of time, in diversity of ways, and in unaffected pleasure. Sentiment added interest and beauty to his services, that of regard for the church of his boyhood and youth, of which his father was the spiritual guide. It was a place to him not only of word and sacred song, but of worship, and it was a joy to him during weeks of severe illness to listen to the reading of the service and hymns of the day and to join in their thoughts and inspiration. We may say of him, as we may happily say of many, he was the friend of all the ministers of our household of faith. Among all whom I have known officially connected with churches, I have known no one more thoughtful of the minister's comfort and convenience, and that, too, in what would be considered almost trivial matters. The prolongation of an organ prelude under conditions unforeseen, the addition of a few minutes of music at a period of service requiring continuous effort on the part of the minister illustrate that considerateness which was apparent in all ways and at all times. Indeed, he knew churches and ministers, their difficulties and their trials, as well as the bright side of the work which he sought ever to enhance. His ability and taste as a musician were as fascinating and helpful as they were uncommon in one whose chief thought and effort were given elsewhere. He will be remembered not only as one who spoke words of truth and encouragement from the platform, but who voiced the truth and inspiration in the language which reaches the intellect through the feelings, the language of music, which he so well understood.

As he was sensitive to discords in this art, he was sensitive also to the inharmonious in life. His sensibilities were touched by personal want and suffering, even by its possibility. He did not wait even for an indirect request; he proffered assistance. Many a hard road and painful hour have been made easier through his generous kindness, and to-day more persons than any of us know feel they have lost a friend. Hearts have been cheered, homes made happier, the world is better through his counsel, his efforts, his life.

As he was ready and helpful in the work of the Church by his counsel, but not insistent or obtrusive, so he held firm views on many subjects, but recognised the privilege and opportunity of others in their opinions. His thought in religion was eminently progressive. He was reasonable and reverent. He loved the Unitarian thought and name because it seemed to him the only basis of union of pure religion and perfect liberty. We remember the solicitude and care and effort of many years for the welfare of the close companion of his life, who left us hardly a year ago. We remember his patience, cheerfulness, and regard for others, his appreciation of the efforts of his kind friends which characterised the days of his illness. We think of what he has been to this church and the cause of liberal religion; and, though we falter in the expression of our sorrow, we rejoice in the faith which was his; that in the Father's home, whose mansions are many, joy, reunion, the highest fruits of righteousness, will be the inheritance of the sons of God.

At a meeting of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association held on Wednesday, July 10, a resolution was passed expressing the profound sorrow of the members at the death of Mr. Harrison, and placing on record their gratitude for the long and conspicuous services which he rendered to the work of the Association and the religious principles which it exists to promote.

A correspondent writes to point out that no mention was made in our memorial notice of the part which Mr. Harrison took in the foundation of the Guildhall School of Music. The nucleus of this flourishing and well-known Society consisted of seven or eight young men, who met in the neighbourhood of the Guildhall in order to promote their common musical interests. Mr. Harrison took a great interest in their proceedings, and used to preside at the piano.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE usual proceedings connected with the close of the session took place on July 2, at Summerville, Victoria Park, Manchester. During the day visitors were regaled with fare provided by the students in the shape of answers to examination papers and sermons. Your correspondent was not able to be present at this feast, but later in the day the Principal was at pains to indicate what good things absentees had missed. At five o'clock in the afternoon a large company assembled to hear the visitor's address. In the absence of the President, Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., the chair was taken by the Principal, Dr. Mellone, who briefly introduced the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., as "a most distinguished alumnus of this college." Mr. Tarrant's subject was "Student Ministers," and a large part of his audience was appropriately made up of students who aspired to be ministers, and of ministers who, not less fervently, hoped they might aspire to be students. In Manchester ministers have too often to content themselves with aspiration. The address was prefaced by a testimony, with which the Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A., also associated himself as visitor, to the excellent work of the past session, both on the part of teachers and taught. They had made a new start, and a more auspicious start could hardly have been made.

ADDRESS BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT.

Carlyle had said, in reference to certain criticisms on one of his books, that the critics would do well to remember how much worse it could easily have been. In taking stock, as it were, of the work of a college it might be necessary sometimes to keep such a saying in mind. But, on the other hand, the work ought not to be passed over with a careless glance. A strict and impartial judgment was necessary, because only that which could stand such judgment could hold its place to-day. In the training of ministers studies were not the only preparation requisite. A true minister was much more than a mere intellectual storehouse. Many influences had to be brought to bear upon him, and the College was not poor in such influences. It was growing richer in its wealth of honourable records. The influences which touched the inner springs of life must elude the most vigilant examination. They defied precise measurement. Let them hope that with all their getting in that College, they did not fail to get the wisdom of religion. As to progress in that respect the examiner was at fault. His attention must converge on the things that might be considered. "They may deceive me in their godliness, they cannot deceive me in their scholarship," a Cambridge divine once said of his students. In scholarship tests were possible. Men in College were there to study. Opportunities were not likely to be found elsewhere. A steady and determined pursuit of knowledge was most useful for the minister. If students did not avail themselves of their opportunities, they were in danger of proving themselves specially dishonourable men. In men training for the ministry they naturally looked for honourable dealing. What were the most useful subjects for the ministerial career? There were differences of opinion here. He sympathised with those who cried out against the course prescribed. But he advised them not to give way to that spirit. After all, experience counted for much. He did not subscribe to the opinion that the ignorant were the best judges of what it was best to know. The petulance of students must be met by an appeal to their good sense. The student was at College not to trifle, not to please himself, but to study. He must learn to bear the yoke in his youth. The student had to gain not only knowledge; but habits of life. If the years at College were properly spent, they would be far from ceasing to be students when they left College. They would rather be inclined to despair at the enlarging prospect before them. The conscientious student might be disheartened, and might say farewell to his technical books on leaving College. He might resolve to be just a plain teacher of religion, a simple man among simple folk. He would be assisted towards this conclusion possibly by the suggestions of a certain type of friend not uncommon in the churches. Why all this study? Won't you shrivel up like poor so-and-so? Will it help your preaching? It was true no doubt that some had shrivelled up and become mere students, slaves of the lamp. They were not welcome in other pulpits, or in their own. Whether such ministers existed to-day he was not prepared to say. It was a pity if it was so. It would be a pity if any of their present students went that way. But he was prepared to deny that the mere student was the worst tenant of the pulpit. The mere talker was worse, the shallow, uninformed vendor of other people's opinions. He was an offence in the pulpit. A simple man among simple folk! Let them consider if the aid given by such a man wasn't rather like first aid. No one would undervalue first aid, but it wasn't all that was required. The minister should be as skilled as a medical man. He should not be a first-aid man merely. The trained and skilled mind must come in. The man who was, in John Locke's illuminating phrase, "really only an ignorant man with a good memory," was sure to be found out. If habits of genuine studentship were cultivated the difference would be felt. The best fruit of a good student came in after years. What was wanted was not so much to know, as to deal properly with their knowledge. According to the familiar adage there was no royal road to learning. So there was no royal road to the pulpit. Born preachers appeared now and again. But we must be slow to think ourselves exceptional. If we sacrificed volubility on the altar of accuracy, piety would be best served. Intellectual self-respect was worth more than any number of tea meetings. Recalling his own impressions as a student after the lapse of thirty years, his chief regret was that he had not studied more. He trusted they would all serve their alma mater well in the year that was before them, according to their ability and strength.

At the close of the address Dr. Mellone, after a few words in appreciation of the wise, sensible, and admirable things said by Mr. Tarrant, proceeded briefly to make the usual announcements as to the results of the work of the session. Mr. Lawrence Redfern, having previously taken honours in Classics, has proceeded to his M.A. degree. He had worked for his B.D., and had passed in the two subjects for which he has sat. Mr. Charles Biggins had taken his B.A., and Mr. J. H. Ewbank had passed his Intermediate B.A. He could not refrain from one more personal reference, although it was to a resident and not a student of Summerville. Mr. Geoffrey Livens, son of the Rev. H. M. Livens, had taken first-class honours in Biology, being the only one in the first class. They congratulated him on his success. Mr. Lawrence Redfern, M.A., had been awarded the Rawson Prize for his essay in English Literature, and also the Bibby Prize for proficiency in Greek. The Sharpe Prize for Scriptural knowledge had been divided between Mr. Redfern and Mr. E. Glyn Evans. A presentation of books would be made to Mr. Percival Godding, who was leaving College to settle at Ballyclare, in recognition of his industry. Two certificates were to be presented, one to Mr. Godding at the close of his two years' course, the other to the Rev. David Jenkin Evans, of Chester, who had attended courses during four sessions as an occasional student. Mr. Evans had given entire satisfaction in his work. In concluding, the Principal referred to the fact that he was closing his first session at Summerville. It was not for him to attempt a general or detailed characterisation of the work of the students. He did, however, claim the right to look back with satisfaction on the session's work. He had been asked how he liked Manchester, the Manchester people, the Manchester climate, his work at Summerville. About the climate he had not a word to say. As to the people, the more he knew them the more he liked them. As to his work at Summerville—if the students would pardon the suggestion, if he knew the next session would begin to-morrow he would be quite ready and willing to meet it. When the next session did begin he trusted that it would do not less but even more to sustain the honourable traditions of the College. The proceedings closed with the pronouncement of the benediction by the Rev. D. J. Evans.

In the evening a Valedictory Service was held at Cross-street Chapel at 7.30 p.m., the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., being the preacher. There was a good attendance. The address was beautiful in its spirit, a high call and a brotherly valediction. At its close Mr. Thomas bade farewell and God-speed to Mr. Godding, who will begin his ministry in Ireland.

We learn that the Committee in charge of the Sustentation Fund inaugurated at the National Conference at Birmingham last April has resolved to aim at a sum of £50,000 (instead of £30,000) in consequence of the very liberal response made to their first appeal.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

WELCOME TO THE REV. W. WOODING AND MRS. WOODING.

A NUMBER of friends gathered at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, July 10, to welcome the Rev. W. and Mrs. Wooding on their return to England after a tour of some months in Australasia as the representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the Association, received the guests, and took the chair at the meeting which was held after the reception, when Mr. and Mrs. Wooding both gave an account of their doings in Australia and New Zealand. Their visit has undoubtedly been the means of cheering the men who are keeping the churches alive in districts all too remote from each other, where the consciousness of isolation is perhaps the hardest thing they have to bear. They themselves were entertained wherever they went in true Colonial fashion, and had the opportunity of meeting many representative members of the Government, in addition to receiving special travelling facilities on the State railways and other courtesies too numerous to mention, which they highly appreciated.

Mr. Charles Hawksley welcomed the travellers in cordial terms, expressing the satisfaction which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association felt when Mr. and Mrs. Wooding, who had decided to cross to the other side of the world to see their son, consented to act as the representatives of the Association at the same time and convey the good wishes of friends in England to the struggling congregations in Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. Wooding said that he and his wife had only one speech between them, but he would leave the description of the social side of their tour as much as possible to her. They had no adventures to relate, as their voyage out and back again, and their journeys in Australasia, had been uneventful so far as exciting incidents were concerned, but they might record a succession of entertainments and acts of hospitality which had been almost bewildering, and which testified to the friendliness and goodwill of their friends across the sea. In some places they had been worked very hard, often with the temperature varying from 90 to 100 degrees, and he had lectured and preached several times in each place they visited, so that their time had been well filled. Letters of anticipatory welcome met them at every port of call on the way out, and when on November 18 they arrived at Adelaide they were met and greeted in the warmest manner by Mr. Harris and the officers of the church. There, and at other places, they had to submit to the questions of the inevitable interviewer, who seemed more interested in the speaker's views on Free Trade and Protection than on religious subjects. Mr. Wooding proceeded to give a diary of the tour with particulars of the churches visited, which included Adelaide, Melbourne, Hobart, Sydney and Brisbane in Australia, and Wellington, Auckland, Timaru and Dunedin in New Zealand.

At the close of his address he laid special emphasis on the opportunities for work in the countries they had visited, but reminded his hearers of the intense loneliness experienced by the men who are labouring there at the present time. When the materialism of people in these new lands was spoken of it should also be remembered that in places where a great deal of work is at present only half done, and much has yet to be accomplished, chiefly of a materialistic nature, it is difficult to avoid being absorbed in these immediate tasks.

Mrs. Wooding followed with a speech in which she spoke specially of the delightful hospitality which had been extended to them in all the places they had visited, and described the scenery, the social conditions, and educational and philanthropic institutions with which they had had some opportunity of becoming acquainted. Alluding to women's work, and the women's movement in the colonies, she said that there was, so far as she could judge, a complete lack of public spirit and interest in political questions among the women, and where they had the vote it was often exceedingly difficult to get them to exercise it. Social problems were, however, much less pressing in the colonies, in fact, they did not exist as we understood them, and she thought also that one of the chief reasons why women took so little interest in public affairs was because they had so much domestic work to do. The servant problem was a very urgent one, and the performance of household duties left the women little time to devote to other things. She was bound to confess that the men for the most part showed the same lack of wide interests, and that it was a rare thing to meet one who troubled about the condition of the country as a whole. They were absorbed in local matters, and even when they went into Parliament it was often merely in order to get these local affairs attended to.

A cordial vote of thanks to the speakers was proposed by the Rev. C. Hargrove, seconded by Dr. Tudor Jones, and Mr. Wooding, in responding for himself and Mrs. Wooding, proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Charles Hawksley for presiding at the meeting.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

HEALTH CENTRES IN RURAL DISTRICTS.

OF recent years there has perhaps been some tendency to suppose that the social problem is only to be met with in towns, though those familiar with rural conditions know that it is sometimes to be found in acute form in the villages. Some account, therefore, may here be briefly given of an interesting experiment which has been put in operation in the out-of-the-way village of Newport (Essex), on the initiative and by the generosity of Lady Meyer. We reproduce the following facts from a reprinted extract from the report of the School Medical Officer for Essex. A commodious, old-fashioned farmhouse was rented, and Miss Florence Petty, whom St. Pancras people know as "The Pudding Lady," was installed there as Health Visitor. A start was made with a girls' club, and Miss Petty has made herself acquainted with as many families as possible, and was "At Home" each evening to any young women of the village who cared to come. In a short time the girls began to come, and music, drill, sewing, dancing, games, cookery lessons, had each their evening, while in the meantime the Visitor was getting to know the girls and their people, and using her influence for their general improvement. At the dancing classes, morris dances were learned under the direction of a teacher from the Esperance Club, and the local boy scouts for one evening a week joined the girls as partners with entirely satisfactory results.

OTHER DEVELOPMENTS.

"Penny Dinners" for school children were soon begun, at first only those who came from a distance being admitted, but later any child who seemed likely to profit by them. The result of these nutritious meals was soon manifest in the increased weight, better nourished appearance, and, more important still, in the improved manners and increased brain power of the children. Moreover the young people acted as missionaries to their mothers, comparing the meals at the Health Centre with those at their homes, much to the disparagement of the latter, which quickly brought the more intelligent mothers to the Centre to "see how it was done." This is not to be wondered at, as the cost per dinner for each child worked out at a penny for food and part payment for the gas used in cooking. Soon after the "penny dinners" a "Welcome Club" was commenced, to which mothers were invited to bring their babies to have them systematically weighed. The Health Visitor gives the mothers cookery demonstrations and informal health talks. It ought to be mentioned that the members of both the Girls' Club and the Mothers' Welcome pay a small amount towards the cost of expenses, and that the local nursing association has cordially co-operated with the local doctor and with the Health Centre, to their mutual advantage and satisfaction.

A DENTAL CLINIC.

Before the inauguration of school medical inspection the teeth of the local school children were practically neglected, with the result that the teeth of most of the adult villagers are in a very bad condition. A dental clinic was started. Arrangements were made with a local dental surgeon and anæsthetist to attend regularly to deal with cases arranged by the Health Visitor, and the cost was found to amount to 2s. per patient, with an initial expenditure for setting up the clinic of £14 0s. 2d. The early prejudices of the villagers have disappeared, and daily cleaning of the teeth has become a part of the moral code of the district. Though this latest development of the work of the Newport Health Centre is still young, experience has shown that "anyone who can provide two rooms and obtain the services of two workers—the one a nurse, district or school, or a health visitor for the operating room, and the other merely to preside in the waiting room—can with little expense set up a village dental clinic, and one such clinic may easily become a centre for the use of the neighbouring villages." And it ought to be added that the necessary outlay, considering the beneficial results to be obtained, is the truest form of economy and thrift.

THE WOMEN'S LOCAL GOVERNMENT SOCIETY.

ON Tuesday, July 23, the Women's Local Government Society will hold an American Fair (by kind permission of the Council of Bedford College) in the house and grounds of South Villa, Regent's Park, N.W., when country produce will be offered for sale, and folk dances and other entertainments will be given. The band of the Highbury Industrial School will play in the grounds. Admission, including tea, 1s. All articles for sale should be addressed, marked with the selling price, to Lady Lockyer, South Villa, Regent's Park, N.W., to be delivered on the morning of July 23. Further information and tickets can be obtained from the offices of the Women's Local Government Society, 19, Tothill-street, Westminster, S.W.

APPEAL.

IN the year 1892 the late Mrs. Bayle Bernard founded the Home for the Aged, Rochford-street, Kentish Town, N.W., which is supported by voluntary subscriptions and a guarantee of 1s. a week in respect of each inmate. The Home supplies a great want in the North St. Pancras district, and a great many old people who are recommended by the North St. Pancras Committee of the C.O.S. have spent the last years of their lives in it in comparative comfort and peace. During Mrs. Bayle Bernard's life she took a great interest in the Home, and was a generous subscriber, but with the loss of many old subscribers, and the increased expenses the Home is now some £30 in debt, and a considerable sum of money is required for repairs. New subscriptions or donations are therefore urgently needed, and an appeal is specially made to those who knew Mrs. Bayle Bernard, and who, it is hoped, will do something to help on a charity with which she was so closely connected.

Particulars concerning the Home may be obtained from the Treasurer. Subscriptions or donations may be sent to the Rev. F. Hankinson, 60, Haverstock-hill, Hampstead, N.W., or to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. E. F. Barham, 3, Wedderburn-road, Hampstead, N.W.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Accrington.—The annual flower festival was held in Oxford-street Church on Sunday last, the 7th inst., when the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, preached appropriate sermons, morning, afternoon, and evening; and special anthems were rendered by the choir. During the past month successful open-air meetings have been conducted on the Market Ground, with the Revs. W. T. Bushrod, W. J. Piggott, and H. D. Roberts as speakers. The meetings are to be continued until the end of July.

With a view to assist in raising a sufficient amount to cover the cost of a new heating apparatus recently installed in the church and minister's vestry, the ladies of the congregation held a small sale of work on Saturday, the 29th ult., with satisfactory results.

Belfast.—The congregation of All Souls' Church, Belfast, has lost its oldest member in the death of Mr. John Greenfield. The funeral took place on Tuesday, July 2, the service being conducted by the Rev. G. L. Phelps and the Rev. A. O. Ashworth. At the morning service on the following Sunday, the Rev. F. Woolley, who officiated, read the following tribute to Mr. Greenfield's memory, by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of London, formerly for many years minister of All Souls' Church:—"All of us who have known the life of this church at all intimately and are attached to its history and associations, will feel that the death of Mr. John Greenfield is like the closing of a chapter in its records. He was our oldest member, and his venerable presence seemed to link us of a newer day with the days of long ago. He was deeply attached to this congregation; it was, indeed, one of the central interests of his life. His memory lingered fondly over the long space of its history that he could remember. He liked to remind me that I was the third generation of my family whom he had heard from the pulpit of the Second Congregation. I suppose that almost his last public act was on Sunday, October 4, 1908, when he unveiled the beautiful Bicentenary memorial, and it is pleasant to remember now how deeply he appreciated the honour which we were all so glad to render as a tribute to his years, and certainly not less as a mark of our own personal affection and regard. Those of us who knew him in the more private relationships of life learned to respect him very deeply for the simplicity of his character and his old-world piety. I never heard a harsh or unkind word from his lips. As we leave him with hearts full of gratitude and trust in the hands of the Divine Mercy, let us remember him as one who seemed to our dim earthly sight to be among the faithful servants, 'true to the kindred points of heaven and home.'"

Bermondsey.—On Sunday, July 7, a special memorial service was held at Bermondsey for the late Mr. John Harrison, conducted by Mr. H. N. Coley, minister-in-charge of Fort-road Church. The Bermondsey congregation have special reason to regret the death of Mr. Harrison. They owe to him a debt of gratitude for his great kindness and for the deep interest which he took in the welfare of the cause at Bermondsey. For many years past he has helped the church financially, and through him, to a large degree, was the church kept open, at a time when it seemed everyone had forsaken the little band of struggling workers.

Bootle.—A crowded and enthusiastic gathering assembled at the Free Church Hall on Wednesday evening, July 3, to welcome the Rev. Walter and Mrs. Short, of Stalybridge, to their new sphere of work at Bootle. Many friends were present. The church had been redecorated and the organ thoroughly renovated. The chairman, Mr. R. Dibble, having expressed the congregational welcome, the Secretary read several letters of regret and good wishes. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, the founder (or rather "father") of the cause at Bootle, made a characteristic speech, and was followed by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Dob-lane, who made a stirring appeal to the men to back up Mr. Short's ministry. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, in welcoming Mr. and Mrs. Short to Bootle, laid great emphasis on the inspiring spirit of comradeship amongst ministers and people in the Liverpool district. The Rev. W. Short suitably acknowledged the warmth of the welcome. Other speakers were the Revs. C. Craddock, Lloyd Jones, E. Parry,

E. S. Russell, S. Street; Mrs. F. S. Yates and Mrs. Rawlins; and Messrs. C. Sidney Jones, H. Coventry, W. D. Nixon, A. Abrahams, J. C. Clarke, J. Dixon, F. Marques, L. Hall, and W. H. Robinson.

London: Kentish Town.—The church and Sunday school anniversary services took place on Sunday, July 7, at Clarence-road Church. At the morning service the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, of Islington, preached the sermon. In the evening Mr. Ion Pritchard gave an earnest address to the scholars. A very large congregation filled the church, and the special children's hymns were sung admirably by the scholars. The devotional part of both services was conducted by the minister, the Rev. F. Hankinson.

Manchester.—The District Association of Unitarian and Presbyterian Churches paid a visit to the Swinton Church on Saturday last, in connection with the series of similar visits to other constituent churches. The organisation of the scheme has been most admirably carried out by the late Rev. W. E. Attack, who was so well fitted for this kind of work, and whose loss will be distinctly felt in the furtherance of similar enterprises. The afternoon service in the church was conducted by the Rev. H. Chellew, of Pendleton, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Wm. Whitaker, of Platt. At the subsequent meeting Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson took the chair, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. A. Thornhill and the Rev. C. M. Wright, and Mr. Joshua Lord, of Moss-side. The president of the Association, Mr. Geo. H. Leigh, J.P., was also present, and appropriately referred to the great loss the denomination had sustained in the death of Mr. John Harrison. The Rev. C. M. Wright also made reference to the sad event, his local knowledge of Chowbent, Mr. Harrison's birthplace, enabling him to speak personally of matters of interest associated with the Harrison family. The visit was heartily enjoyed by all present, and the Swinton friends are to be congratulated on the success of the undertaking. Mr. J. Wigley, president of the Provincial Assembly, in moving a vote of thanks, said that the Association had had a reception fit for princes, and visiting friends agreed. He expressed hearty good wishes for an early ministerial appointment, and exhorted them to maintain their cause during the interregnum. In view of a scheme of local missionary effort in the autumn the meetings are for the present discontinued. The last two visits to Hale and Swinton have certainly left a happy and helpful impression of the gatherings.

Manchester: The Missionary Conference.—The annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, July 4. The proceedings commenced with a communion service, conducted by the President, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, who was assisted by the Rev. H. Fisher Short. The morning session opened with a devotional service conducted by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle. At the business meeting the following officers were elected for 1912-13:—President, the Rev. A. W. Fox; vice-president, the Rev. T. P. Spedding; treasurer, the Rev. J. M. Bass; secretary, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod; auditor, the Rev. H. E. Haycock; committee, the Revs. J. Evans, H. McLachlan, H. Bodell Smith, A. C. Fox, H. F. Short. The report and statement of accounts were adopted as printed. Five new members were admitted, viz., the Revs. Dr. Mellone, R. H. Lambley, L. Short, H. Chellew, and P. Godding. The President's address dealt with the "Signs of the Times," and special mention was made of the recent circular to ministers, and of the discussion thereon at Essex Hall, in Whit week. The open conference followed the lead given by the President, and a lengthy and earnest discussion was the result. Finally it was agreed that the officers and committee of the Missionary Conference should convene a general conference of ministers, the time and place being left open. The afternoon session was devoted to the Rev. Dr. Thackray's paper on "The Doctrine of Conversion." An interesting discussion was opened by the Rev. W. Holmshaw.

Newtownards.—The annual floral service was held on Sunday, July 30. The old church was as usual tastefully and lavishly decorated for the occasion. The sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps, of Holywood.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual picnic was held on Saturday last, at Glossop. About 200 members and friends partook of tea in the Fitzalan-street schools, and afterwards had a ramble through the park and up the hills to the site of Mouslow Castle. The Rev. J. Thomas acted as leader, and on the Castle hill Mr. Robert Hamnett, of Glossop, gave an address on the history of the site. From remains found he declared the hill to be the site of an ancient British fort earlier in date than the Roman Melandra Castle, a few miles away. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Hamnett and to the Glossop friends for their arrangements, on the motion of the Rev. W. Harrison, seconded by the Rev. E. C. Evans. The other ministers present included the Revs. H. E. Dowson, W. S. McLauchlan, and E. H. Pickering.

The Unitarian Van Mission.—A correspondent wishes to know if the Van Mission has been closed, as no record of its doings has recently appeared. On the contrary, it may be taken that silence in the press argues an absorption in the work and an excess of it. June has been a month of unusual anxiety, involving many unforeseen circumstances created by weather, strikes, and Royalty, but the work has not flagged. The Mission started the present season with a fortnight's work that almost created a record. It looked as though the best of good fortune to which the Mission had been accustomed was to be eclipsed. Then after Whit week came that change in the weather that has lasted until now. Rain and cold stopped the work of no less than 39 meetings during the month, and many a time when a meeting had assembled it was driven to shelter, sometimes with the promise that if the night should improve the missionaries would try again. Occasionally the missionary talked to the dark clouds and a brave soul or two in the vain attempt to gain a hearing for his message in the few nights at his disposal. In the London area the Mission has been working in the strike area, and it may be readily imagined that the disturbed industrial conditions did not render the work easier. In the Potteries last week the precipitation of two Parliamentary by-elections suggested a detour of the van in order to avoid the distracted region. In Wales the Royal visit to the Merthyr district interfered with the meetings. The net result was that the Mission was handicapped at every point, and failure all along the line might have reasonably been expected. Such meetings, however, as were possible on fine nights amply bore out the splendid promise of the opening weeks, and the average for the month is no less than 236 for the 55 meetings held during June. A list of the meetings held during the month, with the names of the missionaries and speakers, follows:—No. 1 Van, Wales: June 3-9, Pontypridd, the Revs. Simon Jones, J. Park Davies, John Davies, and Mr. John Lewis; June 10-16, Moelgerrig, Clwydyfagwyr, and Cefn Coed, the Revs. J. P. Kane, J. Carrara Davies, J. Park Davies, D. G. Rees, and Mr. Williams; June 17-23, Dowlais, the Revs. J. P. Kane, J. C. Davies, and J. P. Davies; June 24-30, Merthyr Tydfil, Rev. T. J. Jenkins and G. Neighbour. No. 2 Van, Potteries: June 3-9, Hanley, the Revs. H. D. Roberts, W.

Griffiths, and H. W. Hawkes; June 10-16, Burslem, the Rev. William C. Hall and W. McMullan; June 17-28, the Revs. R. N. Cross, L. Short, and W. A. Weatherall. No. 3 Van, London: June 3-6, Erith, the Revs. F. Brockway and F. Summers; June 7-13, Bexley Heath, the Revs. F. Summers, F. Brockway; June 17-19, Dartford, the Rev. F. Brockway; June 20-26, Gravesend, the Revs. J. M. Whiteman and F. Summers, Messrs. W. T. Colyer, and W. H. Sands (Lay Preachers' Union); June 27-30, Grays, the Rev. J. M. Whiteman and Mr. Stables (Lay Preachers' Union). No. 4 Van, Yorkshire: June 1-9, Leeds, Woodhouse Moor, &c., the Revs. A. Scruton, W. R. Shanks, H. R. Tavener; June 10-16, Castleford, the Rev. G. Pegler; June 17-25, Pontefract, the Rev. G. Ward; June 26-30, Knottingley, the Rev. G. Ward.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE DEATH OF MR. BARRETT BROWNING.

Mr. Barrett Browning's death has followed very quickly upon the centenary celebrations in honour of his father which took place a few weeks ago. He has always been a rather mythical personality to many people in England, partly because his fame has been overshadowed by that of his parents, and partly, of course, because he has resided for so long in Italy. His death occurred at Asolo—a name for ever dear to lovers of "Pippa Passes"—where the inhabitants of the town mourn the loss of one dear to them no less for his many kindnesses than for the honoured name he bore. Mr. Browning did all that could be done to resuscitate the silk-weaving craft, and one of the last facts of which his father was conscious when he was approaching death was the purchase of "Pippa's Tower" by his son; but the chief industry of the old-world hill-city was found to be gone past recall. Much beautiful lace is, however, made at Asolo, and the present lace school was founded by Mr. Barrett Browning, who has divided his time chiefly between Asolo and the Torre all' Autella, near Florence, since he sold the Palazzo Rezzonico, on the Grand Canal, Venice (where Robert Browning died in 1889) a few years ago.

A KENTISH HILLSIDE VIEW.

Miss Octavia Hill writes to the Times asking for help towards the purchase of "a very important and lovely bit of land, Mariners Hill, near Limpsfield and Westerham," which for a very limited time is being offered to the National Trust at a price greatly below its building value. "It is one of those salient promontories," says Miss Hill, "overlooking hills and wood and fields to the far-away blue distance, and would form one link in an important series of points of view. The ground itself is partly copsewood and partly open meadow. The wood is filled with primroses, wild hyacinths, campion, and foxglove, which are an endless delight to children and others." The nearness to London of such breezy heights, "accessible to the pedestrian, the cyclist, and to the many families who value lovely country and have either no gardens or but small ones," makes them increasingly valuable to the public, and it is to be hoped that help will be forthcoming for the purpose of saving Mariners' Hill, as other areas have been saved on Ide Hill and Toys Hill, and in the neighbourhood of Haslemere, Reigate, and Sevenoaks.

THE CRIME OF DOG STEALING.

It seems to be easier for the dog stealer to evade the law than we should have imagined possible, although it is clear that the law is not very definite in regard to what Mr. C. R. Johns, the secretary of the National Canine Defence League, has described as "one of the meanest of crimes." A man cannot be convicted for obtaining a dog under false pretences because it is not a chattel, and it may prove a far more serious matter to steal the collar than the dog. Mr. Johns gives some useful facts in his pamphlet on "Dog-Stealing," which shows that this evil practice is not only very common, but that it is carried on in a most skilful manner by men who are experts in their line of business. Many suggestions are made which should go far, if they are adopted, to make dog-stealing less profitable and more dangerous to those who have adopted it as a means of livelihood.

MR. G. W. E. RUSSELL AND THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN."

Mr. G. W. E. Russell, the author of "Collections and Recollections," reached the twenty-fifth anniversary of his association with the Manchester Guardian on July 1. The occasion naturally did not pass without some notice, and in addition to a chapter of reminiscences by Mr. Russell, the first article from his pen which appeared in the Manchester Guardian, a description of Queen Victoria's garden-party at Buckingham Palace on the occasion of the Jubilee in 1887, was reprinted last Saturday. In the former Mr. Russell pays a warm tribute to "the most high-minded and the least self-seeking of all English newspapers," which he is still proud to serve. Turning from the paper to speak of himself, he says: "I will say quite plainly that I have tried to preach a gospel; and Peace, Freedom, and Humanity have been its principal contents. In enforcing these I have brought out of my treasure things new and old, and I have purposely dwelt on the brighter, as well as the graver aspects presented by this world of opportunity and wonder. Above all, it has been my endeavour to produce

Not one immoral, one corrupted thought;
One line which, dying, I could wish to blot."

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF EDUCATION.

Dr. N. C. Macnamara, in a recent article on "A Physiological Basis for Education" in the Nineteenth Century and After, pleaded for more careful training of children based upon a more intelligent understanding of the instinctive and emotional faculties which affect for good or ill the nervous system, with vital results for character. "Nothing can be of greater importance in the training of young people," he says, "than a knowledge of the trend of individual inherited qualities which to a large extent influence their career throughout their lives. Few parents who have attained middle age are ignorant of the nature of their own good or bad hereditary qualities; consequently they are in a position to form a fairly accurate estimate of the predominant traits of character their children possess, and which of these qualities should be fostered and which suppressed."

* * *

"The question as to how far any special training can permanently affect the action of the basal system is an open one," Dr. Macnamara continues; "after a young person has attained the adult period of life we can hardly hope permanently to modify his hereditary qualities. But so far as this country is concerned it does not seem that in either our schools or universities is the subject of character seriously considered, the attention of teachers and pupils being, so far as education is concerned, mainly absorbed in the book-work necessary to enable candidates successfully to compete for appointments in one or other branch of the Government service, and to develop into a good sort of fellow." It is pointed out that at West Point, U.S.A., this criticism does not apply, for there the ruling principle is, first and foremost, the development of a lad's character, which implies self-knowledge, self-control, and self-reliance. The result of this system is admirable, "the knowledge, patriotism, manners and customs of the West Point men are proverbial throughout the United States, and would seem to be all one could desire."

THE INTERNATIONAL MIND.

At the opening of the eighteenth annual meeting of the Lake Mohonk Conference which took place in May, Mr. Nicholas Murray Butler, President of Columbia University, gave a stirring address on "The International Mind." This has been published by the American Association for International Conciliation of which Mr. Butler is also president. "The International Mind," said the speaker, "is nothing else than that habit of thinking of foreign relations and business, and that habit of dealing with them, which regard the several nations of the civilised world as friendly and co-operating equals in aiding the progress of civilisation, in developing commerce and industry, and in spreading enlightenment and culture throughout the world... There is a curious and interesting interdependence between reasonableness and sanity in the conduct of domestic politics on the one hand, and kindly feeling and generous sympathy in our attitude toward foreign relations on the other. A nation that is either intellectually, morally, or politically turbulent, is not in any position to assume leadership in the development of international affairs on a peace-loving and orderly basis. The political braggart at home is the political bully abroad... Reform of international procedure, like charity, begins at home." Abdul Baha Abbas, leader of the Bahai Movement, attended the Conference, and gave an earnest address in his own language which was rendered into English, a sentence at a time, by his private interpreter.

Wimbledon Unitarian Church.

APPEAL.

The Congregation of the above Church is in need of a Piano for use at Week-day meetings, which it is proposed to hold in the Autumn.

The resources of members are already strained to meet the expenses of services in a hired hall. If some friend or friends in other Churches would give or lend for the season a Piano, it would greatly help the carrying out of a programme of work, which otherwise may have to be abandoned.

Communications should be addressed to Mr. WM. LEE, B.A., 108, Valley-road, Streatham; or Mr. C. A. PEEK, 17, Kingsley-road, South Wimbledon, who will be glad to supply further information.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

NOW READY FOR JULY.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, (M.A., Ph.D.)
A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.
Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.
Heroes of Faith—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill,
Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z. INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

SURREY.—Home offered Child or Invalid Lady; experienced care, bracing air, good garden. Medical and other recommendations.—M. B. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric "Flaxella." Washable, wears for years. Scores of fascinating designs, beautiful shades. Sale Catalogue FREE. Write.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

SALE BARGAINS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen Remnants, big pieces, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday July 13, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3656.
NEW SERIES, No. 760.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

- August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.
- August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
- August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.
- August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.
NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

SWISS-TYROL-ITALIAN borders.—Mr. LUMVIS' party will leave on August 1 (fortnight, 14 guineas; month, 19 guineas, cheap tickets to the Grisons also arranged).—15, Green-street, Cambridge.

The International Visits Association

Founded for the Purpose of Studying the Customs and Institutions of Other Countries.

THE SEVENTH VISIT TO DENMARK.

August 13-23, 1912.

All particulars may be had from the Hon. Sec., Miss F. M. BUTLIN, Old Headington, Oxford.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

A Plea for Miracle. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services):

July 21.—Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME (of Brighton).

„ 28.—Rev. VALENTINE D. DAVIS (of Bournemouth).

After July 28, the Hall will be closed until September 22, when the services will be resumed.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden. HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:
REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:
H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Next Entrance Examination on July 29.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—The Scholarship and Entrance Examinations will be held on July 29, not 19, as previously advertised.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. A Scholarship, value £15 per annum for two years, will be awarded on the result of an examination to be held at the School on Wednesday, July 24. Candidates must be under 14 on the day of examination. For particulars apply to the Head Mistress.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS. —Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, July 21.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15, Rev. T. L. SPEDDING; 7, Mr. F. MADDISON.
 Brompton, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15, Rev. E. DAPLYN; 6.30, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. F. K. FREESTON; 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11; 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, Sunday School Sermons, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11 only, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. STANLEY P. PENWARDEN.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. A. HURN.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROOKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Mr. PERCIVAL CHALK.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKE.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Totteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVEES.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 56, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

BIRTH.

GIMSON.—On July 18, at 45, Colville-gardens, Bayswater, W., to Agnes and Herbert Gimson, a daughter.

DEATHS.

BADCOCK.—On July 13, at Great Chesterford, Essex, the Rev. Lindsey Thomas Badcock, aged 75.

BOULT.—On July 14, at her residence, Northfield, Princes Park, Liverpool, Lucy, last surviving daughter of the late Peter Boulton, of Liverpool, and sister of Peter Swinton Boulton, of Stapely, Mossley-hill, in her 96th year.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

WANTED, Temporary Assistance at the INQUIRER Office from August 6 to August 20. Lady with office experience preferred.—Apply, stating qualifications, the SECRETARY, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

A GOOD Working-Housekeeper or General Servant wanted for position of trust in household of three ladies. Must be reliable woman and good cook. Some help in house cleaning given weekly.—R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, for the Argentine, experienced Nursery-Governess. Must be fond of children and quiet country life.—For all particulars apply, 30, Sheepcote-road, Harrow.

THE DAUGHTER of a Unitarian Minister would be glad to hear of a situation in which she would take entire charge of infant from the month. In or near the Midlands preferred.—S. S., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	8	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	483	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		MEMORIAL NOTICES :—
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT: Mercy .	484	Faith as a Guide in Politics	488	Miss Anna Richmond	493
VERSES: The Mother of us All	485	Two Books on Masterlinck	489	The Rev. Lindsey T. Badcock	493
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		A Presbyterian Censor	489	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
Values of the Faith.—I.	485	The Age of Dryden	490	"Flowers Farm"	493
The Temper of Acceptance	486	William Allingham	490	The Social Movement	493
An Indian Poet	487	The White Waller	491	Ministers and the National Insurance Act .	494
CORRESPONDENCE :—		Publications Received	491	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	494
The Enfranchisement of Women in the		FOR THE CHILDREN :—		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	495
Colonies	487	The Boy and the Butterfly	491

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS week the Royal Society, "that noble and splendid fraternity of lovers of the truth," as Lord Morley called it in his speech on Tuesday, has been celebrating its 250th anniversary. Its foundation ought to be reckoned as one of the few wise and noble things which Charles II. did among a multitude of base ones. The celebrations have been honoured by the presence of a number of celebrated men of science from all over the world. In this way a fitting emphasis has been given to the power of knowledge to over-leap the boundaries of national history and racial temperament. Science is more free from the spirit of jealousy and suspicion than any other human pursuit. Perhaps it is because it is in the very nature of the case so impersonal. But something must also be laid to the account of the severe moral discipline which it lays upon its servants.

* * *

SOME references were made during the celebrations from the ecclesiastical side to the disappearance of the acute tension between Religion and Science. The Dean of Westminster spoke of the gratitude of the clergy for "the amazing enrichment of human thought which had resulted from the patient researches into natural science during the past 250 years, and in particular during the last eighty years." And the Archbishop of Canterbury described himself as a man who, without scientific attainment, was in sympathy with the widely diffused spirit of eager curiosity which had been aroused to scrutinise the operations of Nature and to discover truths that would be of practical utility to mankind.

* * *

WE are heartily glad to read these words of cordial recognition, for they may help to correct a popular sentiment of the religious platform to the effect that it is now possible for Religion to grasp the hand of Science, because Science has repented of its dogmatism and learned to be modest. We hold no brief for the mighty pioneers of the nineteenth century. No doubt some of them held with ardent conviction theories of the origin of the world and the processes of nature which were in sharp conflict with traditional theology, and left little room for any articulate belief in God at all. These theories, in so far as they survive, are not taught with the same assurance. They are proclaimed no longer as a scientific gospel. But the dogmatism was not all on one side. A vaster and more significant change has come over religion. The scientific temper, its caution, its regard for facts, its careful valuation of evidence, has invaded the theological class-room. The most delicate findings of religious psychology no less than the concrete facts of religious history are investigated in a scientific spirit. The aim, except in the strongholds of tradition, is no longer to confirm a dogma but to discover the truth. But the debt of Religion to Science is not only one of intellectual method. If there is a more equable temper in theology, free from the confusions of personal and party conflicts, and a finer passion of veracity, it is the man of science who has led the way.

* * *

THE restoration of Winchester Cathedral to a position of security is an occasion for national rejoicing, and nothing could have been more fitting than the service of thanksgiving and the visit of the King last Monday. The Cathedral is not only one of the noblest Gothic buildings in the world, to be named in the same breath with Rheims and Chartres, it is also among the most splendid memorials of our national Christianity in which all Englishmen have a share. Its history is not that of one of the churches of Christ in this realm, but of all. The interesting account of the work of restoration, which has been published by the architect, Mr. T. G. Jackson, shows how near it was to the disaster which overtook the Campanile at Venice. All the resources of modern architectural and engineering skill were mobilised for the work of rescue, and to-day the great church of St. Swithin, the largest Gothic building in the world, stands firm on new foundations.

* * *

THE National Insurance Act came into operation last Monday, and from every point of view it must be regarded as the greatest social revolution of our time. It has run the gauntlet already of a great deal of criticism, and it is certain to encounter a great deal more. Every complicated Act of Parliament has defects which can only be remedied in the light of practical experience; but it is the plain duty of the good citizen to do his best to make it work smoothly and beneficially, and not to overlook the immense possibilities which it contains for human health and happiness because, in some of its details, it may offend his judgment or his taste.

* * *

THE benefits of the Act could not be expressed better than in the following letter by Mr. John Burns, which was read at a meeting in the Kennington Theatre last Saturday. It carries all the greater weight because of the unadorned directness and simplicity of its language. "I wish to add my good wishes," he wrote, "for the success of the great scheme of reform which is being established under the National Insurance Act. That valuable measure of social amelioration reinforces the great work of public health which has been carried out under the Local Government Board, and puts the coping-stone on a splendid fabric of voluntary insurance that the working classes of this country, to their lasting credit, have erected. It links together workers, employers, and State in one common effort to reduce ill-health and unemployment, and the suffering and hardship which result from these. I greatly rejoice in the assistance which the Act gives in the attack on tuberculosis, and I look forward with hopefulness to the time when that terrible scourge will have been driven from our land."

* * *

A FOREIGN OFFICE Blue Book has been issued this week with the title, "Correspondence Respecting the Treatment of British Colonial Subjects and Native Indians Employed in the Collection of Rubber in the Putumayo District." It is one of the most harrowing documents which has been published in modern times. We doubt, indeed, whether in the long and degrading history of the exploitation of native races there has been anything quite so bad in its appalling lust of cruelty and its unspeakable horror. The daily press has stirred public indignation by printing samples from its pages; but let no one think that things have been made to appear blacker than they are by a judicious selection of sensational incidents. Exactly the reverse is the case. No newspaper could print many of the details. Let strong men read the report and realise what booming trade in South American rubber means.

* * *

SIR ROGER CASEMENT learned from one of the directors of the Peruvian Amazon Company that the returns of Putumayo rubber for the six years ended December 31, 1910, gave £966,000 on the London market. On this basis he calculates that the yield during the first twelve years of the present century—"the whole of the rubber output of the region, it should be borne in mind, is placed upon the English market, and is conveyed from Iquitos in British bottoms"—must have considerably exceeded £1,000,000, and possible may not have fallen very far short of £1,500,000. "The number of Indians killed either by starvation—often purposely brought about by destruction of crops over whole districts or inflicted as a form of death penalty on individuals who failed to bring in their quota of rubber—or by deliberate murder by bullet, fire, beheading, or flogging to death, and accompanied by a variety of atrocious tortures, during the course of these twelve years, in order to extort these 4,000 tons of rubber, cannot have been less than 30,000, and possibly came to many more."

* * *

No shadow of an excuse can be found in the intractable character of the Indian population. It is not, Sir Roger Casement assures us, a war of plough against tomahawk, of colonist and cultivator against barbarism and warrior hunter. "On the contrary, the Peruvian Indian is a being of extreme docility of mind, gentleness of temper, and strength of body, a hardy and excellent worker, needing only to be dealt with justly and fairly to prove the most valuable asset the country possesses.

Instead of this he has been from the first enslaved, bent by extortion and varying methods of forced labour to toil, not for his own advantage or the advancement of his country, but for the sole gain and personal profit of individuals who have ever placed their own desire above the common welfare."

* * *

OUR Foreign Office cannot be accused of precipitate action in publishing Sir Roger Casement's report. Sir Edward Grey has been in possession of the facts for considerably more than a year, but he has been anxious to secure the co-operation of the United States, and to give the Peruvian Government every opportunity of setting its own house in order. This Peru has not done, and the correspondence reveals a pitiful story of vacillation and incapacity. Probably the will and the power to do anything effective in that remote region are both lacking in a weak and badly organised Government. The appeal must now be made to the moral indignation of the civilised world and especially of ourselves. Sir Roger Casement closes his terrible survey by reminding us that "Christianity owns schools and missions as well as Dreadnoughts and dividends. In bringing to that neglected region and to those terrorised people something of the suavity of life, the gentleness of mind, the equity of intercourse between man and man that Christianity seeks to extend, the former implements of her authority should be more potent than the latter."

* * *

DR. LIONEL TAYLER is doing an excellent public service in the letters on the problem of the Feeble-minded, which have appeared recently in the Manchester Guardian. His attitude is not that of hostility to the Bills dealing with the subject at present before Parliament, but he is distinctly critical and alert to the difficulties. His plea amounts to this, that our idea of what constitutes feeble-mindedness is quite indeterminate, and that doctors have none of the settled standards of judgment which they use in cases of insanity. Here we think he has emphasised a practical difficulty, which legislation has no right to ignore. The plea for some restraint of personal liberty is made specially on behalf of the extreme cases, which are so sadly familiar to those who administer the poor law. Is it possible to arrive at some method of classification which will enable us to control people of this kind without including mere crankiness or inconvenience of behaviour? That is essentially the problem of legislation. There must be very clear evidence of the need of control before there is any infringement of personal liberty, and the law, if it is to command public respect, must be careful to eliminate as far as possible the danger of varied and conflicting judgments.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

MERCY.

BY THE LATE REV. E. P. BARROW, M.A.

"Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful."—ST. LUKE vi. 36.

THERE are two sayings of Christ in which He enjoins mercy. The first is in St. Matthew's version of the Sermon on the Mount: "Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy." The second is in St. Luke's version: "Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful."

The first, I confess, hardly appeals to me at all. It had to be said, because it is true, because it ought to be remembered. If we are not merciful, we cannot reasonably expect to obtain mercy. But it does not touch a responsive note, because it does not touch the highest motive. There seems to be a suggestion in it of self-interest, almost a suggestion of a quid pro quo: It will be to my advantage by-and-by to be merciful now. That, of course, is not the highest view. Most likely the saying was repeated in this other form. Certainly St. Luke has caught the right spiritual interpretation: "Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful." That is the right reason, and the only worthy reason. We should be merciful because our Father in heaven is merciful. Mercy is a quality man should desire to have, and to manifest, because it is divine.

And there is another reason why St. Luke's version is better. The two evangelists use two different Greek words for the English word "merciful." St. Luke's word (οἰκτίρμονες) is the more tender of the two. There is more feeling in it. The other word (ἐλεήμονες) signifies pity; this word implies more what we mean by compassion, fellow-feeling. There is a pity which borders on contempt. There is a pity which is only an easy good nature that cannot bear the sight of pain. Pity that is only pity is not divine. It is only when it is sympathy that it is the pity that God feels. "Like as a father pitieth his own children, so is the Lord merciful." "Be ye merciful, as your Father is merciful."

It is on this Sunday* that we ask for mercy towards the creatures which live around us, and like us are dependent on the Father's care. Kindness to animals of which we think so little, is but an extension of that love of God, of which we say so much. Mercy to God's creatures is the final application of the mercy of the merciful God. A mercy which arrested itself and stopped short at man would not be mercy, it would be favouritism; it would not be a law or principle, it would be a whim, an impulse; certainly it would not be divine, it would be less than human, weak, arbitrary, unreasoning. Mercy, to be worthy of God, must be universal, for, as nothing can be shut out from His action, so nothing should be excluded from His care. And it is by man, and through man, that His care travels on to the furthest bounds of creation. Man is the main channel through which mercy flows. And if man checked the flow of mercy through him, and refused it to the creatures beneath him, he would no longer be human, he would be inhuman, for he is human only in so far as he approaches the divine. He comes in to view as a worker with God, dressing the earth and keeping it, rearing cattle, tending sheep. But what of hunting, what of the killing of animals for sacrifice and for food? He might do these things, and take part in the struggle for life, and yet not be cruel. The shepherd, it is true, like young David, might slay a lion and a bear; and in the slaying of them save many another unprotected life; and he might feed sheep for food and for sacrifice, but he could still gently lead and carry them in his arms whilst alive, and, with ninety-nine safe and sound, still search for one that was lost. It is not the taking of life, but the inflicting of unnecessary pain, and indifference towards undeserved suffering that constitute cruelty. Indifference there has been in our past history to an appalling and almost incredible degree—towards captives, towards slaves, towards criminals, towards servants and dependents, towards children. We have been barbarous in warfare, in sport, in industry. But we have long been coming to a better mind. We could not go back now to some of the revolting practices of our fathers. The prevention of cruelty is one of the aims of education, one of the objects of legislation. The torturing of men, the baiting and worrying of animals are not only illegal, they are felt to be immoral. He who now attempted them would be punished, and also loathed. Unfortunately we are still at the mercy of phrases and terms. We who would be ashamed to bait and worry animals are not ashamed to vivisection them. What may not be done under the name of sport may be done under the name of research, and be done with every aggravation of pain that science and highly developed inventiveness can give. We are misled by names. Let us face the facts. The question of vivisection is as much a moral question as the question of slavery, or the torture of prisoners, or the baiting of bulls and bears. It is not a question of utility or expediency, it is a question of right or wrong. Torture would in many cases be useful, slavery would in many cases be expedient. We would not deign to discuss the possibility of restoring them now. But vivisection we are ready to condone on the ground that it may in time alleviate the sufferings of mankind. What if it did? When the alleviation came it would not excuse, certainly would not absolve, the guilt of the generation which allowed the experiments to be made. No amount of material benefit will ever wash away the moral stain.

* This sermon was preached in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, on "Animal Sunday."

This is what we cannot make our opponents understand. They accuse us of allowing "shallow sentimentalism to overcloud the clear dictates of elementary reason." There is that which is higher and more precious than reason. It is faith—faith in God. If I thought that reason was given to men that in the sight of God they might use it to transfer their diseases to animals, and out of the pains of animals to draw relief for their own, to produce in little suffering bodies artificially and wantonly pains that nature and natural law would never have visited upon them; if I thought that every avenue to medical and surgical knowledge were closed except that which lay open through the blood of innocent victims—if I were forced to this conclusion, and still preserved my integrity, then I, for one, would be ready to curse God and die, rather than live in such a world, under such a Providence. Materialists might find it possible, and even think it acceptable, to live on such conditions; idealists would not. To them justice and mercy, purity and charity, are realities of infinitely greater worth than prolongation of life and bodily ease. To them science, true science, is the knowing how to live, not the knowing how to keep yourself from dying. What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? Certainly not the redemption of the body at such a price. A demonstrator applied to the Home Secretary for a certificate which was refused. The certificate was to allow him to starve dogs for several successive days up to the point of death. Pressed in cross-examination as to the pain which would have followed, he would not admit pain, preferred to use the word "discomfort." He was evidently quite unable to imagine the mental pain of an animal fed by human hands, and educated into a high state of sensitiveness by association with human life, watched from day to day by un pitying human eyes. That is how men lose their souls, for want of sensibility is loss of soul; just as they lose their minds when they lose the power to think. To lose the power to feel, and to be content to live without it, is a worse state than death. To measure action by its ends without reference to means, by the wants of man without thought of the will of God; to consider humanity as flesh more than as spirit; to trifle with the principles of goodness, to recognise them in one sphere and to deny them in another, all this is not less sinful than wilful crime. This is not weak sentimentalism—unless it be sentimentalism to see things under the aspect of eternity and immutable decree. "Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful." There you have mercy in the creature linked on to mercy in the Creator. Take man out of that line of agency and you destroy the one visible evidence we have of the working of compassion in the midst of blind forces, impersonal laws, unconscious tendencies, irresponsible causations. Creation's movement will then be, not towards moral ruin far worse than that natural chaos out of which it was evolved. The moral sense is the sole witness we have that the Spirit of God still moves with spiritual touch on the face of the waters. That moral sense is a birthright which I would not sell for any material gain, even if it were called immunity from disease, or exemption from pain, or deliverance from death—not even if it were the rescue of wife or child. It is a birthright, for it is a right, a blessing, a privilege, a glory, which comes with and through birth. "We are His offspring," and to act otherwise than as He acts is to dishonour in myself the image in which I am made. Knowledge will come, if the sweep of research be made wide enough, but better ignorance than science won by violence. Better a continuance of woe than a casuistical justification of wrong. "In all their afflictions he was afflicted." If God is in any real sense merciful, He, too, pays the penalty of compassion, and suffers with us—and not only with us, but also with the creatures of His love and care. Afflictions are not cured by shifting them from the strong to the weak. We then but add another sin to the already burdened conscience of mankind. At all costs, "Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful."

THE MOTHER OF US ALL.

Two sons had Abraham; the one was bond,
The other free. O mother of us all —Jerusalem—can we not hear thy call
To us, thy free sons, thro' the clamour fond Which gendereth to bondage? Must we still (Slaves to the Law) breed famine, hatred, strife,
The children's cry, the anguish of the wife,
Because the City of God set on an hill
Is hid from us? Her deep, true mother-voice Pleads with us: "Sons, ye are not bond
but free;
Can ye not make the one abiding choice
'Twixt Love and Hatred? O my children, see!
Though desolate, through you I might rejoice.
My arms are open—turn ye home to me."

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

VALUES OF THE FAITH.

I.

Nor only in regard to religion, but in regard to every other effort to attain speculative truth, we have made the mistake of treating the intellect as primarily, and by original direction and training, an organ of research into that truth. M. Henri Bergson, in his three great books, now happily to be obtained in English translation,* has shown us the source and character of this general error of mankind. It is plain, now, that our intellectual habit has been formed and educated in the school of practical needs, that it is dominated by the conditions of the call to action, and that the speculative theories it produces are influenced throughout by its genesis and training. Life as a whole is the touchstone of spiritual truth—feeling, thought, and action, at work together. The intellect, as merely reflective and discursive, employing tools wrought for dealing with separate things that have been carved out of reality by the mind, constructs for us according to the fashion learnt elsewhere (and found useful in scientific research and the lower practical affairs) a diagram, a model that does not work, a static representation of the mysterious interpenetrating whole in which we ourselves are powers as well as parts. And this diagram, this model, this static representation, is of another world than that in which we live by our religion, in the spirit.

* Time and Free Will. Translation by F. L. Pogson. Matter and Memory. Translation by N. M. Paul and W. Scott Palmer. George Allen & Co., Ltd. Creative Evolution. Translation by Dr. Mitchell. Macmillan & Co.

Poincaré, Mach, Karl Pearson, and many more have taught us, from the side of science, that even there our theoretic knowledge is a system of guesswork, which is maintained as it is only as long as it serves our practical needs, and has room for all the facts of which knowledge is direct. Theoretic science is at bottom hypothetical. As long as the Ptolemaic system had room for all the astronomical facts we had collected, it was true. When they were too many and too much for it, it became false. The value it had was practical; it was a kind of "conceptual shorthand," and lasted until we had to invent new symbols in that theoretic script, for new facts which had come into our experience.

No instructed person nowadays is likely to take the atomic theory of matter as a statement telling us what matter really is. We have all learnt that this theory is, or was, a piece of intellectual machinery to be thrown aside when a better should be devised. The caloric theory of heat has been so completely discredited that most of us have never heard of it. Theories of electricity succeed one another without rousing more than a passing interest in our minds; theories in physiology sometimes hardly last long enough to find themselves in print. In fact, all the so-called theories of science are hypotheses, useful guesses, temporary scaffolding for that house of mind, of which the true purpose is to serve the general needs of man in his life on this refractory but treasure-laden earth.

We have learnt our lesson—one of the most important lessons that we have to learn—in relation to science; and science has consequently become more modest in its claims while ever more successful in its results. Arrogance has disappeared with a mistaken confidence in the possession of theoretic truth. The pragmatism of modern science has had its effect on the moral attitude of scientific men; and we, who are not scientific, find our belief in them, and in the value and stability of their work, grow with their modesty and with their recognition of the hypothetical character of their theoretic statements, and the primacy of those utilitarian purposes they are made to serve.

The science of past generations made no such clear distinction, nor do all scientific men make it even now. There are still some who share the belief of their professional forbears, and think that when they give us the last new guess about the nature and constitution of matter, of the ether, and so on, they are telling us the inmost secrets of these mysterious things. But they are not in the main current of advance; and most of us who have cared to study the direction of that current know that they are not. It is natural enough that men who feel the practical value of an intellectual scheme, a guess, an effort in theoretic exploration, should think too much of it, in any age. And in past times, before the criticism of the human mind and of its ways had been even attempted with any care, men could not but trust too uncritically to the results that it produced for them in the speculative sphere. Why should they not? Neither a long and tested experience, nor a cautious investigation of facts and processes, came to their aid. They took what they found, and used all alike, whether of the theoretic order or the practical. They confused these orders together, but why not? An intellect that serves utility so well has credentials for a theoretic office, a presumption in its favour men do not easily begin to shake. Always there came to the defence of schemes that it provided, evidence of their usefulness, the weight of advantage given them by the test of application. They served, therefore they were true. Or they were true, and therefore they served. Which way shall we put it? There is a gulf of difference between these two; but only lately have we come to know it. The Ptolemaic system is true, therefore it is useful. The Ptolemaic system is useful, therefore it is true—at least for the moment, and until it is no longer as useful as—shall we say?—this new Copernican. That older world said one thing, this newer world has learnt to say another.

It is surely well. We may understand now, as we never understood before, certain characteristics of the human mind, in all times and places. We may understand how it becomes possible for us to communicate truth of the practical order, truth of experience and life, under a formula of the theoretic order, when the formula is falsely believed to unveil the very nature and constitution of a mysterious reality—even of God, the most real and most mysterious. Our religious fathers handed down to us dogmatic statements of this kind, believing them to be speculatively as well as practically true. So did our scientific fathers. And now it is high time for us to apply to them all our newly won power of understanding, our new sympathy, the penetration of that historic sense which has of late been so greatly stimulated, and so brilliantly enlightened by our knowledge of mind.

M. Le Roy, the Modernist defender of both dogma and criticism, has not always taken full advantage of this change. He is, of course, hampered by his position as a Roman Catholic layman; and therefore his apologetic, valuable and suggestive as it is, gives to us—in our freedom—the impression of a tour de force. Emancipation allows us to use his methods and materials to far better effect. And if we follow him in disclaiming an intellectualist defence of dogma against an intellectualist attack, if we emphasise the primary value of dogma as religious and moral, not as theoretic, we may pass beyond him in the direction he himself points out, and admit, freely and frankly, that in the days when those dogmas were framed and formulated no such distinction as that which he makes was either thought of or demanded. It lay implicit in the statements themselves; but no man brought it out, or felt the need of bringing it out, into the light of day.

Even now we are so little accustomed to the distinction that we find it easier to call the Ptolemaic astronomy false, than true for its day and generation, and easier to say that if the statement "God is personal," taken in the intellectualist way, is either sheer anthropomorphism or frank agnosticism, then, and therefore, it is valueless and wholly false. We have to learn a new habit with regard to these matters, and we are not likely to find such learning easy. It is plainly absurd to judge our fathers, their beliefs and their statements, as though they had the smallest opportunity of holding in check the habit that sits most naturally on all men. Of course they not only thought their statements theoretically true, as well as practically, but thought them true in the same way for all time to come. How, for example, should they have any notion that they did not know what the nature of man really is, or that the Copernican astronomy would upset all they believed about the spatial relations of heaven and hell?

Therefore we Christians, who are learning from our fellows everywhere, are not dismayed when we are reminded that certain dogmatic statements have a theoretic content that implies such outworn hypotheses as those of the Ptolemaic astronomy. We are prepared to acknowledge cheerfully that once, and indeed for long, this theoretic content was held by many to be not only of high, but perhaps of primary importance; to be as true, and true in the same way, as the negative and moral content which from the beginning has been put to proof through generations of Christians living the Christian life, and has withstood that test and triumphed. We are not dismayed, we are confident and cheerful, for we are learning, among other things, both how and why the intellect fails and yet succeeds in such affairs; and we see that the ineffable reality, that corresponds with our feeble efforts to state it, is, for our true and living knowledge, not even imperilled.

W. SCOTT PALMER.

THE TEMPER OF ACCEPTANCE.

AFTER some goodly hours of labour (or was it play?) among the growing things, in the nice warm soil, I exchanged tools for book, and, thinking to be studious for a while, went to my half-secluded seat among the currant bushes, as the light of a great July day began to soften and wane a little, the sun westering northwards. The air most kindly temperate, the physical powers happily, not unduly, wearied, the mind wistful and at leisure for a quiet spell of reading—how good it was! And yet, some two hours later, when the dusk and the dew of night were falling, the book lay still unopened, although it was Alfred Zimmern's fascinating volume on the "Greek Commonwealth." For another form of spiritual enrichment had claimed and kept the mind's attentiveness. The spirit of the hour asserted itself and said, persuasively, "Be not studious now; consent to be instructed and blessed in passive, effortless surrender; let the powers of the Invisible which pervade this scene have their way with thee, and subdue the heart to their serene content; yield thee to the influence of the breathing earth, the breadths of evening light upon the fields, the floating clouds, the sky!" How feeble a resistance one could make to the authority of that voice. How easy it was to consent. And with what abounding fruition of grace was the soul rewarded for its submission. For the place and time were charged with some hidden excellence of well-being—a holiness of spiritual health that absolved one from all desire and all regret and all ambition of achievement. Nothing happened, or needed to happen. Life itself, a flowing stream of serenity and affluence, was its own sufficing, and poured into the soul, without stint, its simple homely gift of blessedness.

Musing on this, in the same place, a few days later, the old and perhaps foolish question revives and presses for answer: What is the meaning of such moods of experience? Whose the voice that bids us "consent to be blessed," and whose the power that so lavishly bestows its gift? The well-worn theological phrases come into mind, but do not suffice. They belong to the study and the pulpit, and are very well in their place. But under this expanse of sky, in this temple of wordless prayer, of soundless praise, the greatest words of religion lose their significance and fail to express the soul's emotion, even as now remembered in tranquillity. All words fail. It is the miracle of the unexplained, the mystery of life's ever-opening, never-opened secret, coming to realisation thus, in the mood of passive receptivity.

I recall to-night, in calm reflection, the hour and the scene. A broad stretch of waste land lay there, beyond the garden fence, for years untilled—the home of countless wild flowers and small creatures of the earth, in spring and early summer a nesting ground for the skylark and tree pipit, and always a feeding ground for the linnet and greenfinch and ubiquitous sparrow. It is now being submitted to the ruthless plough, one half showing the dark grey furrows of upturned soil, the other still clothed with tall grasses, and, here and there, bright patches of white or golden clover. That evening one small bird was visible, exploring among the furrows and twittering to itself, as the breeze went by. Strangely, as the radiance of sunset spread over that homely scene, the splendours of the invisible seemed to gather and concentrate there. Above the careless, solitary sparrow and the silent ground and the wondering man, the sky soared and domed, infinitely far, yet nowise remote—the kindling spirit of the hour made them all one in the life they shared in common. A vast brooding sympathy possessed or pervaded the whole. Then, for a moment, one seemed to know, to understand: we together, earth and bird and sky and human creature, felt the meaning of the mystery, and were glad in its breathing, passionate, flowing life. Was it Reason, Intelligence, Love? Was it Beauty, Joy, Beneficence, Goodness, Peace? It was all and more than all these—the Reconciliation, the Harmony of Creation's ineffable purpose, breaking into finite consciousness there, through those kindred but transient forms of its inexhaustible vitality.

And surely, soon or late, unto us all, amid the tumult of clashing interests and the fierce passions of the world, there is granted, in favoured hours, this "temper of acceptance," when, released from illusions, we consent to be blessed, without reserve, without misgiving, in the fruition of divine content.

W. J. J.

AN INDIAN POET.

AT the dinner which was held in London, last week, in honour of Mr. Rabindra Nath Tagore, the Bengali poet, Mr. W. B. Yeats presided. We are indebted to The Times for the following report of his fine tribute to Mr. Tagore's genius:—

"To take part in honouring Mr. Rabindra Nath Tagore is one of the great events of my artistic life. I have been carrying about with me a book of translations into English prose of 100 of his Bengali lyrics, written within the last ten years. I know of no man in my time who has done anything in the English language to equal these lyrics. Even as I read them in this literal prose translation they are as exquisite in style as in thought. The style was familiar in Europe several hundred years ago. Mr. Rabindra Nath Tagore is also a great musician; he sets his poems to music; then he teaches poem and music to some one, and so together they go from mouth to mouth, sung by his people, very much as poetry was sung in Europe three or four centuries ago. In all his poems there is one single theme: the love of God. When I tried to find anything Western which I might compare with the work of Mr. Tagore, I thought of 'The Imitation of Christ,' by Thomas à Kempis. It is like, yet between the work of the two men there is a whole world of difference. Thomas à Kempis was obsessed by the thought of sin; he wrote of it in terrible imagery. Mr. Tagore has as little thought of sin as a child playing with a top. In Thomas à Kempis there is no place for the love of visible nature; into his great austere nature such a love did not enter. But Mr. Tagore loves nature; his poems are full of the most beautiful touches showing his keen observation and deep love."

Mr. Yeats then read Mr. Tagore's own English prose translations of three lyrics—two of which were as follows:—

"I was not aware of the moment when I first crossed the threshold of this life. What was the power that opened me out upon this vast mystery like a bird in the forest in midnight? When in the morning I looked upon the light I felt in a moment that I was no stranger in this world, that the inscrutable without name and form had taken me in its arms in the form of my own mother. Even so, in death the same unknown will appear as ever known to me. And because I love this life, I know I will love death as well. The child cries out when from the right breast the mother takes it way to find its consolation in the left one in the very next moment."

"In the deep shadows of the rainy July, with secret steps, thou walkest, silent as night, eluding all watchers.

"To-day the morning has closed its eyes, heedless of the insistent calls of the loud east wind, and over the ever wakeful blue sky a thick veil has been drawn.

"The woodlands have hushed their songs and doors are all shut at every house. Thou art the solitary wayfarer in this deserted street. Oh, my only friend, my best beloved, the gates are open in my house—do not pass by like a dream."

Mr. Rabindra Nath Tagore replied in the following terms:—"I have not the power adequately to express my gratitude for the great honour you have done me. This is one of the proudest moments of my life. I have a speaking acquaintance with your glorious language; yet I can but feel in my own. My Bengali has been a jealous mistress, claiming all my homage and resenting rivals. Still, I have put up with her exactions with cheerful submission; I could do no other. I cannot do more than assure you that the unfailing kindness with which I have been greeted in England has moved me far more than I can tell. I have learned that, though our tongues are different and our habits dissimilar, at the bottom our hearts are one. The monsoon clouds, generated on the banks of the Nile, fertilise the far distant shores of the Ganges; ideas may have to cross from East to Western shores to find a welcome in men's hearts and fulfil their promise. East is East and West is West—God forbid that it should be otherwise—but the twain must meet in amity, peace, and understanding; their meeting will be all the more fruitful because of their differences; it must lead both to holy wedlock before the common altar of humanity."

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN IN THE COLONIES.

SIR,—The report of Mrs. Wooding's speech containing her impressions of women's work and the women's movement in the Colonies, made at the meeting under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on the evening of July 10, needs comment and qualification. It would have been fairer to our colonial sisters, before alluding to her impression of their "complete lack of public spirit," and their inertia in the use of the vote, and to the over-pressure of domestic service, which she believed to be their special handicap in public service, to have made a general statement first of her impression that both men and women for the most part showed lack of wide interests and were limited in public activity, due partly, in her opinion, in the case of women, to their having too much private work to do. This would not commit Mrs. Wooding to any opinion for or against the vote either for men or women. If it is true, it is a serious charge against the social and industrial conditions of the Colonies, that they are such as to hinder or prevent men and women citizens from properly discharging most essential functions of citizenship. Whatever handicap, however, colonial women may have in domestic life, and in the rarity, according to Mrs. Wooding's finding, of the colonial man "who troubled about the condition of the country as a whole," the fact remains that since women were enfranchised in New Zealand in 1893, and in South Australia (the first of the Australian States to give votes to women) in 1894, a most remarkable advance has been made, to the point of far outstripping the Mother Country, in legislation specially benefiting women and children and family life in general, in promoting purity and temperance, and in obtaining more equality socially and industrially for men and women. Very striking is the spoken and written testimony as to the good results of Women's Suffrage from such authorities as Mr. Pember Reeves (late Premier of New Zealand), Sir Robert Stout (late Premier of New Zealand and now Chief Justice), Sir Edmund Barton (late Premier of Australia), and the present Australian Prime Minister, Mr. Andrew Fisher. A final blessing was pronounced on Votes for Women in Australia by the Commonwealth Senate on November, 1910, when a resolution was passed unanimously recording the beneficial results due to the extension of the suffrage to women, and concluding with the words, "Because the reform has brought nothing but good, though disaster was freely prophesied, we respectfully urge that all nations enjoying representative government would be well-advised in granting votes for women."—Yours, &c.,

EMILY H. SMITH,

63, Birchfields-road, Rusholme,
Manchester, July 17.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

FAITH AS A GUIDE IN POLITICS.

"A Philosophy of Social Progress." By E. J. Urwick. London: Methuen & Co. 5s. net.

PROFESSOR URWICK makes "a general attack upon the Comtist tradition in sociology." He finds little assistance from the numerous attempts which have been made to construct, in sociology, a science of social life. Therefore, he proposes to substitute for such a science "a philosophy of social life—or, rather, or social change," a philosophy which "will be transcendental and will always be very closely analogous to a religious faith." (Pref.)

What is this philosophy? In reply, the author informs us of the final lesson which the philosopher has to master: "to learn that what is of importance is not the reform, but the will that prompts it; not the improvement of social machinery, but the resolve that machinery shall be improved until all are helped by it; not the results achieved by our devices, but the effort to achieve something good for the use of our fellow-citizens" (p. 296). In following out this clue Professor Urwick has given us a valuable and suggestive contribution to social philosophy. He occupies a position which—granted certain assumptions—is a quite tenable one, and in expressing the difference of opinion to which I find myself committed, I wish to recognise fully at the same time what I myself have learnt from his earnest and well-considered exposition.

In the first place, we must object that, complex as social phenomena are, they are capable of being treated in partial isolation. We can leave on one side from time to time what is not necessary for our particular purpose at the moment. It is an exaggeration, therefore, to say that "we cannot get at the value, the meaning, the real significance of the social fact as it affects us, and as it operates in the whole process of social change, unless we treat it in relation to all the elements which enter into our complex life as social beings." For instance, the game of bridge is an important social fact, but it belongs to a group of pastimes. Following upon the instruction just quoted, I attempt to put bridge in relation to recent movements in painting, or to the school of tropical medicine. But obviously there is no necessary relation between bridge and these other subjects. And science is first concerned with necessary relations. What Professor Urwick says against possibilities of sociological science, is applicable scarcely in a less degree against economics, eugenics, &c. (p. 5). The complexity of economic conditions is so great that unless we can mark off what matters from what does not, we lose ourselves in a maze. If the limitations of the old political economy narrowed it too far, the new school of economics—represented as it too often is by persons untrained in statistics—confuses issues and darkens counsel. It is fatal to reasonable methods, if we surrender the prospect of an ultimately perfect science. And the maxim which Professor Urwick lays down would render impossible not only sociological study, but all the natural sciences. The astronomer could not calculate the elements of an eclipse unless he introduced an artificial simplicity into his data. No one, therefore, can take up with advantage a complex study like Sociology unless he is prepared to distinguish between the relevant and the irrelevant.

In the second place, it is not a valid objection against the method of a science, if we urge that the science does not furnish its own practical applications. Art deals with practice. The individual science has nothing to do with the interdependence of facts in the actual world; only the experience of life can furnish us with the art of life. I am interested in certain social studies and also am about to purchase a new hat. But even if my judgment about the new hat should be disturbed by an excessive occupation with certain departments of Sociology, this is not worth notice from the scientific standpoint, except as illustrating the distinction between what is important and what is not. "But," says Professor Urwick, "the moment you try to apply (your laws or truths) or deductions from them to the complex social man and society without reference to the laws and truths of all other social sciences, you attempt to do something with is very dangerous." I do not admit this. Against Professor Urwick's maxim, I set Aristotle's, "To seek the accuracy appropriate to the matter in hand." This last maxim, although by this time somewhat antiquated, is indispensable in speculation. Much more is it indispensable in the practical use of knowledge. You cannot take a single step in life, if you wait until you know all about everything. And to return to the topic from which we started, no speculative science pretends to the omniscience which, we are assured, is necessary.

We need not be surprised therefore if Professor Urwick, after making these enormous demands upon science, arrives at something like scepticism. We are told that for the wise man as for ordinary mortals there are no social facts. And "if the basis of fact turns out to be so much illusion, it would seem to follow necessarily that the basis of scientific knowledge of social causation is illusory too" (p. 274).

What is left, then, to the wise man? There is "the faith in his vision of a kingdom of heaven upon earth, in the light of which every wise and good man interprets all social facts and the whole system of facts which we call our social life. . . But it is anything but rational; whatever else it is, it is not the reflection of the dry light of reason." Surely this is to throw away the mariner's compass and trust to the stars again. But wisdom is justified of her children. History sums up the experience of the past and enables us to begin sometimes where our ancestors ended. Take, for example, the idea of justice. In Professor Urwick's philosophy of social progress, justice plays so slight a part; that it is not even recorded in the index. It is a curious feature of English philosophy in general that it has almost neglected the concept of justice nor has the special application of philosophy to social problems helped very much. If we remember that "justice" is indistinguishable from "righteousness," we shall find a clue to the meaning of that moral impulse which Professor Urwick deprives of its rational character. Might I suggest to him that, in a later edition of his book, he would confer a great benefit upon his readers if he dealt with the concept of justice as a guide to social advance.

FRANK GRANGER.

TWO BOOKS ON MAETERLINCK.

Maurice Maeterlinck. By Edward Thomas. London: Methuen. 5s. net.

On Maeterlinck, or Notes on the Study of Symbols. By Henry Rose. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

MR. THOMAS' book is a concession to the public. He is too clever to have willingly chosen to spend three hundred pages in cataloguing the details of Maeterlinck's life and writings, seeing that he is capable of such brilliant and incisive criticism as here and there shines out when he is really enjoying himself and forgetting his public. In the main he is restricted to his model—a Queen's Hall descriptive programme. All obvious points are emphasised and developed that the uninitiated may go away happily satisfied that they know what Maeterlinck is like, how he lives, and what he has written. He can never again be the vague mysterious genius they have feared to open, for Mr. Thomas has told them frankly all about him. Not a fact or analysis seems omitted: the complete anatomy of what is known as "Maeterlinck" at afternoon teas and dinner tables is there; there only remains the intangible charm of his actual works. For a plain commonsense introduction to the most elusive of living writers, this book of Mr. Thomas is all that could be wished. Those who are well up in their Maeterlinck would probably take the first and last chapters—the biography and the conclusion—as sufficient, with a few pungent passages of illuminating comment and terribly frank criticism thrown in; perhaps such paragraphs as these:—

"He can reach ears that are closed to Blake. The new, the unique thing in his books is, in fact, Maeterlinck. He is the advocate, and the preacher. He does not originate, but expands with subtle eloquence what he has learned from Plato, Plotinus, Porphyry, Marcus Aurelius, Behmen, Ruysbroeck, Novalis, Amiel, Carlyle, Emerson, Ruskin, and the rest. He addresses, not philosophers or scholars, but the humble, the magazine readers, the general public, and he is neither technical nor obscure. As a rule the mystics have not been easy to understand, because they speak with tongues which the rest have to learn with much labour; not being artists, their language owes its depth not to tradition, but apparently to immediate inspiration, and it is turbid from transit out of the heavens. Maeterlinck is perfectly clear."

"I find in these two books ('Le Trésor,' and 'La Sagesse et la Destinée') a certain appearance of facility and unreality, as of one whose power of expression exceeded his thought and experience, but not his reading; and the voice might be that of one coming out of a library, not a wilderness."

"When Maeterlinck was a young man he wrote with the intensity and narrowness incident to youth; he was a hundred things which could not have been guessed from his writings. He has lost the narrowness and most of the intensity, but I cannot feel that he has yet reached a steadfast, whole, and mature expression. He is many things, but he is not yet one. A man, not a writer, of this type would probably be called deficient in character."

Mr. Thomas' task was difficult, and he has handled it well, especially in his summaries of the essays. In dealing with the plays it was not possible to achieve any artistic success. Mr. Thomas' notes remain prose outlines—useful for judging composition of groups and masses—but retaining hardly a hint of the fugitive beauty of Maeterlinck's delicate palette. The illustrations are interesting, but the portrait facing the title-page is the best of all, probably the best one we have of Maeterlinck. It is just the face Holbein's sensitive, firm hand would have loved to draw. The head has the full build of the healthy humourist—the eyes look out calmly, sanely, a little critically; the lips have the protrusion of the gentle dogmatist. The dreamer of grey towers by dark waters, the singer of unfinished lyrics of memoried emotion, is there, but deliberately held in to quietly build up the reiterant sentences.

Of Mr. Rose's book it is not easy to say much. The title of the book is suggestive of the wide field possible to a rambler among symbols. The author writes in an earnest and doctrinaire fashion, flinging casual retorts to critics by the way, and bringing together all kinds of fragmentary notes on his subject that are in themselves interesting. But he must have met an unusual number of feeble-minded readers of Maeterlinck to have been inspired to such elaborate explanations of the dramatist's "meaning." Literary societies connected with churches should find ample material for debate in these pages.

E. D.

A PRESBYTERIAN CENSOR.

Particulars of the Life of a Dissenting Minister. Written by Himself. With occasional Reflections, illustrative of the Education and Professional State of the Dissenting Clergy and of the Character and Manners of the Dissenters in General. Longmans, Green & Co. 10s. 6d. net.

WHAT was the matter with the "Old Dissent" in the eighteenth century? It is by helping to supply some answer to this question that the mournful and querulous Reflections of one Dissenting Minister have an interest for a wider public than the collectors and antiquarians who seek out such books as this. We are sufficiently familiar with the complacency of Evangelical historians, who easily explain from their own superb elevation why the Presbyterian Congregations fell into such aridity and ineffectiveness. It is much more instructive when we have, as here, a voice from within, which plainly reveals to us the low ebb of vital religion, the humdrum level of congregational activity, the self-satisfied intellectualism, which would have been too dense a veil over the hearts of these people to be pierced by a much more fervent evangelist than the writer appears to have been. Indeed, he quite innocently lets us see part of the cause of the trouble when he reveals, and quite proudly reveals, his own ideals of "respectability," and elegant literary culture and "judicious" preaching. His unfortunate career is, after all, not a surprising spectacle when we remember the circumstances under which the ministers prepared for their work (the poor "P—board" comes in for special castigation), and afterwards entered upon it in connection with the so-called Presbyterian congregations. With the almost total lack of anything like a common and connected church organisation (Presbyterian or other) resulting in the absence of any sense of joint responsibility for the provision of ministerial education, resulting, also, in frequently unstable relations between ministers and particular congregations, there were certain to be many untoward failures of adjustment which could produce nothing but torment to sensitive souls. And all this external defect might have been alleviated by the inspiration and buoyancy of a powerful internal religious faith. Such a "common wave of thought and joy" was indeed "lifting mankind again" at this very time. But our Dissenting Minister and his hearers stood stolidly amid that flood like Gideon's fleece, "unwatered, still and dry." He quotes with approval another minister who writes about the Methodists, that they should not be molested, for "while I injure no man, I have certainly a right to attend upon that preacher whose nonsense exactly suits my nonsense." Granted that there were many deplorable features in the Evangelical Revival to make sober heads indulge in wiseacre wisdom (and the case referred to, that of Wheatley at Norwich, was a very bad one), yet our Presbyterian congregations showed no sort of consciousness that one of the world's big happenings was going on within hearing of their dull ears. Instead, they were preoccupied with that incessant urge to splitting-up and splitting-off that must always characterise Protestantism when it takes itself to be pre-eminently a rationalism. The writer makes no secret about his own changes of opinion, and the difficulties they made for him in his career. His perplexities about ordination by imposition of hands, his changes of front with regard to Baptism (ending in his deciding that Baptism was intended only for the Apostolic Age, and should, therefore, not be continued now), his relinquishment for a time—though only for a time—of the ministerial office under the conviction that an order of ministers was of doubtful expediency; these and such-like subjects show that fatal tendency of religious rationalism to run itself out among barren sands, instead of flowing to irrigate rich pasture-lands of personal, heart-felt, religious experience. And when we hear that a great failure in the education of ministers is their neglect of prosody and quantity, and that the introduction of evening services is a great cause of debased and abandoned morals among the lower order of the people, we have some measure of the insight which was brought to bear on the problems of the time.

An able editor has inserted in the text notes in red ink identifying persons and places which the writer had left anonymous in his edition of 1813, and it will be an interesting task for those who know the period to guess at others still unnamed. This writer himself was Charles Lloyd (1766-1829).

W. W.

THE AGE OF DRYDEN.

The Cambridge History of English Literature. Vol. VIII. Edited by A. W. Ward, P.B.A., and A. R. Waller, M.A. Cambridge University Press. 9s. net.

"THE remark has been made," wrote Cardinal Newman in his neglected work on the Ideal University, "that the history of an author is the history of his works. It is far more exact to say that, at least in the case of great writers, the history of their works is the history of their times, each in his turn the man of his age, the type of his generation, or the interpreter of a crisis. He is made for his day and his day for him." If it be so, one might have expected a history of English literature to be divided into periods named each after its greatest writer, or at least that when such writer was one of superlative eminence his own age should from the literary point of view be called after him.

It is remarkable that, in this fullest History of English literature yet compiled, only one volume, out of the fourteen advertised, takes its name from a single writer, and very few, even among experts on the subject, would guess who is the one Englishman, so distinguished. Yet on reflection we are inclined to approve the unique distinction which the editors have conferred on Dryden, while we wait for the appearance of the tenth volume to learn why Johnson does not share it. For strictly speaking it is not the real superiority of a writer as judged by posterity which entitles him to give his name to the age in which he lived; it is the influence which he exercised as a living author on his contemporaries, and the authority which was adjudged him as a critic and an exemplar.

Of such influence and authority neither Shakespeare nor Milton had a share, while Dryden was possessed of both to the fullest extent. "For thirty years," writes his modern biographer, "he wielded an intellectual sway, wider in its scope than that which after him, Addison, Pope, or Johnson exercised. He reigned as a literary king, holding a throne independent of royal favour or ministerial patronage, and unaffected by change of creed or by worldly adversity." If to-day he has few readers and none to do him reverence, as all did when he was living, yet is his rank assured among the immortals. We learnt to recite his Odes to Music in our school days. His hymn to the Holy Spirit unites in its sublime strain worshippers of every Christian Church. His "Absalom and Achitophel" and "Hind and Panther" are still of interest, political and religious as well as literary. His numerous dramas have all the excellence of their kind, and contain many fine passages, though they are fouled by "obscenity, immorality, and profaneness," to which he himself pleaded guilty in his later years; but these, instead of derogating from his authority, probably helped to his popularity with high and low. Yes, the age of the restored monarchy was "the Age of Dryden," and in his own sphere he reigned with more assured power than did the Merry Monarch from his higher throne.

"If the triumph of Puritanical principles under Cromwell had been lasting and prevented the Restoration!" says John James Tayler—in such case John Dryden had left unwritten nineteen-twentieths of his works as we have them. A corrupt society corrupted him, and he used his gifts to spread the contagion. "Such degradation of the dignity of genius, such abuse of superlative abilities cannot be contemplated," writes Johnson, "but with grief and indignation." He who did so much, what might he have been, what might he have done under happier conditions! The remark is trite. It might recur in almost every chapter of a history of genius, as yet unwritten. But while, as Dr. Ward says in his, of course, admirably written chapter on Dryden, "there are few literary movements of importance marking the period of which he did not, as if by right divine, assume the leadership, and which did not owe to him most of what vitality they possessed—on the other hand, of all great English writers he was the least original, the least capable of inspiring his generation with new ideas and of discovering for it new sources of emotion." So if from the broad current of the polite literature of the day—drama and Court poetry and elegant essay and political satire—we turn into the narrow channels of piety and philosophy and science and law, we find ourselves gliding in sheltered waters where Dryden's dominant inspiration does not breathe.

Of the early Quakers and "the vast output of books, pamphlets, broadsheets, and public letters," in which rude countrymen and University graduates told such as would read of their spiritual experience, and pleaded for liberty of conscience and worship—of George Fox and William Penn and Samuel Barclay and Thomas Ellwood, one who comes of their stock and bears a well-known Quaker name writes in a chapter full of interest to the student of religion. It is a lesson of warning to all would-be reformers, that even the association of freedom and spirituality may lead into the bondage of formalism and tradition, and barrenness be the penalty of artificial constraint.

The Cambridge Platonists, "that new set of men," but for whom says Bishop Burnet, the Church would have "quite lost her esteem over the nation," John Smith and Henry More and Glanvill, whose names are yet revered among us, while their works rest undisturbed on the shelves of old libraries, of these Mr. Bass Mullinger, than whom no abler historian of any movement in his own university could be found, tells as much as most readers will care to know. For books, wise and true and good books, increase every year, while the time for reading amid manifold activities grows less, and of many authors we must needs be content to learn just a little, and that at second hand.

The Caroline Divines from 1660 to 1700 had, we venture the remark on the authority of Archdeacon Hutton, "no conspicuous literary merit," but many are still revered among Church folk. Most notable of them, perhaps, Isaac Barrow, who died Master of Trinity at the age of only forty-seven. We note, for the consolation of such as it may concern, how he said that he used tobacco to "regulate his thinking"; and by means of it, or in spite of it, attained to "a strength and richness of style which won the admiration of critics so different as Pitt and Hallam." To John Locke, the editors have accorded a privilege of which they show themselves extremely parsimonious. He, like his fellow John who gives his name to this volume, has a chapter all to himself. And, indeed, his influence, if it might not compare with that of Dryden in the world at large, affected thinking men everywhere, and has endured through all the changing fashions of generations; nor is it by any means exhausted even in our day.

The volume concludes with a chapter on what the writer describes as "perhaps the most important literary achievement that falls within this period." We should incline to substitute "undoubtedly" for "perhaps," and to count it the chief glory of Dryden that the twentieth century should "recognise" him as our first master of English prose. This is our chiefest debt to an age which produced no writers of supreme excellence—that we owe to it "the creation of a prose style which is substantially that of our own day, and has been the ready instrument of all who have since written our language with simplicity and effect."

With this acknowledgment of obligation to our forefathers, who lived in an untoward generation, under the jovial Charles and the glorious John, the story of seventeenth century English literature ends, with no exhilarating prospect for the somewhat dull and respectable epoch next to come. C. H.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.

By the Way. Verses, Fragments, and Notes, by William Allingham. Arranged by Helen Allingham. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 5s. net.

SINCE the death, in 1889, of William Allingham, two books have been published to keep his memory green. In 1907 an extensive "Diary" was given to the world, replete with interesting reminiscences of the chief figures in the Victorian era of art and literature. And recently the last sifting of his papers has furnished a miscellaneous collection of jottings by the way, fragmentary thoughts and notes in a commonplace book. Such a volume must not be judged upon its intrinsic merits. It cannot be intended so much for the general public as for the dead poet's special public. The issue of this volume is somewhat equivalent to hanging up the palette of a painter in a public institution. We have happy turns of phrase that might have been used as material for poems. We have literary lines and curves rapidly dashed down in charcoal, in order to capture a mood of Nature, a transient vision. We have shrewd observations, yet not made so carefully as to be taken too seriously. Some are homely bonmots, lit by playful humour; some are piquant, ironical, hitting the mark with effective precision. If some descend to the level of the platitude, others rise to almost proverbial excellence.

Perhaps the brief literary criticisms are of widest interest. Thus we have George Borrow's vigour characterised as a sort of "Defoe on the boil"; and Walt Whitman described as a host who treats his guests with heaps of uncooked viands: "Instead of a feast he offers them a larder." Of a great popular writer he remarks: "He writes by what he has, not is." Of another storyteller: "The hinges of his story are made of brown paper." There are obvious limitations of sympathy, as in the dismissal of "Omar Khayyam" and the lack of appreciation of Tolstoy or Victor Hugo. One example of verse must suffice:—

"I saw a man go by to-day; O when we were at school,
They counted me a clever chap, and him a stupid fool.
Give each a piece of paper; I can write a song; but, zounds,
He, sir, can write a cheque on Coutts' for fifty thousand pounds."

The skits are kindly, like the man who wrote them. The face that looks out from the photographs in the "Diary" betokens a thoughtful spirit, fond of ruminating when not looking far out upon the world of men—long, silken, wavy hair, and eyes set far apart, lighting up with a more genial fire as they grew older. One thinks of the beautiful water colours of his wife, and his own charming "Day and Night" songs, and the intimacy enjoyed by poet and artist with Tennyson, Rossetti, Carlyle, and other great contemporaries; and the picture conjured up is that of a life lived beneath the most gracious influences of a true culture, and habituated to the most alluring ideals of love and beauty. William Allingham would have justified his place in the cosmos if he had done nothing more than write the "Maids of Elfinmere," and so given occasion for Rossetti making "the best drawing that has ever appeared in illustration of a book," the drawing which kindled in Burne-Jones the ambition to become an artist.

J. T. D.

THE WHITE WALLET. By Pamela Glenconner. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.

LADY GLENCONNER has read widely, and, if we may judge from the selections she has gathered together in this book from various authors, known and unknown, her love of literature has been among the greatest and most fruitful joys of her life. She has catholic tastes, and favours nobody above the rest. Ovid is as welcome as Mr. Galsworthy, and Longfellow suffers no discredit because Meredith is included. On one page you get a bit of "Paracelsus," on another some verses from an American paper. Several of the selections in prose and verse were written by Lady Glenconner herself, some being marked with three asterisks for a reason that we have not divined, others signed with her name. These indicate a passionate love of the open country, and a sensitiveness to the soul of things immanent in flowers, grass, dreams and the sound of weeping, and asleep under the "infinite curves of the Down-land."

WE understand that the following significant protest has been signed by 30 persons of distinction in theology, comprising the five surviving members of the Revision Companies, nearly all the past and present Professors of Theology at Oxford and Cambridge, and other Biblical scholars:—

"We, the undersigned, feel it our duty to protest against an edition of the Revised Version without the marginal notes of the Revisers (Brevier 16mo.), which has recently been issued by the University Presses. The marginal notes are an integral part of the Revisers' work, to which the Revisers themselves attach high importance; and to omit them involves a mutilation of their work which does great injustice both to them and to their readers. Since the publication of the complete Revised Version in 1885 we believe that not a single commentary has appeared, especially on books of the Old Testament, in which a preference for many of the marginal readings of the Revised Version has not been expressed; and in view of this great and admitted importance of the Revisers' margins it is to be regretted that the University Presses should have taken what appears to us to be a retrograde step. By publishing, for whatever reason, an edition without these marginal notes, they are withholding from the public a most valuable help to the understanding of the Scriptures. We therefore desire to impress upon all who use the Revised Version that this mutilated edition is one which they should uniformly avoid; and to express the earnest hope that the University Presses will not give currency to editions of the Revised Version without the marginal notes which are an integral part of it. Meanwhile we would urge upon all teachers who use the Revised Version, or prescribe it for examinations, the importance of taking care that editions containing the marginal notes of the Revisers are used by their pupils."

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Cambridge Modern History Atlas. 25s. net.

THE LINDSEY PRESS:—R. L. Stevenson and Henry Drummond: A. Webster. 1d.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.:—British Citizenship: E. B. Sargent. 2s. 6d.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.:—The Golden Bough, Part V., Vols. i. and ii.: J. G. Frazer. 20s. net. The Sacred Shrine: Yrjo Thiru. 14s. net.

MR. JOHN OUSELEY:—Wounds of the World. 3s. 6d. net.

PAMPHLETS.

From the Anglo-Russian Committee: The Points of our Russian Alliance, H. N. Brailsford, 1d. From the British and Foreign Unitarian Association: Religious Changes that I have Seen, W. Wooding, 1d.; God's Part and Ours, C. Gordon Ames, 1d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Edinburgh Review, Review of Theology and Philosophy, Progress.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE BOY AND THE BUTTERFLY.

SUMMER and sunshine. The bees hummed among the flowers, a brook made music, and the trees laughed an answer when their leaves danced in the breeze. All life was singing, singing the song of summer. Bathed in sunshine, luxuriant, golden, nature basked, and one might hear her breathing.

The heat haze glimmered like a gossamer veil across the far-stretching fields, and a Peacock butterfly sailed down the hedgerow to settle on a purple thistle head, where he sat slowly fanning himself with his wings, and spreading them out to the light. A country boy lay on a grassy slope in the hedge watching it. The boy was sunburnt and ragged; an old straw hat was tilted over his forehead; his clothes were much too small, and his boots several sizes too large for him. His sunburnt face shone with good nature, and a happy carelessness only too rare among less fortunate city boys. He was supposed to be scaring, with a pair of wooden clappers, the birds from a neighbouring wheat field which was fast ripening in the August sun, and lay, a rippling sea of gold, on the far side of the hedge.

His first impulse was to sweep the butterfly off his purple throne, capture him, if he could, and pin him in his hat, as he had often served luckless ones before, but whether his good nature restrained him, or the sunshine made him too lazy, or whether a sense of the wonder and beauty of the butterfly's painted wings stayed his hand, I do not know. Suffice to say he sat quite still watching the brightly shining wings, and as he watched, a verse he had heard someone sing, or say, he could not remember when or where, stole in to his mind, and he began to sing to himself,

"I'd be a butterfly
Born in a bower,
Christened in a teapot
And dead in an hour."

He sang it over several times in a sleepy way, and was somehow not at all surprised to hear the butterfly exclaim, "What nonsense! not a word of truth in it from beginning to end. A libel, I assure you, a libel. Christened in a teapot! What is a teapot?" His antennæ quivered with anger, and he flapped his wings faster than ever. (You see he knew nothing of poetic license or he might not have been so angry.) "Born in a bower! What is a bower? I was born in a pigsty, Died in an hour. Rot! I have been flying up and down this hedge for days and days. Do I look dead?"

"Well, you do look rather like a dead leaf when you fold your wings over your head," said the boy.

"Of course I do, I was meant to. How do you suppose I could hide myself from birds and boys and things if I didn't? But what is a teapot?"

"A brown thing with a spout, where mother puts the tea leaves when she makes tea, and keeps the rent when she don't, 'cause she only makes tea in the best teapot when folks comes to see us."

"I don't know anything about tea or rent," said the butterfly, "but I understand leaves. I lived on leaves once, stinging nettle leaves."

"Didn't they sting you?"

"No, they are the nicest leaves in all the forest." Now butterflies being so small, all plants and grasses are the same to them as trees are to us, so the undergrowth really was a forest to him. "I ate nothing else—the memory of those leaves almost makes me wish I were a grub again. But flying in the sunshine is very good, so is the honey out of this thistle, and I am not bothered with having to change my skin so often; besides, the flowers talk to me, and I know what the birds and bees sing about." This being a long speech for a butterfly, he went for a spin to stretch himself, over the hedge, over the golden wheat and high into the blue till the boy could scarcely see him, a little speck in the sky; then he sailed back to his thistle head again. "I suppose you know as little about butterflies as I do about teapots and rent. But if you will be quiet, very quiet, and not take your hat off your head, I will tell you my most wonderful history."

The boy yawned. "I should like to hear it very much," he said. "Tell us."

"I am a Peacock butterfly, and a most beautiful specimen. My cousin, the Red Admiral, and my other cousins the small and large Tortoiseshells (I have heaps of cousins, and relations are such a bore), all think themselves more splendid than I am, but it is not so. Before I was a butterfly I was a chrysalis, and before I was a chrysalis I was a caterpillar, and before I was a caterpillar I was an egg."

"And before you were an egg?" asked the boy.

"I started as an egg. Ma laid me. One must start somewhere, Silly! By the pigsty there is a little wood of nettle growing against the wall. Ma laid me there—the egg that I came from. She laid lots of eggs all over the stinging-nettle leaves; that was last April. Of course, I never knew my mother to speak to, she died before I was hatched." He brushed a tear from his eye with his left front foot, for even butterflies have their troubles.

"How do you know you had a mother if you never saw her?" asked the boy.

"The Humble-bee told me. Don't interrupt." The Humble-bee, who is not at all humble, is the news-teller of the insect world. When the ants go to war he tells of defeats and victories, and sings out the names of the killed, wounded, and missing. When there is no news going he makes some up. He is very like a modern journalist in some ways.

"I was an egg," the butterfly continued, "about fifteen days. I don't know what it was like being an egg. I only remember waking one morning and feeling very, very hungry, and I saw a lot of little black brothers and sisters, who said they were very, very hungry, too. So the first thing we did was to eat the egg-shells we had come from, then we ate the leaves, keeping together in a little herd for company's sake. The leaves were so big, you see, and it was such a long walk back, if the wind shook us off, so we spun a large net of silk around us, and that kept us quite safe. I was always hungry, but I had plenty to eat, and I grew fast. Two or three days, after I came from my egg, I felt ill, and I didn't want to eat—I was terribly frightened, I was afraid I was going to die, or had been stung by an Ichneumon fly, or something, but an elder brother said, 'Oh, you're only going to change your skin, I've changed mine!' 'Well, if you have, you need not be proud about it,' I said."

"Why did you change your skin," the boy asked.

"Because I grew too fast for it, of course. It wouldn't stretch any more. You look as if you would change your skin soon, its much too tight for you."

"Men don't change their skins."

"They do. I saw a man working in this field yesterday, and before he started he changed his skin, but he put his old skin on again. I never did that, a dirty trick I call it. Well, I spun a little carpet on a leaf, and fastened my feet tight. I had little hooks on my feet, and these held me quite firm, so I was able to get a good purchase, when I wanted to pull hard and shuffle out of my old skin. When I had moulted I found that I had grown a beautiful new coat under the old one. I was soon quite well, and very hungry again. I changed my skin four, no, five times after this, I grew so fast. I was black, covered with white specks, and beautifully spikey, so birds did not care for me. I should have tickled their throats too much to please 'em, but they ate some of my brothers, and some of them died when they were changing their skins, and some were stung by Ichneumon flies, but there were always plenty of us left."

"What's a what-do-you-call-it fly?" the boy asked.

"Don't know what an Ichneumon fly is? Its certain you were never a grub. They are, they were, the terror of my life, the terror of every caterpillar's life. They sting us, and stick their tails into us, and lay eggs in us, and the eggs hatch and turn to worms and, oh! they eat our insides out, and if we don't die, we never turn to butterflies, only to a lot of horrid black fly things."

He wept again at the thought of it, and brushed a tear from his eye with his right front foot.

All this time the sun was getting hotter and hotter, and the boy sleeper and sleeper.

The butterfly went for another fly round the fields. This time he met friends, a clouded yellow in a clover field, and two or three little blues, and they all had a lovely game of touch, flying about in a little cluster. When the Peacock came back there was a big fat Humble-bee on the thistle head; this made him very angry, but no insect dares be rude to a Humble-bee, because you never know what stories the Humble-bee (who is not at all humble, really) may tell about you, so the butterfly very politely told the bee that if he flew to the other end of the field he would hear some amazing news. And the Humble-bee bumbled down the hedge.

"After I had changed my skin for the last time, I knew that I must soon change to a chrysalis. I had to find a nice quiet spot, so I left the nettles, and spun a little web beneath the ledge of wood that runs along the top of the door of your mother's pigsty. I fastened myself with silk, and hung by my tail for I do not know how long, nor do I know what happened when I was asleep, but I remember three days ago the warm sunshine woke me, and I broke through my chrysalis shell. At first my wings were small and crumpled, and I felt awkward, but I knew what to do. I crawled to the top of the woodwork and held tight with my feet, and waited for my wings to grow and dry. I could feel them gradually expanding, and every now and then folded them over my head, and stretched them out, and each time I did this I could feel that they were larger and stronger. In about an hour I flew. I can't tell you how jolly it was to fly in the sunshine, play touch with other butterflies, listen to the 'Blue bottles' brass band,' and sip honey from the flowers. But I had a narrow escape on the first day, for a man with a green flag, a thing on the end of a stick, ran after me and flapped it over me, but just as he was going to put me in a horrid stinky bottle he had his flag caught in a bramble and I flew out. I rustled my wings and laughed at him, and he seemed annoyed." The boy lay under the hedge fast asleep with two flies running a steeple chase round his nose, but the butterfly did not notice this, and continued: "When the cold weather comes I shall find a nice quiet warm place to spend the winter in. I think I have found such under the roof of a barn, the wooden beam of which is brownish black like the underside of my wings, so when I fold them over my head, as I always do when I sleep, I shall not be seen, and can sit undisturbed all through the cold weather, and when the warm spring sunshine wakes me I shall fly about again, and find some lady butterflies to talk to, and they will lay eggs on the nettles like Ma did; but I shall not live to see them hatch. I shall have lived nearly a year before I die, if the birds or the man with the green flag thing does not catch me. So you see what nonsense it is to say a butterfly dies in an hour. There is someone coming. Good-bye."

The shadows were longer, and the sunlight more golden when the boy's mother woke him.

"Oh Mother! I've had such a funny dream." He did not know that a butterfly had been talking to him.

His mother was not interested in butterflies, and scolded him for being lazy and late for tea. But the next day he met the man with the "green flag thing," which was a butterfly-net, and the man told him a great deal about butterflies and moths that he had not dreamed or understood. He told him how there were many kinds of butterflies, all different and all beautiful; that they did not all feed on stinging-nettle leaves when caterpillars, but on the leaves of various trees, plants and grasses; that some were very common, and some very rare, and that he would give him pennies if he would collect them and bring them to him, and the boy did. But he never cared to catch a Peacock butterfly because of the one that talked to him when he slept.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MISS ANNA RICHMOND, OF WELLINGTON,
NEW ZEALAND.

A CABLEGRAM has just been received of the passing of one of the most remarkable women in New Zealand. Miss Richmond was one of the daughters of the late Judge Richmond, and had spent most of her life in New Zealand. For nearly 20 years she had been a great invalid, and confined almost entirely to her bed during this long period; still, she did not lose interest in the movements of the world, or in religious and philosophical thought. During her illness she had taught herself Greek, and was conversant with the great philosophical and religious problems of the day. It was my privilege to see her nearly every week, from 1906 to 1910. Her large bedroom was crowded with the best literature. We discussed together many problems bearing on religion. Miss Richmond was familiar with the works of modern writers, such as the two Cairds, William Wallace, R. L. Nettleship, Martineau, James Drummond, Wm. James, Royce, Eucken, Bergson, and others. Her accomplishments in this respect were remarkable, and her intense love for the things of the Spirit made the days and the years pass very happily for her in spite of physical weakness.

She was greatly interested in the Unitarian movement in New Zealand, and her great grief was her inability to attend the services. I look back with great pleasure to the many conversations I had with her, and I feel that her great interest in free religion was such that her name should be chronicled as one of its best friends and interpreters. In the midst of her days she was taken away, but to those who had the privilege of her friendship she will not be forgotten.

W. TUDOR JONES.

THE REV. LINDSEY T. BADCOCK.

ONE after another, old friends and fellow-labourers in the work of the ministry pass from our visible companionship, while death, the great revealer, makes clear to us the faithfulness of their services to the religious principles dear alike to them, and to ourselves. Many a kindly recollection is reawakened by the departure of the friend beneath whose respected name this word of farewell is written. Unassuming goodness, and a fidelity to his duties as a minister of religion, none the less real because so quietly and consistently evinced, marked his lengthened period of ministerial work, which from an early age it was Lindsey Badcock's earnest desire to undertake.

Born at Cranbrook, in Kent, in the year 1837, he attracted the notice of the Rev. W. H. Black, who was an official paleographer to the Record Office, and the minister also of the Seventh Day Baptist Chapel in the East of London; and under Mr. Black's tuition he studied Greek and theology from the year 1856 to 1859. In the last-named year he became Assistant-Minister to the Rev. John Cooper, at Long Sutton, where, after some five years, he took charge of the congregation at Saffron Walden. Here he lived and worked for ten years, when he removed to Tavistock, and was, for twenty years, the trusted minister of the Abbey Chapel. During this time, he was closely associated with works of usefulness carried on in the little Devonshire town; the regard in which he was justly held being evidenced by the fact that he became a co-opted Governor of the New Grammar School.

Leaving Tavistock, he settled as minister of our congregation at Shepton Mallett; and here, too, his character and work found warm appreciation outside the limits of his congregational experience, for he became a member of the local Education Committee. After ten years of faithful duty at Shepton Mallett, Mr. Badcock retired from the active work of the ministry, carrying with him, into his retirement at Great Chesterford, in Essex, the warm regard and kindly remembrance of all who knew his sterling worth and recognised the utterly unselfish spirit which marked him in every phase of his religious life. Such a record reminds us of the good actually done by such lives as these, and no worthier memory can encircle his name than that of a minister who devotedly strove to give expression in his own conduct and conversation to those principles of faith and conduct that he commended to others. He leaves, to mourn his loss, a widow, a son, and two daughters, who are followed in their bereavement by the tender sympathies of the friends who appreciated him.

A. N. B.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

"FLOWERS FARM."

ON Wednesday, July 17, a meeting was held at the Passmore Edwards Settlement by invitation of the Warden in support of the "Flowers Farm" scheme. As is probably well known to many readers of THE INQUIRER, this is an attempt to start something in England on the lines of the extraordinarily successful Junior Republic in America. A farm in Dorset has been given, by the Earl of Sandwich, whose nephew, Mr. George Montagu, is the inspirer of the experiment. It had been hoped to make a beginning in October, but unfortunately Mr. Harold Large, who has been selected as the manager of the "Commonwealth" has recently met with a most serious accident in gallantly trying to stop a runaway horse, and will be unable to do any work for a few months. Mr. Large's experience is so great that the promoters of the scheme feel that it is quite hopeless to try to start without him.

The chair was taken by Mr. J. H. Whitehouse, M.P., who in a few introductory words commended the scheme, not as a certain solution of all the difficulties connected with criminal boys and girls, but as an experiment quite worth making. Mr. George Montagu then briefly described the principle of the Junior Republics, emphasising three points—self-government, wage earning and the mixing of the sexes. He pointed to their motto, "Nothing Without Labour," and showed how in America this had resulted in the most wonderful conversions of natural ingenuity from the wrong direction to the right. After dealing with the American model, he then turned to the new scheme and described what had been done and what was to be done, and appealed to the audience to do anything they could to help. He was followed by Miss Mary Neal, of the Esperance Club, so well known for her work in spreading the revival of the Folk song and Morris dance through the length and breadth of the land. She strongly approved of the experiment, and pointed out how in her own work in boys' and girls' clubs all her success was due to allowing absolute freedom.

The Rev. F. Hankinson, the minister of the Clarence-road Unitarian Church, followed with a description of the George Junior Republic, which he himself had visited. He also gave examples from his own experience of the different results of treating boys as criminals and as reasonable beings. After the meeting the audience were entertained to tea in the Settlement garden.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

PRESENT-DAY PAUPERISM.

MR. JOHN BURNS' visit to Rawtenstall on Saturday last to open a new infirmary for the Haslingden Union provided an opportunity for an interesting review of the present state of pauperism in the United Kingdom. "The injured in our industrial life number every year 300,000, whilst the men alone who meet their death in the army of industry can be numbered by nearly 5,000, and at the end, or at some time of their life, whether they meet with accident and are killed, or whether they are only injured, later on in life, it is the Poor Law institution, the infirmary, the hospital, and in too many cases the asylum, which is the only refuge for those in the army of industry upon whom the lot falls." Mr. Burns adduced some other striking facts which cannot be too frequently or too strongly emphasised; 30 per cent. of the total dependence on the Poor Law is due to sickness and accident alone, while 50 per cent. of the total amount of pauperism in the United Kingdom is due to disease, sickness, accident, or injury. The brighter side of the picture, as one would naturally expect from Mr. Burns' exuberant optimism, was also touched on. Tuberculosis had diminished from 30 to 40 per cent. in ten years in Lancashire alone. In 1849 the total pauperism was 62 per 1,000 of the population, whereas now it stood at 21. There were now not more than 10,000 able-bodied men in all the workhouses of England and Wales, while 90 per cent. of the poor men, women and children dependent on the rates were the halt, the maimed, the sick and blind, the aged, the very young, the widowed and the orphaned, while in the last six years the total pauperism had diminished 16 per cent. In ten years the mortality from phthisis had decreased 15 per cent., from tubercular disease 20 per cent., the general death-rate 20 per cent., and infantile mortality 30 per cent.

* * *

AMERICANS AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

THE party of American social students representing Universities and social institutions from New York to San Francisco to which reference was made in these columns a few weeks ago, arrived in Liverpool last week, and "hustled" with breathless speed through the parts of this little scrap of land which interested it most from a social and industrial point of view. A very broad-minded party, eager to learn as much as they could in their flying visit, and already acquainted, on paper at least, with the best forms of social work in this country, they readily described their impressions of what they had seen. Considering that they came from the most widely differing centres, and that no uniformity of opinion was expected from them save a general interest in social work, the unanimity among them was most striking and most instructive. The cost of living in the States is enormously high as compared with British standards, the high prices being due to the protective tariff, which most of the members of the party would wish to remove. The women students, some of whom were voters in their own States, were very emphatic on this point. In the States where women have the vote, it is on the whole used against political corruption and for candidates of character. Several members of the band, who say that they represent a large and growing host, expressed themselves dissatisfied with the antics of the Presidential candidates, but excepted Prof. Woodrow Wilson, who, they said, represents a type that is now beginning to be felt, and of which more will be heard in the not distant future, when "the boss" and the machine politician lose their present overwhelming power. British social legislation was far in advance of that in the States; there was infinitely more regard for human life, and industrial conditions, especially for the less paid artisan classes, were better here than with them. As regards a future social policy, all the members of the party seemed to be in favour of the policy of "the prevention of destitution," which is remarkable considering the apparently immovable individualist tradition of the Republic.

MINISTERS AND THE NATIONAL INSURANCE ACT.

THE Rev. W. Copeland Bowie writes:—"Several Unitarian ministers, whose salaries are under £160 a year, have been asking me if they come under the provisions of the National Insurance Act. I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the National Health Insurance Commission, inquiring if the recent decision of the High Court covered Unitarians. In reply,

I have been informed that the decision applies in terms to ministers of the United Methodist Church and of the Wesleyan Methodist Church only. The Commissioners could not express a definite opinion as to whether the decision will apply to ministers of the Unitarian body without full particulars of the employment, and they suggested that the best course would be for me to state a case; and on receipt of this statement steps will be taken by the Commissioners to decide the matter with all possible expedition. May I say that I am now complying with the request of the Commissioners; and as soon as their decision reaches me, I will communicate the result to the press."

The secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association asks us to state that Dr. Crothers cannot undertake any further Sunday preaching engagements. He will preach at Gee Cross, July 21; Llandyssul, July 28; Dublin, August 4; Belfast, August 11; Birmingham, August 18 and 25; Glasgow, September 1; Dundee, September 8; Liverpool: (Ullet-road) morning, (Mill-street) afternoon, (Liscard) evening, September 15. The Women's League and the Sunday School Society have arranged for a Devotional Service a Hope-street, Liverpool, on Monday, September 16; Dr. Crothers will also address a Ministers' Meeting in the afternoon, and a Public Meeting in the evening of Tuesday, September 17. He sails for America on Thursday, September 19.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ambleside.—Services have been arranged for the summer season at the Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, Ambleside. The chapel stands by the road side near the house so long occupied by Miss Martineau, and the use of it for the services has again been very kindly given by the Rev. P. M. Higginson. Friends who may be visiting the Lake District will be cordially welcomed. The first service is to be taken on July 28 by the Rev. W. Whitaker, of Manchester.

Ansdell.—A very successful combined meeting of the Manchester branches of the Women's League was held by invitation at Ansdell on Wednesday, July 10. Representatives were present from Gee Cross, Monton Blackley, Gorton, Failsworth, and Stockport, to the number of 70. The day was spent in the open air, and in the evening a meeting was held, presided over by Mrs. Halstead, of Ansdell. Mrs. Dowson, president of the United League, gave an address on the objects of the League, and was followed by Mrs. Golland, of Monton. The meeting closed with thanks to Mrs. Webb, the president, and the other members of the Ansdell branch.

Ballyclare.—On July 10 the Rev. Percival Godding was ordained by the Presbytery of Antrim as minister of the Old Meeting House, Ballyclare. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. D. Davies. After an exposition of Presbyterian principles by the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, of Downpatrick, the new minister made a brief statement of the spirit and aim with which he desired to enter upon his work. The ordination prayer was offered by the Rev. J. Kennedy, of Larne, and the Rev. Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, gave the charge to minister and congregation. He reminded them that the one great thing that mattered was the fact that the congregation existed in order that the Christ spirit should be made more real in all their hearts. If they remembered that they would entertain no doubt that all their activities and endeavours were worth while.

Bolton: Unity Church.—Last Saturday and Sunday Unity Church, Deane-road, celebrated its jubilee, and the fine building which now stands at the bottom of Cannon-street was visited by large congregations. Amongst the numbers were old scholars and worshippers from Russia, Sheffield, Blackburn, Blackpool and New Zealand. An excellent pamphlet has been issued by the officers of the church giving a brief account of its history. It grew out of the need for greater Sunday school accommodation in Bank-street Chapel. The new Sunday school was founded by a band of workers in Hulton-street Schools on July 13, 1862. Divine service was held for the first time in June, 1863. The congregation removed to Commission-street Chapel on February 28, 1868. The need for larger premises led to the removal to Unity Church, Deane-road. In 1893 the new church and school, now Unity Church, were erected at a cost including the freehold site and various extras of £4,778 1s. 3d. In 1902 alterations were made to the schools, and these cost £578 12s. The celebration began on Saturday with a reception, followed by a public meeting. Mr. Bromley, the treasurer, presided over a large gathering, and the speakers included the Revs. R. T. Herford, J. H. Weatherall, J. J. Wright, and H. M. Livens. The Rev. J. A. Lauria, vicar of Emmanuel Church, also spoke, and referred to the good feeling which existed between Unity Church and his own congregation. Other addresses followed by the Rev. E. Morgan, minister of the church, and representatives of the various societies. Special services of commemoration were held on Sunday. During the 50 years of its existence the Church has had eight ministers, viz., Mr. John Entwistle and the Revs. A. Lazenby, J. Bevan, J. J. Wright, J. Crossley, H. M. Livens, W. Harris, and E. Morgan.

Braintree.—Mr. W. H. Tilston writes:—"In September last, when Mr. R. H. Fuller resigned his 'charge' at Braintree, a few friends wished to raise a testimonial to him on his retirement. Circulars were sent out inviting any of his old friends who wished to do so to unite with the congregation in carrying out this desire. These circulars were most generally responded to, and a sum of £110 13s. was raised. This has been informally presented to Mr. Fuller, the formal presentation being deferred till the completion of a further matter, viz., the purchase of some gift for Mr. Fuller to keep in memory of his late congregation. As soon as this is done, it is hoped that arrangements will be made for the formal presentation at Braintree."

Dunedin: New Zealand.—The Rev. W. F. Kennedy writes on June 4:—"It may interest your readers to know that my lectures here have attracted very fair audiences. About 70 were present at the fourth of the series last Sunday evening, and a number of these remained behind to discuss the advisability of organising a Unitarian Church in Dunedin. A resolution to this effect was proposed by Mr. Boenicke (a pioneer member of our Auckland Church), and seconded by Mr. A. W. Colmar (who was baptised at Hope-street Church, Liverpool), and carried. A committee was formed to carry forward the work, and a number of pioneer members put down their names. The services are to be continued in the Trades Hall, and we hope ere long to have an exchange of pulpits with Mr. Chapple of Timaru. There is plenty of work before us, but we intend to press onward and do what we can for the cause of Liberal Religion in this city."

London: Kilburn.—Sunday-school sermons were preached in the Unitarian church last Sunday. The Rev. Bertram Lister, M.A., was the morning preacher, and the Rev. J. A. Pearson was the evening preacher. Though this Sunday school is not yet two years old it has 150 bona-fide scholars on its roll. They sang special hymns at both services in a highly creditable manner. On Wednesday 145 scholars were taken by train to Ruislip, where they spent a most enjoyable day. They were accompanied by over 30 teachers and parents.

Manchester (Lower Mosley-street): Presentation.—The Rev. A. Cobden-Smith, who recently terminated his duties with the Lower Mosley-street Sunday school and congregation, has been presented with books and a purse of gold by the members and friends "as an expression of their appreciation for services rendered as minister and general superintendent from 1901 to 1912, and with sincere wishes for his future happiness and prosperity." The presentation was made by Miss Herford, one of the superintendents.

Stockton.—Some very interesting meetings have been held in connection with the Stockton Unitarian Church during the past fortnight. Encouraged by the success attending the visit of the Unitarian van in May last, the Rev. E. T. Russell was invited to repeat his visit without the van. The open-air services began on Wednesday, July 3, and were continued nightly until the 16th in the spacious High-street of Stockton, the speaking being conducted from a wagonette, which proved to be quite as satisfactory as the van. Mr. Russell addressed large audiences, composed principally of working men, the average attendance being about 700. He was listened to with close attention. Mr. Russell also conducted the services at the Unitarian Church on July 7 and 14, when large congregations assembled. The second Sunday was the 224th anniversary of the church, and the following evening the usual annual conversation was held in the schoolroom, the chair being taken by Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P. The speakers were Mr. Russell, and Miss Lucas of Darlington.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE NATIONAL TRUST.

We are glad to hear from Miss Octavia Hill that excellent progress has been made in raising the sum required for the purchase of Mariners' Hill, the "Kentish hillside View," to which we referred last week. Out of a total of £1,550, £1,225 has been promised. Only £325 more is needed. Who will help? If this scheme makes its appeal specially to southerners our readers in the north have a fine opportunity for showing their generosity by helping to dedicate the Roman Camp and meadows at the head of Windermere to the public for ever. Half the purchase money has been raised, but £2,000 more is required. In an admirable letter to the Manchester Guardian Mr. G. H. Trevelyan appeals for help. "These waterside meadows," he says, "are the most conspicuous place on Windermere, being the head of the long lake. Their preservation from the builder is of interest to all concerned in the beauty of Windermere. If the present scheme of purchase breaks down building will at once proceed." The address of the secretary of the National Trust, to whom contributions for either scheme may be sent is 25, Victoria-street, London, S.W.

LORD COURTNEY.

A character study of Lord Courtney, who has just celebrated his 80th birthday, appeared in the Daily News and Leader last Saturday. It contains a fine tribute to his inflexible moral qualities and describes him as the lay preacher of national righteousness. "Mr. Lehmann," we are reminded, "once likened him to Isaiah, and the parallel is not inappropriate. He is the Isaiah of our day—Isaiah in a canary-coloured waistcoat. He moves through our feverish time with the cloud of prophecy about him—a figure significant and inspiring, firm as a rock, free from all rancour and littleness, speaking the truth and working without thought of reward or praise for all noble ends. When we have lost a certain reverence for such a figure we shall have lost the soul of goodness."

THE DEANSGATE LECTURES.

The Governors of the Congregational Church House, Manchester, in making arrangements for the second series of Deansgate Lectures, have wisely decided to ignore denominational differences. The lectures will be given next autumn and winter, and the general subject will be "Religion and Modern Thought." Among the lecturers who have been invited are the Rev. W. Temple, Sir Henry Jones, Mr. C. G. Montefiore, Principal Carpenter, Canon Rashdall, Dr. James Moffatt and Professor Peake.

THE MARGARET MACDONALD MEMORIAL.

It is announced that the Memorial to the late Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald will take the form of a seat with symbolic sculpture. The London County Council has given a general approval of the design and granted a fine site in Lincoln's Inn Fields, where the seat will be placed. The fund will be closed on October 31. The Hon. Secretary, Mrs. Chitty, will be glad to furnish particulars and receive subscriptions at 51, Campden House-road, Kensington, W.

THE VICTIMS OF LEAD POISONING.

The following appeal which Miss Gertrude M. Tuckwell, chairman of the Potteries' Fund, has sent to the press, speaks for itself:—"The Potteries' Fund was established several years ago to provide for women and girls certified to be suffering from lead-poisoning contracted in the course of their employment in china and earthenware factories the nourishing food and change of air specially needed in such cases, if the sufferer is to have a chance of recovering her health and regaining her working powers. Women's wages in the Potteries are low, and the half-wage payable as compensation to the women infected with plumbism hardly suffices, in a large number of instances, to supply her with the bare necessities of life. Out of a compensation allowance of 5s. a week or less it is impossible that a single penny can be saved towards the fortnight at the sea or in the country which the doctor often declares to be the sufferer's best hope. In past seasons our fund has come to the rescue of these helpless people, and we have frequently had the satisfaction of seeing women whose cases threatened to become chronic restored by nourishing diet and a course of pure air to a condition which allowed them to become again self-supporting. This summer, just as the world in general is beginning to make holiday plans, we find ourselves with an empty treasury and a long waiting list. Contributions should be sent to Miss Wade, 49, Burton Court, Chelsea, S.W., cheques being made payable to the hon. treasurer, Potteries' Fund. As, owing to their poverty, many of the women have no garments fit to travel in, we ask for gifts of clothing, which should be forwarded direct to our visitor, Mrs. Chew, Kilnerdeyne, Rochdale, who will arrange for its distribution."

A PLEA FOR THE BIRDS.

We are interested to see that a poem by Miss Hannah J. Dawtrey, entitled "For Vanity," appears in the Animals' Guardian for July. It is an urgent plea for the mother-birds who are sacrificed, just at the time when their young broods have most need of them, in order that fashionable women may adorn themselves with their plumage. The poem has been translated into Dutch, and published in De Hervorming. The Animals' Guardian also contains a report of the great National Congress for the Protection of Animals, held in Paris at the close of May, when considerable attention was given to a subject which does not specially concern us in England except in so far as we are lovers of animals wherever they are to be found—namely, the use of dogs as beasts of burden. The following resolution, proposed by M. Louis Carpentier, was unanimously adopted:—(1) That the dog, by his disposition and physiological conditions, is not intended as a beast of burden; (2) that the conditions under which the driving of dogs is conducted is nothing more or less than the martyrdom of the animal; (3) that public requirements in no way demand the service of dogs for driving purposes; (4) that the driving of dogs should be completely abolished in France, and that the ruling authorities be requested to confirm this resolution by decisive action.

"THE ANGEL OF THE BATTLEFIELD."

A touching and interesting record of the life of the late Miss Lucy Barton, the "Soldiers' Little Mother" and "The Angel of the Battlefield," as she has been lovingly called in America, appeared in a recent number of the Universalist Leader. Miss Barton died early in April, and it is not too much to say that her death is lamented quite as much, and in as many parts of the world, as was that of Florence Nightingale, with whom her name will always be appropriately linked. The life of this self-sacrificing woman, a soldier's daughter and the friend of soldiers, is one continuous record of devoted service for others, broken at intervals by spells of illness and nervous prostration resulting from overwork. She was at the railroad station in Washington when the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment arrived there after the Baltimore riot, and she assumed the care of forty wounded soldiers. From that time onward she identified herself with the work of relief. After the surrender at Appomattox she was given permission by President Lincoln to attend to the correspondence of relatives of missing prisoners after the exchanges, and established, at her own expense, a Bureau of Missing Men of the Union Army. In the summer of 1865 she went to Andersonville for the purpose of identifying the graves of the Union dead amid circumstances of great difficulty owing to the intense heat and lack of conveniences.

* * *

While on her first trip to Europe for the purpose of rest and recuperation, her attention was called while in Geneva to the Red Cross by its International Committee, and in 1873, when she returned to the United States, after rendering splendid service at the front during the Franco-Prussian War and assisting in relief work in Paris in the closing days of the Commune, she proceeded to urge upon Congress the acceptance of the Geneva Treaty of the Red Cross. Her efforts were crowned with success after years of persistent effort, and when the American Association of the Red Cross was organised Miss Barton was nominated for the presidency by President Garfield, a position she held for twenty years. But her sympathies were not limited to the Army, and it was she who formulated the famous "American Amendment," adding, for America, "relief in national calamities and disasters," as well as "relief in Armies in War." Her last effort was to organise, in connection with this extension of measures of relief, the National First Aid Association of America, founded in 1905.

* * *

In the course of an address delivered at Miss Barton's funeral, her cousin, the Rev. Dr. W. E. Barton, a Congregationalist pastor, of Chicago, said: "Two Massachusetts women, both of whom lived past the age of ninety, exemplified the honourable share of women in the great war for the freedom of slaves. Julia Ward Howe had a vision of the spiritual significance of the conflict, and she gave that vision to inspire the men who fought. She saw it through flame and smoke, but her eyes beheld the glory of the coming of the Lord. Her song put ardour into their fighting. But Clara Barton had another vision. It was a vision of the awful suffering which war brings. Ere the echo of the guns had died down she sought the battle-field, and ministered to the wounded and the dying. . . Into the midst of men who late had been fighting with all the fury of demons, she came like an angel of mercy. When peace returned she sought out the graves of the unknown dead, and brought tidings to those whose mourning had added to it the cruel sorrow of uncertainty. As she had brought the ministry of home to the battlefield, so she brought tidings of the battlefield to the home. Tens of thousands of soldiers and their friends blessed and still bless the name of Clara Barton."

Wimbledon Unitarian Church APPEAL.

The Congregation of the above Church is in need of a Piano for use at Week-day meetings, which it is proposed to hold in the Autumn.

The resources of members are already strained to meet the expenses of services in a hired hall. If some friend or friends in other Churches would give or lend for the season a Piano, it would greatly help the carrying out of a programme of work, which otherwise may have to be abandoned.

Communications should be addressed to Mr. Wm. Lee, B.A., 108, Valley-road, Streatham; or Mr. C. A. Peek, 17, Kingsley-road, South Wimbledon, who will be glad to supply further information.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

NOW READY FOR JULY.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.
A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brookway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama, Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—H. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.
Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.
Heroes of Faith—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.
Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

SURREY.—Home offered Child or Invalid Lady; experienced care, bracing air, good garden. Medical and other recommendations.—M. B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric "Flaxella." Washable, wears for years. Scores of fascinating designs, beautiful shades. Sale Catalogue FREE. Write.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larnie, Ireland.

SALE BARGAINS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen Remnants, big pieces, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larnie, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday July 20, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3657.
NEW SERIES, No. 761.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT

St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.

August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.
NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

WEESEN - on - the - WALLENSE.—In connection with Mr. LUMMIS' Swiss tour, special tickets are issued for the latter part of August (16 to 27), giving ten days at Weesen, at an inclusive charge of nine guineas.—15, Green-street, Cambridge.

The International Visits Association

Founded for the Purpose of Studying the Customs and Institutions of Other Countries.

THE SEVENTH VISIT TO DENMARK.

August 13-23, 1912.

All particulars may be had from the Hon. Sec., Miss F. M. BUTLIN, Old Headington, Oxford.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

"Values of the Faith." By W. SCOTT PALMER. July 20.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

A Plea for Miracle. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services):

July 28.—Rev. VALENTINE D. DAVIS (of Bournemouth).

After July 28, the Hall will be closed until September 22, when the services will be resumed.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden. HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Next Entrance Examination on July 29.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—The Scholarship and Entrance Examinations will be held on July 29, not 19, as previously advertised.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

FRENCH LADY, distinguished singing professor, wishes to spend two or three months au pair in respectable English family, in or near London. Willing to exchange singing lessons against English conversation.—Address, Mrs. LEISERS, 40, rue Albony, Paris 10.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, July 28.

LONDON.

Acton, Cressfield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Port-road, 7,
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11, Mr. H. N. CALEY; 7, Mr. J. W. GALE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. F. K. FREESTON; 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED NICKERSON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Mr. W. RUSSELL.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Hford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Mr. CHARLES PIPER.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, Sunday School Sermons, 11 and 7, Mr. J. G. ALLEN.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. H. W. PERREIS.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11 only, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11 and 6.30, Mr. VICTOR FOX.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A., of Manchester.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. Wood.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. E. RESP.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN Row, 10.45, and (STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. WOOD.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Professor B. W. BACON.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. W. WRIGHT.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Mr. E. WILKES SMITH.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 5s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool,

MARRIAGE.

NOEL—KNOX.—On July 20, at Stratford Unitarian Church, London, by the Revs. John Ellis and J. Arthur Pearson, Alfred Stephen, second son of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Noel, of Woodford, to Susan, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Knox, of Leytonstone.

DEATH.

CHALMERS.—On July 24, at St. John's Mount, Wakefield, Andrew Chalmers, in his 72nd year.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

NURSE COMPANION wanted for an old Lady. Unitarian preferred.—Apply, stating terms, which must be moderate, to Miss FALLOWS, Southfield Villas, Middlesbrough.

SALARY OPTIONAL.—Lady, well connected, requires post Housekeeper, Companion to invalid, etc. Domesticated; nursing; supervise servants.—INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, for the Argentine, experienced Nursery-Governess. Must be fond of children and quiet country life.—For all particulars apply, 30, Sheepcote-road, Harrow.

THE DAUGHTER of a Unitarian Minister would be glad to hear of a situation in which she would take entire charge of infant from the month. In or near the Midlands preferred.—S. S. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	—	1 8
PER HALF-YEAR	—	3 4
PER YEAR	—	6 6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	499
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT:—
The Tides of Devotion	501
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—
Values of the Faith.—II.	501
Maeterlinck's Treasure	502
"London's Underworld"	504

CORRESPONDENCE:—
A Memorial to Coleridge	505
BOOKS AND REVIEWS:—
The Problems of Philosophy	505
A Prophet of Unity	506
Ballads and Poems	507
Vagrom Men	507
Metred Playlets	507
What is Judaism?	507

The Religion of Israel under the Kingdom	508
FOR THE CHILDREN	508
MEMORIAL NOTICE:—
Mrs. Ida Thomson	509
MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—
Southern Unitarian Association	509
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	510
NOTES AND JOTTINGS	511

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It has been a week of deep discouragement for the friends of international peace. In spite of a great deal of genuine public sentiment in favour of a better understanding with Germany and innumerable resolutions at meetings and religious assemblies the situation has evidently hardened. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald described the speeches on the supplementary Naval Estimates in the House of Commons last Monday as portentous. They could hardly have been more so if there were reason to expect war next week. All good citizens must deplore these naval scares which recur with fatal frequency, and no one pretends that our colossal and rapidly increasing expenditure on armaments is really compatible with the best interests of civilisation. It is insane—that is the lip-service which the politician pays to the higher morality—but it is inevitable.

* * *

It is this new note of fatalism in our international politics which is so full of menace, not only to our moral idealism, but also to the peace and safety of the world. If two great peoples, equipped with all the latest machinery of war, are encouraged in the belief that they are being driven by a remorseless Nemesis into conflict, conflict there is likely to be. The new manners of our diplomacy are tending, unfortunately, in the same direction. It has become customary both in Parliament and on public platforms to speak of Germany with a brutal frankness, which does a great deal to encourage mutual dislike, and to create a false image of Germany or England as the enemy in the popular mind. The whole situation is deplorable and degrading. It is not the business of the churches to try to apportion blame. It is for us here in our own country to destroy this canker of fatalism and to cleanse our hearts of every taint of ill-will.

* * *

SEVERAL questions have been asked in the House of Commons about the Putumayo atrocities. From the point of view of our Foreign Office the situation is undoubtedly a very difficult one. The one fact of real importance that has been elicited from Sir Edward Grey is that a salaried British Consul has been appointed at Iquitos and the United States Government has made a similar appointment. This is good so far as it goes, but we hope that it is only the first step in co-operation, possibly in conjunction with Brazil, in the interests of the elementary rights of humanity. A project for a Roman Catholic mission has also received strong support. We should have more hope of good results from this scheme, if it were accompanied by pressure upon the Government of Peru to withdraw the ban upon other forms of missionary effort. We have no kind of animus against Roman Catholics, and we remember the splendid work accomplished by the Jesuit missions, but the history of the Catholic Church among the Latin races of South America gives little ground for confidence unless the proposed mission is staffed and controlled either in Europe or the United States.

* * *

It is not easy for the public to follow the discussion of the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill in Committee. This is due chiefly to the very meagre accounts which appear in the daily press, and partly to the cross-currents of opinion which have manifested themselves owing to the somewhat confused issues presented by the Bill itself. We hope very earnestly that there will be no weakening of public interest in consequence. The first part of the Bill strikes at a very special kind of evil, insidious in its working and appalling in its infamy. Its aim is to erect barriers and make the course of the evil-doer more hazardous.

For this reason it should be pressed forward and welcomed eagerly by all decent citizens, who have been stirred to some consciousness of the enormity of this traffic in vice going on in our midst.

* * *

THERE is, however, some danger that when the Bill becomes law we may allow ourselves to lapse into indifference, glad to dismiss such an unsavoury subject from our minds. Against this danger we think it right to utter an emphatic warning. The evil needs to be attacked far more drastically than this Bill attempts to do. It is the opportunities of gain on a larger scale in distant parts of the world which encourage the scoundrels who carry on this nefarious traffic to run the risks they do. Police vigilance here is not enough. There must be a strong effort to cleanse the Augean stable in the Far East and elsewhere. It is only by depriving these men of the possibility of gain that we shall be able to defeat their cunning.

* * *

OUR meaning will become clear to those of our readers who will undertake the painful duty of reading "The White Slave Market," by Mrs. Archibald Mackirdy and Mr. W. N. Willis. To many people it will be a revelation into abysses of evil of which hitherto they have had no knowledge. The official mind, familiar with the seamy side of life and richly endowed with moral fatalism, will probably accuse it of exaggeration and quixotic sentimentality. We can only say that if a quarter of what it states is true an unanswerable case has been made out for investigation. Reform is not likely to come from within. What is needed is a strong commission of inquiry, sent out with ample powers to collect evidence and formulate recommendations, in all places in the Far East subject to British control where this evil is known to be rife. We do not under-estimate the difficulties or forget the efforts which high-minded men and women have made already; but we must press for some thing more on the lines which we have indicated, and not rest satisfied until we get it.

* * *

THE Summer School of Theology at Oxford, to which we have called attention already in these columns, began last Monday. All denominational differences have been ignored, and the lecturers have been chosen simply on the ground of their competence as thinkers and scholars. The Dean of St. Paul's, in an inaugural address, said that they had come together not to enjoy an intellectual treat, but as Christian men to take part in a solemn act of re-union. He did not believe in a religious Esperanto in which Parthians and Medes, Jews and Proselytes, Cretes and Arabians, should all find themselves at home. It was far better that they should speak their own language and hold their own convictions while listening with respect to the equally definite views of others.

* * *

As a warning against a false kind of syncretism in which religion loses all definiteness of conviction and distinctiveness of colouring, Dr. Inge's words are timely. We believe, however, that we may look forward to something far more positive than the pleasant habit of respecting one another's differences from this growing habit of learning together. Religious differences thrive best in an atmosphere of antagonism or isolation. Religious agreements arise imperceptibly as the fruit of intellectual candour and spiritual sympathy. The New Testament is already a far closer bond of union than it was a few years ago. The orthodox scholar has abandoned many traditional positions as no longer tenable, while the rationalist has almost forgotten his former excursions and alarms in the security of a more central position. In both cases the intellectualism of the past is giving place to a revelation of life, of such vast and momentous significance, that minor critical differences cease to mar the sense of interior unity.

* * *

THE proposed amendments in the Burial Service of the Church of England which were adopted recently by the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury are not likely, we think, to be carried much further, as they create far more difficulties than they solve. It was agreed that it was desirable to have an alternative form of committal, on the ground, as Canon Henson explained, that the existing form in the Burial Service had been felt extensively to be not wholly suitable in certain cases, where it was very difficult, if not impossible, honestly to approach the service with that feeling of confidence and optimism which found expression so frankly in the existing form of committal. It was a form very fitly pronounced over a Christian man, known to be such, and departing in full communion with the Christian Church; but it was not felt to be equally fit in the case of many who had to be buried now by the parish clergy, and whose lives were notoriously not such as to justify in the same degree that kind of optimism.

* * *

THE difficulty, we imagine, applies equally to some other parts of the service, as for instance to the words "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." But what is truly amazing is that it should be considered suitable for the clergy to enter into moral judgment upon the dead, and to decide what degree of disgraceful behaviour or inward perversity requires that the alternative form should be used. This is a kind of post-mortem discipline which even the Roman Catholic Church has never claimed. A funeral is not the occasion either for praise or blame. There is something deeply impressive and significant in the fact that in the equalising presence of death it is the same words, full of immemorial and impersonal associations, which are used for all sorts and conditions of men. The service is in no sense an act of judgment, but one of surrender to the Divine love and mercy, in the blessed hope of forgiveness and the life everlasting.

* * *

THE first international Eugenics Congress was opened in London on Wednesday. Its proceedings will be followed with a good deal of interest and probably with an equal amount of healthy scepticism. So far as the Eugenist confines his attention to improving conditions and to restricting marriage in cases of insanity or clear mental deficiency, he is on common ground with many other reformers. In his effort to subject the whole tangled field of human heredity to the methods of scientific research and classification, he is also a potential benefactor. But at present, the most reasonable attitude towards anything like a practical gospel of Eugenics would seem to be that of the open mind tempered by scepticism. It is far easier to diagnose the evil than to devise a remedy, especially when we are dealing with one of the most masterful passions of human nature. Moreover, if there is to be any social regulation of physical suitability in the case of marriage, it is equally necessary that temperament, moral and intellectual characteristics, and religious and emotional ancestry should also be taken into account. The whole problem then becomes so complicated, and in a sense so artificial, that instinct is likely to be accepted as a safer guide than the expert advice of the doctor or the maxims of the pathologist of emotion.

For the present, Eugenics will probably do its best work on the practical side by strengthening the moral feeling of the community on matters concerning which there is already a large measure of agreement among high-minded men and women.

* * *

UNDER the title "A Veteran Champion of Liberal Christianity," the Christian Commonwealth publishes an interview with the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, who retires this week from the active ministry, honoured and loved by a multitude of friends. In the course of the interview Mr. Wood gives some interesting particulars of his early ministry and of the famous Leicester Conference. He emphasises the fact that when he left the Congregational ministry and went to Birmingham he did not change his views in the slightest particular. "I learned," he says, "that what may be called the 'left wing' of Congregationalists was quite as free and tolerant as Unitarians. Happily, the Unitarian body as a whole has broadened out considerably since then, and insistence on the 'ism' has largely passed away."

* * *

THE death of the Rev. Charles Voysey, which took place last Saturday, has revived memories of one of the most famous ecclesiastical trials of last century. It was in 1870 that his appeal was dismissed by the Privy Council, and he was deprived of his living. The extent and radical nature of Mr. Voysey's heresies made any other decision impossible. It was not a question of intellectual difference upon a few points of doctrine, but of a complete lack of sympathy with any form of the Christian religion. In the circumstances it was difficult for the public to accept him as a martyr, and many broad-minded men, naturally quick to sympathise with persecuted heretics, regretted that he had not resigned voluntarily from a ministry which alike on intellectual and spiritual grounds had become impossible.

* * *

SINCE 1870 Mr. Voysey has been a lonely figure in the religious world. As minister of the Theistic Church he attracted a band of devoted adherents, but he founded no movement. A man of transparent sincerity and warm personal piety, his intellectual prejudices and peculiarities made it difficult for him to co-operate with other people, while his lack of imaginative sympathy with the great Christian forces by which he was surrounded, condemned much of his work to sterility from the beginning, though we should be the last to undervalue the more positive aspects of his teaching, and the help he brought to many souls outside the region of controversy.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE TIDES OF DEVOTION.*

BY THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

IN the passage which I have just read from a sermon of St. Bernard's on Canticles, we have an example of the saint's experience in all ages and in all countries—the experience of accessions and withdrawals of the divine life. We usually think of ourselves as being different from these great and holy men who have burned like pillars of light along the march of the Christian Church. They were specially endowed, we imagine; they had exceptional genius or great talents; they were men of a peculiar refinement of soul and highly wrought nervous organisation. They had a strangely beautiful temperament—subtly sensitive to every breath and mood of the spirit. They were devout by natural disposition, and pious almost in the framing of the body. We think of them perhaps as being like the poet "born and not made"—living harps which the winds of heaven tuned to music, lutes which the breeze blew into praise.

We think of them as being able to realise the Presence of God more vividly than we can do. We read of their outbursts of joy and rapture and can recall only very rare instances of the same high emotions in ourselves. We notice their sadness and their tears at the loss of God when the light of their life was eclipsed and all delight, all sweetness had failed. And here we begin to feel that we ourselves are akin to them in spirit. After all they are not so far removed from us, for such fluctuations of feeling are not unknown to ourselves. We too have experienced, though probably not to the same intensity, the ebbings and flowings, these inward tides of the soul. We share with them these inner seasons of redundant energy and of unconsolable weariness.

And reflecting on the whole of our changing experiences we begin to understand that these things are normal to the child of God. Even in the great saints, these illustrious and elect minds of the Christian Church, even in these the sense of communion with God was frequently broken, always variable, never quite an even fulness of constancy.

And this ought to comfort and encourage us in our own efforts after a closer walk with God. All the men and women who have attained any true excellence in the religious life have persevered through periods of sterility and barrenness, and held on to their high purpose in the memory of brief accessions of refreshment and grace. They have not lived always under a bright and unclouded sky. Often their spirit has been mist-bound and dark, often they have been in the sultry desert; but they have never abandoned their endeavours, because they know that light will arise to dispel the gloom, or in drought the dew and the rain will fall once more on their dryness and quench their thirst. Somehow, sometime, they are quite sure, they will feel again the quickening life of God within their own, making all lovely hopes and ideals grow as the tender herb.

This assurance of an ever-recurring grace, an ever-renewed refreshment, is hard to sustain. When we are too confident of the return of the joy of God, we neglect the preparation of the spirit because we presume too much. When we are not confident enough, when we have no hope that God will give us the desires of our hearts, then, again, we neglect to prepare for Him, and this time because we despair. Somewhere between this presumptuous certainty and this unfaithful despair is a wise mood of expectancy, a belief strong enough to impel us to live a life of disciplined devotion—a conviction powerful enough to prepare in the veriest desert a highway for our God.

And one of my most cheerful hopes about little meetings of this kind during the week is that we shall find in them fresh incentive to Christian living, a new stimulus to daily reading and prayer, a means of opening up closed fountains of worship and adoration, so that the river whose streams make glad the city of God may run eagerly to slake the thirst of the soul. But this means a steady and persistent continuance in the habits of the devotional life. It involves waiting upon God when our mind is weary and our heart is cold. It means praying when the wells of prayer seem dry; it means quiet reading and reflection when such exercises may seem unprofitable and distasteful. Only a great sincerity and a ripe experience can tell us without deception what methods are best and most fruitful for us.

But I am quite sure that some regular habits should be acquired, some stated routine, some ordered practice, whereby we may learn to dismiss the distraction of the world of Time and Space in order to concentrate on the things of Eternity. There is an art of Holy Living, and, like every art, it demands a certain kind of apprenticeship and training. It is not acquired without effort; we can make no headway in it if we are full of sloth and neglect and indifference. We become proficient to the degree of our enthusiasm and our perseverance. We can learn to love God by yielding to his own appeal through what is holy and beautiful and noble in life. His words are audible in the language of preachers and poets. His commandments speak to us in the example of all who have sorrowed and suffered and triumphed in his name. His loveliness is revealed in all pure and lovely things. His joy and beatitude thrill in the experience of all the mystics who have had real communion with Him. His justice, his righteousness, his love, his awful Purity and Holiness, are seen in Christ. The Saviour's outstretched arms upon the Cross and all the cries and agonies of all the martyrs are God's heart-breaking plea with us to live gentle, affectionate, sacrificial lives as children of the Heavenly Father, and as brethren of Jesus.

We must let this appeal of God take captive our imagination. And it will do this if we "think on these things" and in the stillness of our hearts let his Spirit move and quicken us.

Christ, who attended the synagogues and observed the dear ways and hallowed customs of public worship, and was jealous beyond measure of the sanctity of God's temple, yet added the searching precept "Enter into thine inner chamber, and, having shut the door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee." That inner chamber is the holy of holies of the heart—that sacredest Temple of God—which Temple ye are.

There pray, there make intercession for all that is precious to you; pray for a deepening of your own spiritual life, for a revival of the communion of the Church by Christ; for the fellowship gathered here, for our own congregation of worshippers, that they may be blest by ever new joy in the presence of God, for the whole Estate of the Catholic Church, and for the reign of Holiness and of Love upon earth as in Heaven.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

VALUES OF THE FAITH.

II.

FOR Christians, bound in the divine Spirit and by the organic continuity of a life which they share in common with their brethren in all times, the past lives in the present, is illumined by the light of the present, and, in its turn, shapes the present after its own image. The corporate life of Christians is one whole, undivided except by surface cleavage; it is one in the spirit of Christ that permeates all men of good will and cannot be broken into fragments. We enter, therefore, into the mind of that element in the Christian society that is past, according to temporal reckoning, when we pierce the veil of words in the dogma it bequeaths, and find the spiritual, moral, religious meaning that lies behind. We know that our fathers, like ourselves, knew in the life of the Spirit things that can never be uttered. We know that they were driven, by pressure of criticism, opposition and attack, to draw up in stammering human speech statements concerning sublime realities, assertions about God, the mystery of life not only here but beyond the grave, the mystery of communion between the human and divine, the mystery of relation between the self-existing and that which has no life that is not given. All this we know. But if we wish to understand, to enter by sympathetic realisation the minds of those who in past times fought the good fight of the Faith and carried on the good purpose of Christ for all of us, we must try to strip ourselves of our dry intellectualism and enter, in all the fulness of reason, their purpose and desire, the longing of Christian hearts that followed after Christ.

* An address delivered at a Wednesday evening service at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham. At this service it is the custom to read some noble passage from the devotional literature of Christendom.

Religion, after all, like reason, is a vital matter; it offers us a practical solution of the overwhelmingly important concrete problem men themselves present. It is not a philosophic system, nor is it a map of the world to come, or a scientific description of the kingdom of the real which is the kingdom of God. It is not a speculative peering into heavenly secrets or even into the secrets of our human spirit. That is the manner, in their own sphere, of science, of philosophy; it is not the manner of concrete spiritual life, seeking, in an expansion of itself in God, its only good. And we, if we would understand and enter into the mind of the Church, must begin by crediting it with at least a dominant desire to be at one with the mind of its Head and Inspirer, its Master and its Source, for whom spiritual life, the union of man with God, the triumph of love, stood supreme.

Then we shall, perforce, distinguish between the verbal vehicle, the intellectual presuppositions, the prejudices and ignorances that went to make up the temporary theoretic truth of dogma, and its meaning as directed towards a function of growth in life, a vital value. We shall see that it is received by us only on condition of our reading the formulæ that convey it to us, in the language of action practically lived, and of the thought and feeling inseparable from that action.

We shall also distinguish dogma from theology, from every kind of discursive system. If philosophy and science enter into the expression of an article of faith or determine the shaping of its vehicle, we must take them as belonging to the vehicle and to the manner of expression, not to its meaning for faith and life. This is not theoretic; it is religious, an affair of "spirit and life," the outcome of following Christ and of striving after the mind of him who came to seek and save, not to teach theoretic truth stretching beyond our reach. It pleased not God, says St. Ambrose, to save men by means of dialectic. Nor did it please him to save us by a knowledge of the secrets of his nature, or of those of the life to come. Such knowledge, in fact, is not only of the speculative order and without living virtue, but it is wholly beyond our reach and grasp. We could not take it into our human minds. True knowledge, the knowledge that makes the man, is action in the man. And the dogmas of the Church, like the mission of Christ, are best understood as addressed to action and to the service of that thought and feeling which belonged to it. For the rest, they help us not to waste our intellectual powers in wandering astray down paths that Christian experience has shown to lead to confusion of life, even if they seem, as they do sometimes, to permit our advance in clearness of reflexion.

So we find—when we take the mind of Christ for our guide, and test by it the work of those men who are his and are bound to him in bonds of the Spirit that he gives. And if we think of those bonds and of the union we have in them with the Saints, the Doctors, the wise or simple who are our brothers in the faith, we discover that both bonds and union are manifest in a common translation of Christian truth into the width and depth of Christian action. We are separated from Augustine and Thomas, as M. le Roy says, not by intellectual difference, but by the infirmity of our love.

If the work of modern psychology, and criticism of several different orders had not finally ruined a professedly Christian, but really rationalistic, not rational, intellectualism, the trouble which it entails upon the Church, the divisions, the impotence, and the hindrance to religion, must before long have proved it alien from the truth of Christ, incapable of revealing it, indeed a barrier set up against his coming. Concrete reality is thought-action, the life of spirit; the truth of Christ and Christians must be, and is, addressed to this.

The reality conveyed to us dogmatically by the Church appeals to the vital reaction that corresponds to it in ourselves. It is defined for us, shown to us, in the attitude and the conduct that it exacts on our part. We shall know of the "doctrine" in doing the "will" thus indicated in terms of our doing; we shall find the reality thus notified to us in words, if we behave in the manner pointed out; for only so can we enter into spiritual and moral correspondence with it, and discover its truth in our own experience of life.

Theoretical speculation has no such promise. Scientific or theological knowledge has no necessary spiritual and moral value, and it is not the direct concern of religion. We may attain a greater or less approximation to some formula adequate to our own condition of intellect at the moment; but no formula, however good, is commensurate with the truth of spirit and life, truth of concrete God or concrete man. Theoretical speculation, then, must in every Christian society be free, subject only to the conditions that further its freedom, that is, to the regulative criterion afforded by the practical meaning of the dogma itself and the principle of direction it supplies. Beyond this we cannot go. "Knowledge has for its object," said the pseudo-Dionysius, "that which exists, and God is above all existence." And St. Thomas, observes M. le Roy, approves this saying, and explains that God is no matter for scientific study, nor even for the philosophical science of being as being; for, speaking strictly, God is not being, but rather because his own manner of being is to enthrone himself above it, he is its ineffable Principle. "Non enim de Deo capere possumus quid est, sed quid non est, et qualiter alia se habeant ad ipsum."*

Hence our incompetence to express in terms of speculative knowledge what God is. But where speculative knowledge fails, the spirit coming forth in action, the lived and living knowledge of full reason, which is the communication in us both of God's grace and of God himself, succeeds. We credit our fathers and the Church as a whole with the intention and desire to further this knowledge rather than the other, and so to fulfil in themselves and us the mind of Christ.

W. SCOTT PALMER.

MAETERLINCK'S TREASURE.

THE "Treasure of the Lowly" is the supreme undiscovered treasure, that is why Maeterlinck writes of it with a golden pen. Bring the jewel into the market, let the lapidary take it from its mysterious matrix and cut it with his remorseless tools, fit it into a king's crown, a lady's ring, or the cover of a silver box, and somehow the wonder vanishes. The crowd may stare, but no one goes into raptures any more. Somewhere there must be a treasure that leaves the diamond among the flints, and throws ambitions on the wind like scraps of paper.

The poet has felt this all his life; he has walked the roadways of the world, feeling that every breeze that fanned him spoke of it, every face he passed was born of it, trees, birds, and clouds were part of its mystical speech. Life is one brim-filled cup of the holiest wine, and all that a man sees, hears, feels, dreams, is saturated with the aroma of the soul. For it is the soul, with its vague unreasoned impulses, its flashes of inspired memory, which leaves us helpless and thrilled; it is the soul with its profound glooms and glories that is the last treasure, for ever alluring, for ever elusive.

"Little else is worth study," said Browning in the dedication of "Sordello," and incidentally in twenty volumes. Maeterlinck has all the joy of an explorer whenever he comes into the dim regions of the soul; he is as keen as any hunter when he finds the trail of this flying delight. He pursues the thought of the soul's silences, or of the soul's awakening, with a pen that hovers with expectant joy until it strikes the inevitable phrase.

For the song of the soul is worth a man's best; it has given him a new quest of the Holy Grail, and even though the magic chalice always escapes him in the end, he gathers many strange and beautiful flowers by the way. "The Treasure of the Lowly" is the essential Maeterlinck interpreting himself, the subtlest of dramatists unveiling his most hidden self in a master work of subtleties. A quiet visionary, standing at the edge of a twilight world, he makes us look up to him and listen as he tells of formless voices in the air, a god in the sunlight, judgment in the still depths. His symbol should be a forest of birch on the farther border of a lake—bright grey sky, silver stems, feathery spray of branch and leaf, and the calm wide water reflecting it all. It is not a part of the common noisy eager world, there is little of human desire and warmth in it; but rather a vein of sad quietude, contemplating the invisible power of fate, or the stainless purity of a soul, or love that is ethereal, in an atmosphere of silence and dead petals of old roses. A Macbeth would tread rampanly, crushingly, angrily through it all; so would a Town Councillor. Here is a poet with no active interests, only personal, individual, inward reveries.

* Contra Gentiles, lib. 1, cap. xxx.

He regrets the crudities, vulgarisms, crimes of the world; he can hear it rowding in the streets below; but he keeps calmly above it all, forgetting the pavements in the stars. He is watching for the stray gleams of the soul's light, and he is engaged with the gravity of a poet of the modern Low Countries, sensitive to the Belgium of coal and iron and steel, and that other Belgium at its side, the land of slumbering cities. He is a monastic of the new order of Grey Friars, who live in the world, but are always conscious of its perennial strangeness, and who never catch its rude blustering health and camaraderie. So it is possible for him to say that the soul has never yet smiled.

He has told us how he, at one time, looked for the soul's embodiment in the theatre, and failed to find it. He thought that perhaps there he might be shown some of the elementals of spiritual consciousness, the awakenings of the sensitive soul, life in contact with its mysterious beginnings which a busy man has not the leisure to perceive. He thought he might there see humble and every-day life beautified, and lowly duties linked on to divine intentions.

"I came hoping to find how God is at home with me in my little room." And all he found was a man who told him at great length, why he was jealous or why he should kill himself.

The soul, he learnt, would not reveal itself to anyone who is in a hurry, who wants a succession of quick events, who cannot dispense with the actor's "business," and wait quietly. He who does not hold himself free, who is not constantly at the service of the inner impulse, but who sets out with fixed or traditional ideas, can never hope for the sacred revelations of the mystical life. To meet with any measure of the reality that is everywhere he must find a place of moveless quiet, he must deliberately cultivate silence, that he may learn by listening, as a wise physician does. This is perhaps the one thing wanting in the drama; it is too evidently hurried, traditional, and full of incident; the soul has little chance of expression there.

So Maeterlinck turned to the garden of souls, the interior life, to study with his own eyes the work in his own way. It is a poet's spadework, and the result is fruitful enough. For he deals with that which is every man's concern. Men were never so eager to understand themselves, their powers and possibilities, the secret forces of mind and soul as they are to-day. A host of writers since Emerson have marked out routes of clear development; religious movements have arisen with individual spiritual evolution as their gospel; everywhere men are searching for any key that will unlock the secret and teach them the true way and use of life. Half a century since we were materialists; to-day we are mystics. The mystery no longer terrifies, but charms us. It makes life beautiful and rich. It gladdens every walk we take under the open sky, in the fields or in the city. It consecrates human life, so that a mother and child are more fraught with mysterious wonder and delight and love than any book that was ever written. Whitman consecrated his life to teaching us this habit of seeing the eternal in the everyday, and Maeterlinck is one who has learnt the lesson almost in Walt Whitman's accents. It is necessary to say that the Belgian wrote, "There are no hours without miracles and ineffable meanings." To-day many things are leading us back to this primal simplicity of the powerful uneducated persons, the people who see directly without any kind of hindering medium, and to whom the great things are still the secret mysteries, and who are no more blasé in the presence of the fruit-laden tree than in the fury of the winter storm. And when thought in such men turns inward they perceive mysterious depths, as great as any wonders of earth or heaven, more mysterious than will ever be expressed, so that they turn eagerly to the better knowledge of this hidden self from whom they have hitherto lived at so great a distance, those depths of the soul in which the angels dwell."

It is to this intuitive self that Maeterlinck turns, this element in every man, for then he knows he is treating with everlasting realities. If he appeals to the passions, the politics, the history, the literature of the day he is a fugitive penman, a journalist. But if he speaks to the soul he has written on a page of eternity, and his word can never wholly die. "A book," he says, "lives in proportion to the mystical in it. . . Go through all the infirmaries of the soul, where all things come to end their days, and you will never find a single mystical thought." The soul is the breath of immortality. It alone can save a body or a book from decay. When the soul escapes body and book will be dead. This is why we sometimes have a wild, lawless emotion of superiority when listening to some great masterwork on stage or platform. For a moment the soul's eternal being holds sway, asserts itself, sees with the vast vision of a spirit—so that as we listened there seemed something still unexpressed, infinitely more mysterious and beautiful. For that moment the Hallelujah Chorus was a thing we might criticise, product of brass and reed and voice that could be tabulated: we were (in the soul's realm) listening to celestial music and angelic choirs. For that moment the Hamlet on the stage was only a mournful, unimpressing hint of the real waves of passionate confusion rolling in the wild seas of any darkly troubled soul. We come back afterwards to a reverence for human achievement, but we have had a brief glimpse of the immeasurable sweep of the soul's wings.

More than once does Maeterlinck make you feel this limitless power in the soul.

No wall can enclose it. Time and space are nothing to it. Some ancient word springs out to meet you, hot and living from the prophet's page, and a hidden experience or thought of your own is laid bare.

You had kept it a secret, never really wording it for yourself. But some Plato or Job, Buddha or John, can make your cheek flush with surprise at this identity of spiritual experience, this universality of mystical speech, which shows, in a flash, the long procession of those who make that pilgrimage of the soul which is endless, save in God Himself. All ages, countries, races, are akin here. The soul is the same in philosopher and jester, and the revelations of ancient Hindu or mediæval saint, of Plato or of Swedenborg, are crystals of equal lucidity. The law of spiritual Unity or affinity has strange witness borne to it in the gain which sage and peasant alike unconsciously enjoy through their spiritual receptivity. The perceptions and aspirations of the ancient watchers of the soul have filtered down through generations of devout and contemplative spirits till they enter the men of to-day, and, unknown to them, give thought and language and life that could not otherwise have been.

The hidden soul is full of surprises. The outward man, whom Maeterlinck saw on the stage, is not: he is always calculable: you could map out the steps of his development, and tabulate them for reference and comparison. Any handbook on the craft of writing plays will give you a catalogue of characters and plots to be used. The drama has preserved the traditions of the Flood, so that one recognises ancestors, and all the well-worn amours and jealousies, madness and vengeance, sword and cloak.

"It is all triumphant art: but art in obedience to law." But the soul opens new and unexpected windows; her suggestions are messages from an unsounded ocean. The rapture with which one hears Beethoven is something too heavy with mystery for any words to clothe and embody: whole volumes of criticism and study will never equal the ecstasy that arose in us as we listened to the involved splendours of the deaf master. Whence rose the pretty fancy that gives life to some gem of Japanese art, and fills the cherry-blossomed garden of Hiroshige or the river scene of Hokusai with the charm of a strange desire? Why does a swift fresh judgment sometimes knock at the doors of our house of justice, making our moral code seem harsh and false? What is this "higher conscience" which plays ducks and drakes with established morality, unless it is one of the surprises of the soul? "Everywhere," says Maeterlinck, "on the edge of the common life, one finds ripples of another life that one cannot explain. . . The soul is nearing the surface." For centuries she seemed to lie buried, despised or hated if not forgotten. Then you get the clear-cut soulless glories of Greek or Roman art, or the vapid bombast of the eighteenth century. Suddenly, with no prelude, she floats up into the sunlight in some peasant's life, and we find a gift of spiritual insight that was wanting in Shakespeare or Calvin. She is the very emblem of mystery, this soul of ours. It is not at all sure that she can be touched or stained or injured by evil and wrong. The mystics have always suffered from misinterpretation of this thought of theirs. Crass materialists have charged them with sinning wilfully since the soul remained untainted. To be a mystic is to be awake to the beauty, wonder, and glory of the soul, which means that you are triple armed against sin; you would not willingly ally your soul with a mind that cherished evil thoughts, or a body the engine of brutality.

Yet you might conceive, as Maeterlinck certainly does, of the pristine purity of the soul that dwells in a body which often errs, and is companioned with a mind often clouded with selfish or unworthy thoughts, and keeps her purity unsullied. He imagines the soul becoming visible all at once, and coming unveiled into the midst of her assembled sisters, laden with her most secret thoughts, and followed by all the mysterious acts of her life—acts that nothing could explain. She would ignore them, for they have never touched her: they have been committed a thousand leagues from her throne; and she would pass confidently through the midst of the crowd, bearing in her eyes the transparent smile of a child. This pure divinity in us, which is the seer, of course melts in our hands when we try to weigh and analyse it. To define is to be the enemy of the soul. We can gain little by planned research. "We may think we have dived to the very depths, but we return to find that the drop of water on our finger tips is in no way like the sea whence it came." The best that we can do is to go sometimes into the quiet lanes of life, and there, remote from the throbbing city, keep a tryst with the soul. She may reveal herself then, speaking in low tones. If we listen as the lowly treasure seeker should, we shall hear a word of life; if we are careless, and miss that word, we shall never hear it again. The soul does not seem to repeat herself. Her promptings are all unique, and it is the mark of what we call genius that it listens to the once uttered words of the soul, knowing that the moment will no more return than this evening's royal sunset. This may be why Maeterlinck says of woman that she is much nearer God, and surrenders herself with less reserve than man to the pure action of mystery; for it is women who are more generally obedient to impulses that we speak of as instinct. "Woman never forgets the way to God. Whether I surprise her in wealth or poverty, ignorance or wisdom, shame or glory, I have but to utter a word that truly comes from the virgin depths of the soul, and she immediately retraces the mysterious paths that were never out of sight, and, without hesitation, quietly brings from the inexhaustible stores of love some word or look or sign as pure as my own. Her soul is always within call: she is ready, day and night, to answer the highest demands of another soul, and the ransom of the poorest is as dear as that of queens. . . . She has a lamp that we have lost. . . . Women have kept the mystical sense alive."

Our one hope and duty is to be observant, waiting for those white moments when heaven opens in silence; and it opens continually.

This is Maeterlinck's watchword. A catastrophe will not necessarily be more illuminating than a kiss. Vastness and terror, tragedy and woe, may be the language of God. But the wise man does not stop at this. He sees the Divine everywhere: the horizon of the sea is but the symbol of earth's union with heaven. The mystic does not need an earthquake or a drowning child, a false lover or a bloody battle, to awaken and stir his soul. It is always as ready to respond to a thought, an emotion, a generous word, a kindly greeting, a woman's smile, the sower's swinging curves. The gentlest movement, the lightest glance or word, is the equal of the awful and mighty; and the soul's depths are stirred as much by the fall of a drop of water as of that of a lover or of an empire. Indeed, the soul often draws her fullest draughts from frailest springs. An old man sits in the evening before the fire, his lamp quietly burning on the table beside him, silence trembling everywhere about him, and the vision of life's profoundest mystery may be at hand, so that he may feel the whole of existence in every atom, the music of the storms of heaven in the wind in his chimney; his fire's flicker and lamp's murmur, one with the burning of the sun; his arm leaning on the table, which the whole earth supports, assuring him of the universe intent on the security of each minute part. It is the vision of the soul. It goes deeper than any formal theology or philosophy, and is infinitely more revealing than the thunders of Othello and all the tragedies ever written. Some little things are priceless. No price is quoted on the market for a child's kiss.

Maeterlinck's is a practical mind: he would lead us into these mysterious realms only to bring us into the reality that enriches life. Descend into the profundities of spiritual consciousness, and so become more immediately responsive to the soul's promptings. . . . It is the unfathomed in us that is alone of surpassing interest. My nearest friend must have some territory reserved from me. "Whatever is known becomes uninteresting: we are nothing save mystery." Consequently the more my soul-self enters into my life and work, the more will they both grow in delight for me, till at last every hour, every moment, is of its own unique wonder, and discovers for me new beauties and constant surprises in that mere surface of life, its accidents, possessions and events, which once I took for life itself. To attain to this means patience, and deliberate preparation. There must be conscious purpose and act in our approach to the life of the soul in God, a recognition of the Divine Sublimity, Purity, Love. This is the atmosphere of mystical communion. In the phrase of Plotinus, "we must steep ourselves in the depths of divinity." Then, to conclude in Maeterlinck's own words, "there will come a day when the heaven opens of itself, and it is nearly always from that moment that you may date the true spiritual personality of the man."

EDGAR DAPLYN.

"LONDON'S UNDERWORLD."*

THE nether deeps of London life are being painfully explored and the secrets of their dark recesses revealed. Sure-footed guides there are who have penetrated into the dark purlieus of the vilest slums, not to execute judgment, but to bring mercy; not to punish, but to understand; not to make cold inquisition, but to bring back to the world of privilege and opportunity a faithful chronicle of grim realities from the abyss below. Mr. Holmes' five and twenty years' service as a police court missionary, the intimate contact that he has had with the most varied types of outcast and unfortunate, his extraordinary shrewdness combined with no less extraordinary sympathy constitute him the best of guides and the most reliable of reporters. He has been the universally consulted adviser of the magistrate, yet none the less the staunch advocate of the accused. Speaking of a famous chess-player, whose life was a tragedy of misdirection, and who had come to him bruised and battered from some mêlée, he says, in a sentence which epitomises his whole attitude to the pieces of broken humanity to whom he has dedicated his life, "he was in trouble, so we became friends." Indeed, Mr. Holmes tells his readers, and many social workers will emphatically agree with him, that these unfortunate specimens were more interesting than merely respectable people and infinitely more interesting than some good people. And so it has come to pass that his overflowing humanity has led him into various breaches of convention which would ban him from all "respectable" society—even into playing pitch and toss with New York lads near the Bowery, and (horribile dictu) on a Sunday morning. Yet it is just this capacity to enter into the feelings of other mortals, which makes his indictment of society so telling and so unanswerable—and an indictment his book is from the first page to the last, though there is not a sour, harsh, nor, we believe, unjust word in it.

* London's Underworld. By Thos. Holmes. London: J. M. Dent & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

How the material is found for our police courts and gaols may be seen in the overwork and bad feeding of so many school-children, the sweating of women ("there are at least 50,000 women in London whose earnings do not exceed three halfpence per hour"), and the casualty of adult male labour. The breakdown of the Poor Law system as we have known it; the failure of private charity, with its soup and its shelters, to stem the tide of destitution; the grotesque ineffectiveness of our prison system, its failure to discriminate between the vicious and the merely unfortunate, and its utter incapacity to deter, much less to reform, the criminal—all these are inexorably set down in Mr. Holmes' moving pages. Speaking of the surroundings amid which the children of the London poor grow to maturity, he says, in words which cannot be refuted, "Though here and there one and another rise superior to environment and conditions, the great mass are robbed of the full stature of their bodies, of their health, their brain-power, and their moral life."

The last chapter embodying Mr. Holmes' own suggestions is the most valuable in a book which should be read by all legislators, social workers, and by the clergy and ministers of all denominations whose social work is often so ill-directed, ineffective, and irrelevant. Mr. Holmes, like many other level-headed people, feels strongly that it is time, after twenty years' experience of them, to try to arrive at a just estimate of what, from the social point of view, has actually been accomplished by those hugely expensive organisations, the Salvation Army and the Church Army. What social evils have they destroyed? What causes of social distress have they removed? What number of people have they permanently "elevated" as a result of their colossal outlay? Their sincerity is not called in question, but their methods and all similar methods have been tried at the bar of experience and been proved to be a pitiable failure. Mr. Holmes, therefore, being of this mind, recommends that the Poor Law system should be recast. "Charity must be divorced from religion. Philanthropic and semi-religious organisations must be separated from their commercial instincts and commercial greed. The workhouse, the prison, the Church Army and the Salvation Army's shelters and labour homes must no longer form the circle round which so many hopelessly wander. No man or set of men must be considered the saviour of the poor. . . Above all, the desire to prevent, rather than the desire to restore, must be the aim of the organisation which should embrace every parish in our land." As Mr. Holmes is neither doctrinaire nor sentimentalist, but one of the shrewdest and sanest of our social workers, his suggestions, springing from an unsurpassed experience and a unique balance of head and heart, ought to be weighed with the most earnest attention.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

A MEMORIAL TO COLERIDGE.

SIR,—May I ask you to be good enough to allow me the use of your columns to say that we are proposing to place a memorial in our church at Shrewsbury to Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who preached here for several Sundays in 1798 with the view of becoming the settled minister of the congregation. It has been decided to make it not merely a local matter, but to give all who are interested in the idea of commemorating the poet, philosopher, and preacher's connection with the Shrewsbury congregation, an opportunity of associating themselves with the object. And we therefore invite any of your readers who are or have been connected with Shrewsbury, as well as the admirers of Coleridge generally, to join with us in carrying out the proposal.

The form of the memorial which it is thought would be most fitting is that of a brass tablet, fitted to the oak panelling by the pulpit, with, if possible, a medallion head of the poet, and the inscription below. The dark oak lends itself to this extremely well, and forms a very handsome setting for the brass.

I may say that Lord Coleridge is very much interested in the suggestion, and has expressed his willingness to co-operate in any manner that may be thought desirable. Indeed it is mainly owing to a remark of Lord Coleridge—when paying a visit some time ago to our church—upon the absence of any memorial to "S. T. C." that the matter has been taken up. I shall be most pleased to receive and acknowledge any subscriptions that your readers may send to me.—Yours, &c.

W. VICKERY.

Worlebury, Shrewsbury, July 22.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE PROBLEMS OF PHILOSOPHY.

The Problems of Philosophy. By the Hon. Bertrand Russell. (Home University Library.) London: Williams & Norgate, 1s.

It is interesting and significant that the editors of the Home University Library should have thought it worth while to include in their series a book on the problems of philosophy. They must believe that there is a sufficient popular interest in the Scientia divina to warrant such a publication; and this is surely encouraging, especially to those who believe that a measure of philosophy is no bad thing. Yet to deal with the problems of philosophy in the space of some two hundred and fifty small pages was probably hardly the kind of task the editors felt satisfaction in offering to a professional philosopher. They were abundantly fortunate in securing the services for the task of so gifted a thinker and writer as Mr. Bertrand Russell, whose contributions to general philosophical thinking, though perhaps not so well known, are equal in value to his gifts to mathematical science. Considering the amazing difficulty of the undertaking, it is only bare truth to say, that Mr. Russell has achieved a striking success; he has produced a book which, though it can be purchased anywhere for a shilling, deserves to take high rank with the best English writing on philosophy at any time. And we say this even though we have a hankering sense that Mr. Russell's book is more of an introduction to the writer's own pet philosophical views than to the problems of philosophy in general. Probably that is quite unavoidable. After all, there is only one problem in philosophy; in the transcendental, ultimate sense, her one problem, as Hegel was never weary of urging, is God. She would read the riddle of the whole. True, there are preliminary problems, and preliminary questions; these, to a large extent, she hands over to science and to the effort to compensate by adequacy of description for lack of explanation. Philosophy herself is left with her final problem and with two or three preliminary questions.

According to Mr. Russell, the problems of philosophy, the forms, let us say, of her final problem, are two—how we know, and what we know. It is certainly hard to see how anyone is going to write an "introduction" to these problems of philosophy and not let the bias of his own particular solutions appear; so Mr. Russell can plead reasonable excuse. The bias does appear. It is evident in the pointedly empirical method and in the obvious subordination of metaphysics to epistemology. This kind of bias is not of course peculiar to Mr. Russell; it is typical of English philosophical thinking generally. But it has quite unfortunate consequences. For example, it leads even Mr. Russell to what can only be described as a superficial treatment of Idealism; it is doubtful whether any idealist would accept Mr. Russell's definition of Idealism as "the doctrine that whatever exists, or at any rate whatever can be known to exist, must be in some sense mental." The criticism of Idealism is equally lacking in adequacy. The fundamental contention of Idealism is that Reality is essentially spiritual, akin to consciousness, of the same order as thought and idea. This is a definitely ontological proposition. Mr. Russell reduces it, wilfully, to an epistemological one, and then makes it read to the effect that "we can never truly judge that something with which we are not acquainted exists." This, says Mr. Russell, is palpably false; we have not the "honour to be acquainted with the Emperor of China," but we truly "judge that he exists." Thus does Idealism collapse! We can only murmur, alas for the rarity of philosophical charity!

However, Mr. Russell uses this criticism of Idealism as a convenient peg whereon to place some interesting observations concerning "knowledge by acquaintance" and "knowledge by description," a distinction familiar to philosophy in various other disguises. Some things we know, let us say, immediately; other things we know mediately, by inference and judgment, by a process from the immediately known. Among the things of which we have "knowledge by acquaintance" Mr. Russell boldly places "universals," and warns us to be on our guard against the supposition "that whatever we can be acquainted with must be something particular and existent." There is no doubt that this notion of the immediateness of our knowledge of universals is of prime importance for Mr. Russell, an importance only fully revealed when we come later on to his view of relations. Relations, those mysterious links in the order of existence which, in language, we represent by verbs and by words like "to," "with," "and," "from," and so on, are, for Mr. Russell, a peculiar kind of universals of which we are immediately aware, and of which, furthermore, we can be aware without being aware at the same time of any terms related. There is, if we may say so, "such a thing," as "withness" of which we can be directly and immediately aware; "withness" dwells in the world of universals which Mr. Russell calls the "world of being," as distinct from the world of existence; from that world we charm it to our own when we need "knowledge by description."

But before we reached this point in the book we confess that we were smitten with some wonder; we suddenly had a vision of the man unlearned in philosophy, expending his shilling, retiring to his fireside and his crying babe, and boldly, despite all hindrances, commencing his study of philosophy under Mr. Russell's guidance. For the first few chapters all might go well. He would probably grasp, at least dimly, the distinction between "appearance" and "reality"; he might be shaken from some of his ordinary notions as to the validity of the communications made to us by our senses; he might even see the need for asking whether there is "anything beyond sense-data," and if so what its nature can be; but we cannot help thinking that chapters five to eleven inclusive, containing Mr. Russell's interesting and important views on induction, universals, and the nature of relations, would be enough to deter the student from all further study. We can see him throwing down this manual in despair, and we have to urge again that what Mr. Russell is doing is not discussing the problems of philosophy in general, but providing competent philosophers with an excellent introduction to his own pet philosophy, and to Realism, Platonic and otherwise, in general. This is undoubtedly a labour of great value, but it is not what one might expect from the title of the book. Personally we do not complain; but we do wonder what the man untrained in philosophy would make of it all.

Following on the introduction to his own philosophy, Mr. Russell has two interesting chapters on "Truth and Falsehood" and "Knowledge and Error." The notion of truth here outlined is opposed to that held by Pragmatism; truth is regarded as a property of beliefs, but it is a property which does not, as the Pragmatists would have it, depend on belief: the mind, or the will, does not make propositions true by believing them, even if the results of belief are satisfactory; on the contrary, truth is a property dependent wholly upon the relation of beliefs to outside things. Truth or falsehood resides in the object about which the belief is held: in other words, truth is objective, systematic. Idealists would agree in so far forth, but would differ from Mr. Russell in the further delineation of that objective system on which truth depends and to which it belongs. But these are peculiarly technical, elusive, and altogether unsettled problems. With the discussion of "knowledge and error" we get back again more into the world of the plain man. In our intellectual relations with the world about us we may be in one of three conditions: we may be in a state of knowledge, in a state of error, or in a condition of "probable opinion." The only certain knowledge possessed by us is immediate and intuitive; and any state of ours that can be called a state of knowledge proper rests ultimately on what is immediate and intuitive; such states are comparatively rare, perfect knowledge demanding perfect intuition, which we human creatures do not possess. Our most usual condition is that of probable opinion: we proceed always at the risk of being wrong. And with this conclusion we heartily agree. One of the most obvious results of the sincere study of philosophy is to bring home to us the number and extent of the things we do not know. We are introduced into the vast realm of "opinion," in which dogmatism is out of place, in which only toleration and charity can move freely, and in which perhaps, the power of understanding must give way to the power of sympathy and love. And this, in a way, is what Mr. Russell himself says in his concluding chapter, the finest in the book, on "the value of philosophy." Philosophy achieves no positive results; she raises problems which she cannot solve, she evokes questions which she cannot answer, to many she seems utterly useless. But, bring to her service a sincere and loving spirit, and her reward is great and sure. She is a hard mistress, but the joy of her, when once attained, is beyond price. She lifts us above all that is narrow and vain and merely personal; she breaks the hard crust of intolerant dogma with which most of our intellectual life is surrounded; she bids us breathe a freer air and purer atmosphere; above all, she can and does provide grave consolation by giving us at least an approach to the vision of God, and she may even lead us to the inmost shrine where contemplation gives place to worship and intellectual curiosity is sunk in adoration and in love. The genuine philosophical spirit is infinitely valuable, and we can gratefully affirm that it is this spirit, beyond all else, beyond all disputable and doubtful matter, that we find in Mr. Russell's book, and that, above all, justifies its appearance.

S. M.

A PROPHET OF UNITY.

The Great Initiates. By Edouard Schuré. Translated by Fred Rothwell, B.A. London: Wm. Rider & Son, Ltd. Two vols. 7s. 6d. net.

"HOWEVER men approach Me," says the Blessed Lord in the Bhagavad-gītā, that beautiful portion of the Mahābhārata which enshrines the teaching of Krishna, "However men approach Me, even so do I welcome them, for the path men take from every side is Mine." The facts which we are able to glean after 3,000 years about the life of this "first of the Messiahs" may well seem problematical, but these words fall tenderly on the ears of men who dream of an ultimate synthesis of the religions of the world, based on the unity of mankind as children of God. Truth is greater than all the forms through which it manifests itself, and the Light which lighteth every man coming into the world would be undimmed though the sun and the stars were darkened. Nothing shows this more clearly than the philosophical tendencies of the present time. We are witnessing a strong reaction against the negative attitude of the rationalists and "freethinkers" of twenty or thirty years ago, and the tremendous strides which have been made in experimental psychology, the complete repudiation by eminent men of science of the materialistic conception of the universe, and the revivifying effect of teachers like Bergson upon the experienced and mature no less than upon young and ardent minds, are signs of a spiritual renaissance which must inevitably create a new race of seers and mystics. The first results of this awakening will be a revaluation of many ancient doctrines which we discarded all too lightly when we first began to imbibed the teachings of Darwin, and discovered certain discrepancies in the Bible records. Dogmas are, indeed, harder to kill than we once thought, not because they are born of crude superstition which can only be overcome when ignorance is destroyed, but because they are the expressions, however imperfect, of sublime and fundamental truths which have never been understood save by great thinkers and sages who realised that they could not be comprehended by the multitude. "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven," said Jesus to his disciples, "but to them it is not given. . . . Therefore speak I to them in parables; because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand." Mr. Bernard Shaw once deeply shocked an audience of agnostics who did not realise that the arch-sceptic is often more mystical than the unquestioning believer, by defending the doctrine of the Trinity and the Immaculate Conception. He did not put it in those words—indeed, he said he was no more satisfied with three persons in one than Shelley was satisfied with three primary colours in the rainbow. But he showed that he had clearly marked the limitations of the rationalist, who seems bent on turning the mystery of birth, growth, death, and the resurrection from the dead into a neat little formula which common sense endorses and a child can understand.

Clearly we have not advanced as far as we thought, although each new phase of human experience serves to throw fresh light on the path laid down for the race to tread. Some of us may be justified, therefore, in thinking of life as a gradual unfolding of consciousness from a germ in which knowledge and power and the memory of a divine origin were latent from the first, and that, although each successive development in thought looks like a new discovery, truth is the same to-day as it was in the time of Plato or Pythagoras—the same as it was in that mythic period, shrouded in the twilight of antiquity, to which the Sphinx of Gizeh bears testimony still. What we have to do is to lift, each for himself and according to his capacity, a corner of the veil of Isis, and penetrate into the universal mystery which we have only pushed a little further back when we have discredited a few legends or thrown doubt on the authenticity of certain sayings full of esoteric meaning to which we have temporarily lost the key. And in doing so we shall find much help in books like "The Great Initiates" in which M. Schuré has attempted to re-interpret for us, sympathetically and yet critically, the profound and secret wisdom of the ancients, in which searchers after truth were instructed by the priests of Osiris or the hierophants of Eleusis, on the banks of the Ganges or under the shadow of Mount Sinai. It is the work of a man who has reached that stage in mental and spiritual evolution attained by comparatively few, for whom the question is not, which form of a particular religion shall triumph in the future; nor yet, which religion is destined to reign finally throughout the world; but, how can the eternal truths unchanging from age to age, and underlying all religious systems, which we find imbedded in the Vedic hymns and Upanishads, no less than in the Book of the Dead or the Hebrew Scriptures, be harmonised into a universal faith the realisation of which shall unite all the races of mankind in the bonds of peace and brotherhood? "The Great Initiates" has gone through twenty-four editions in France, and is to be followed by a work entitled "L'Evolution divine: Du Sphinx au Christ," which will form a sequel to the two volumes under review. Along the line which M. Schuré has taken many will undoubtedly go in the future, accomplishing for the great religious systems of the world what Modernism has done for the Catholic faith. The Modernists have, indeed, made the task of such investigators and reconcilers far easier than it would otherwise have been, for they have supplied them with irrefutable arguments in defence of every effort to spread their activities over a wider field. That vital and energising spirit which receives inspiration from art, science, and philosophy, expressing itself in terms of modern thought and yet fast-rooted in the traditions and experience of the past—how is it ever to be restricted in its scope, or prevented from sweeping into its net the sublime religious teachings and esoteric wisdom of the East, together with the democratic ideals and newer conceptions of spiritual freedom that are quickening the pulses of Europe?

BALLADS AND POEMS.

Drake in California. By Herman Scheffauer. London: A. C. Fifield. 2s. 6d. net.

The Ballad of Two Great Cities. By Harold Williams. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

The Morning's Cup. By C. H. Frogley. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

Vale: A Book of Verse. By Leonard Inkster. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

THERE is something kindling about Mr. Scheffauer's verse which seems to proceed from the depths of a soul stirred by the "cosmic urge"—a Nietzschean vehemence and power which yet do not sweep him out beyond the reach of pity and love. In a former book he dealt exclusively with the titanic emotions, the recurrent tides of birth and death which affect the evolution of stars and planets; in the present volume he returns to the world of men and those strong elemental passions which are still only partly tamed, and which break out every now and then with fresh force and new incentives. Some of these ballads have a force and swing which "gets home" in an unmistakable manner, and the "Ballad of the Battlefield" is a terrible indictment of the war-maker. "I gat me to the battle with many," says one of the "three terrible things" that speak in this poem:

"I gat me to the battle with many—
and many did die,

Whiles they who scribble with pens saw no wounds and heard no cry.

Where the sword or the shot slays one,
the pen slays ninety-and-nine;

In the sight of men I was slain by the pen, father and mother mine."

Mr. Harold Williams takes up the burden of the modern city, and is struck—in the characteristic modern manner—with its contrasts of poverty and wealth. He achieves more success, however, with such poems as "The Immutable" and "The Buddha of Kamakura," which breathe a quiet spirit of hope and brave acceptance of life's ills, and with some dainty verses on well-worn themes that have still a perennial fascination. Mr. Frogley has written some charming lines about children in a book of pleasant verses, which is, perhaps, more concerned with birds and flowers and the murmur of streams than it would have been if he had not remonstrated so effectually with his "muse" for filling his every tuneful hour "with ethic preaching"—a bad habit which she instantly dropped. In a poem called "Inspiration" he says:

"Tax not the poet with his verse
A plainer meaning to rehearse,
For no man knows the full intent—
The utmost that his word has meant."

We recall these words with a sense of relief after reading some of the rather obscure stanzas of Mr. Leonard Inkster, the meaning of which does not leap to the eye immediately. Mr. Inkster can, however, give us simple and poignant lines, and the note of pathos, too, as in "The Journalist's Chant," or a poem like "Portraits," which apostrophises a grown-up "child," who

"trips down time among A crowd of smiles, because 'tis tears or smiles;
And one must keep from tears, because the miles
Of life are hard, and without laugh and song
The days too long."

VAGROM MEN. By Alfred T. Story. London: Duckworth & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

THERE is a fragrance about Mr. Story's pleasant studies of human nature, as if sprigs of rosemary and lavender had been pressed between the pages. He has charming things to tell us about old inns and penny gaffs, herb-gatherers and book-sellers, roadside vagrants and the inmates of almshouses sketched with a delicacy and tenderness that are quite out of keeping with these bustling days of self-realisation and the strenuous life. He is something of a sentimentalist, but not in the least prudish or "Miss Nancy-ish," as he says a small town is apt to be if it is not a market town. And there is a hint of ancient as well as modern philosophy in his snapshot of the naughty cousin, who had the artistic temperament which is "about equal parts angel and devil." Marius was only fifteen, "but it would be a mistake to regard him simply as a youth of fifteen. The angelic part of him was barely eight, the dæmonic had leapt to at least twenty." We might, if space permitted, go on to quote from "The Puppet Show," with its symbolical touches; or make the reader acquainted with old Ambrose L— of the Trinity House of Hull, and his wife, whose voice was "small and tiny like that of a person who has lived long and intimately with a gramophone, and has fallen into its metallic way of speaking"; or loiter with the lame idealist in rags and tatters who sprinkles seeds of Cytisus scoparius on bare, sunny banks that passers-by may hereafter rejoice in the "flower o' the broom." Mr. Story is a lover of mankind, and his heart is with the "common people." "It is sometimes thought," he says, "that culture and good manners percolate downwards. A mistake. Like that of the sap in a tree, the determining movement is ever upwards. Note the changes of language. They come up from the masses. . . . If, therefore, you want to work a change in a nation, do not begin with the so-called upper classes; leave, too, the middle classes alone. . . . Begin with the lowest, the humblest, with the hewers of wood and drawers of water, with the cobbler, the coal-heaver, the tailor, the miner, the dustman, with the lowly toilers of every class. They are the readiest to get at; they respond the quickest, and the heaven, once at work among them, will speedily leaven the whole lump."

METRED PLAYLETS. By W. Winslow Hall, M.D. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

DR. WINSLOW HALL's little book, for which he should have found a happier title, is an odd collection of dramatic experiments which are well calculated to whet the "critical tomahawks" to which he humorously alludes in his preface. Its purpose is explained in a neat Epilogue, which runs:

"What means this puppet-dance,
Thou holder of the strings?
We grasp not at a glance
What means this puppet-dance.
Ah! rarely, while we prance,
Thou show'st, by glimmerings,
What means this puppet-dance,
Thou holder of the strings."

The first "playlet," "Boundabitt's Tea Party," is grotesquely farcical, and inferior, we think, to the rest, although it has the first place. "Of Such" might be called a sort of Utopian tract, in which a fantastic old man, who imagines himself an Emperor, is proved at last to have scarcely enough ability to cut laces for a cobbler who has proved to him that there is no wealth but in what the workers make for use. "What Dreams May Come" is described as a "modern morality." It is a curious study in psychical research not without originality, although the methods by which the Hyde Park atheistical orator is led to believe in spirits are somewhat melodramatic. The playlets have, we understand, been translated into Esperanto, "ready for the day," as Dr. Hall explains, "when an awakened world shall clamour for the joy of them." By which it will be seen that the author has a sense of humour as well as a belief in a universal language.

WHAT IS JUDAISM? By A. S. Isaacs, Ph.D. New York: Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.

DR. ISAACS is Professor of Semitics in the University of New York, and the present volume is a collection of articles contributed by him, from time to time, to the North American Review, and other magazines. As magazine articles these essays served their purpose well, and their brevity was the necessary condition of their original manner of publication. But as a collected volume they are disappointing, and they give no adequate answer to the question on their title-page: "What is Judaism?" The title invites a comparison with the famous work of Harnack (under its English name); and it is not Harnack who will suffer by the comparison. If Dr. Isaacs had melted his essays down into one consecutive treatise, of no greater length than the present volume, he might have done more effective service to the cause which, as a Jew, he has at heart. There are many suggestive thoughts and excellent remarks in his pages; but the effect of them is impaired by the scrappiness of the whole. Judaism is presented mainly as seen in America, a fact which will, perhaps, make the book more helpful to American than to English readers.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL UNDER THE KINGDOM. By A. C. Welch, Theol.D. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 7s. 6d. net.

THE contents of this book were given as lectures in Glasgow, on the Kerr foundation, some few months ago. It is one of the conditions of the trust that the lecturer shall publish the lectures, at his own expense, within twelve months from their delivery. The book represents, accordingly, the discharge of an obligation rather than the supply of a felt want. The lectures are decorous and edifying, but not distinguished by any particular originality of thought or treatment. They have not made upon the present writer the impression that the lecturer had anything that he was burning to say. To write well of the prophets, especially of Amos, Hosea and Isaiah, some spiritual kinship with the prophets is desirable. It is doubtful whether Dr. Welch could have made Jeroboam uneasy, or have inspired Hezekiah to defy Sennacherib. The lectures are agreeable to read, and no doubt gained much, in delivery, from the personality of the lecturer.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOHN MILTON.
1608-1674.

I.

"My song shall be of mercy and judgment: unto Thee, O Lord, will I sing."—Ps. ci.

CROMWELL, you know, was Lord Protector of England for five years. During this time he had a secretary to help him with all his business, and that secretary was John Milton. Milton was an even greater man than Oliver Cromwell, for besides spending his life in fighting for freedom in England, as Cromwell did (only that while Cromwell fought with his sword, Milton fought with his pen—that is to say, his writings), he wrote a poem which is known all over the world, and which is only second in greatness to the plays of Shakespeare.

Many people—perhaps I should say most people—have no very clear idea as to why they are born into the world. They live, they eat, and drink, they carry on their trade, they are married, they die, and all the time they don't feel that there is any one thing that they can do that hundreds of other people could not do just as well. It is different with those to whom God has given great gifts—great talents for governing, like Cromwell; preaching, like Latimer; writing books, like Sir Thomas More; discovering new lands, like Drake; writing poetry, like Caedmon, Chaucer, and Milton. They feel that they are sent into the world to do something which no one else can do so well, and all their lives long they never rest until they have done it.

It was so with Milton. From the time when he was a boy, he believed that he was sent into the world to write a great poem, and he began to prepare himself for it very early. His father was a man who was fond of learning, and was skilful in music too, and he brought up the little John Milton to know Latin and Greek when he was very young, and to understand music, so that he remained fond of it all his life. He was born in Bread-street, in London, in 1608 (i.e., in James I.'s reign); he went first to St. Paul's School, and afterwards, when he was 16 years old, to Cambridge. Here he studied hard for seven years, and began writing some of his shorter poems, which are very beautiful. As it is very common to give boys nicknames at school and at college Milton had one, and we are told that he was called "The Lady," because he was so careful in his behaviour, and so particular about being clean and neat in his dress. He did not mind a bit, however, if people laughed at him about this, for, as I told you, he was preparing himself to be a great poet, and he tells us in his own words how he believed one could best do so. He says, "He who would not be frustrated of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things, ought himself to be a true poem." That means that he ought in all his words and deeds to act as nobly as he can, and the reason that Milton wrote such a great poem at the end of his life was because all his days had been well spent.

After leaving Cambridge, in 1631, he went to live in his father's home at a place called Horton in Buckinghamshire, and here he stayed six years, studying so hard and well that he got to know Italian and Hebrew (the ancient language in which the Old Testament was first written) as well as Latin and Greek, and writing several of his most beautiful poems. "Comus" was one of these. Another was on the death of a college friend of Milton's, who was drowned while crossing the Irish Channel. This poem is called "Lycidas," and in it he breaks out into indignation against the idle bishops of the day, who only cared about being rich and powerful themselves, and thought nothing about the poor people or how they could help them. He compares these bishops to bad shepherds who understand nothing about their business, so that "the hungry sheep look up and are not fed." We see from this that Milton was a Protestant, and later when the Civil Wars began in England he sided with the Puritans, and was very eager to help them. That is why he became Cromwell's secretary.

Besides these poems, he wrote at this time two which are very well-known, called "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" (these are two Italian words which mean the "cheerful" or "merry" man and the "thoughtful" or "grave" man). They describe life in the country as it appears first to a cheerful man, then to a thoughtful one, and they are full of beautiful descriptions of country sights and sounds. The cheerful man hears the lark singing outside his window; he gets up to see the sun rise, with all the gorgeous-coloured clouds round it, and to hear the mower sharpening his scythe, and the hunter's horn in the distance; he likes going to merry-makings in villages, where people are dancing under the trees, and where, when night comes on, they sit round the fire and the old grandmothers tell stories about fairies and goblins—how a tricky goblin would do a night's work for anyone who set him a bowl of cream to drink, so that when the farmer woke up in the morning he would find all his corn ready threshed by this busy spirit; music, too, the cheerful man loves. The thoughtful man likes walking in shady woods, and when night comes on, rambling over hill and dale, and watching the moon with the clouds flying across her face and listening to the song of the nightingale. He does not care for much company, but likes better to sit by his fire in the evenings, thinking about all the books he has read, listening to the cricket chirping on the hearth, and the watchman tinkling his bell outside and singing a charm as he used to do, to protect the houses from fairies and evil spirits. The thoughtful man loves music, too, but he likes the more serious kinds of music the best—to hear the organ in a great cathedral, and the choir singing anthems that "bring all Heaven before his eyes."

These two poems as well as "Comus" and "Lycidas" are among the most beautiful in the English language, but Milton was still not content; he felt that he had to write something better still; and in order to get more knowledge of the world and of the good and learned people of other countries, he left Buckinghamshire in 1637, and went to travel in France and Italy. In Florence he saw Galileo, the great Italian astronomer, who invented the telescope, and was in prison because he had declared, like Copernicus, that the earth went round the sun (as we now know it does), not the sun round the earth. The Inquisition (do you remember how this Court of Law sentenced Joan of Arc?) said he was teaching what went contrary to the Church's teaching, not seeing that the truth is the teaching which is the most pleasing to God. In Rome Milton saw a wonderful set of paintings by Raphael, the great Italian painter: they were pictures of the whole of the Bible history, and may have partly given Milton the idea for his poem of "Paradise Lost," which we are coming to presently. When he had been abroad for three years, news reached him of the beginning of the Civil War in England, and he made haste home, for he says: "I considered it base that while my fellow-countrymen were fighting at home for liberty, I should be travelling abroad" for the sake of learning. You see how well this agrees with what he said before—that a man who wishes to be a poet should be himself "a true poem." Much as he loved learning, he felt that he would have been cowardly and idle if he had stayed abroad when he was able to help his country people at home. So he returned to London and began writing in praise of liberty and against the injustices done by the bishops in such a way as to stir up people's hearts and minds to fight still better. He knew, you see, that being a scholar and a great writer he could do more good in this way than by going into battle and fighting with his own sword and gun, and he wrote not in poetry but in prose, that it might be plainer to everyone. His writings became very widely known, especially one called "A Defence of the People of England," which he wrote while he was Cromwell's secretary, and which showed that the execution of Charles I. had been right and necessary. A good many of these writings were in Latin, which, of course, only learned people could understand, but it was the language that all scholars used then, even more than now, and they admired and loved Milton's writings when they agreed with them. Of course there were a great many people on the King's side who thought Milton a bad man, who was quite in the wrong, but every great man has to make some enemies as well as friends if he does what he feels to be right. And now we come to the great misfortune of his life, which you shall hear about next week.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. IDA THOMSON.

THE congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity mourns the death, under tragic circumstances, of Mrs. Ida Thomson, wife of Mr. James Thomson, the son of the late Professor James Thomson, and nephew of the late Lord Kelvin. While travelling to Oxford to meet one of her brothers, who was on a visit from Canada, she fell from a train near Loughborough and was accidentally killed. Mrs. Thomson was the daughter of Mr. S. A. Oppé, a silk merchant settled at Lyons, who came to reside in London shortly after the birth of his daughter in 1871. One of the most potent influences in her life was her friendship with the late Mrs. Leonard Huxley. Among her intimate friends were the professors of Armstrong College, and at the various social gatherings in her home one was always sure to meet several of the most intellectual people of the district. In charitable activities she was not less known, her chief interest being in work among the blind. As a member of the Home Teaching Society for the Blind, she developed a scheme of work, and organised the sale of the articles made, in such a manner that the blind women of the district found means of increasing their scanty incomes. She served on the Charity Organisation Society, and was engaged in the Guild of Help. Another benevolent undertaking in which she was deeply interested was the Mothers' Welcome, an organisation for providing food at small cost to mothers who are bringing up children, and for giving advice and help in cases of sickness. She was also an active member of the Ladies' Hostel, an institution for providing home-like accommodation for young ladies employed in various capacities. All who knew her feel the loss of one whose refinement, kindness of nature, and gentleness made at once a deep and lasting impression. The funeral was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE thirty-fifth annual meeting of the Association was held at St. Thomas' Chapel, Ringwood, on Wednesday, July 17, in perfect summer weather. All the ministers of the constituent churches of the district were present, with the Rev. C. C. Coe, a former president, and a considerable party from Bournemouth and Poole, including Mr. Wm. Carter, another former president. The congregations of Southampton and Newport were also represented. The Revs. S. M. Crothers, preacher of the annual sermon, and W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, were the special guests of the day. Lunch and tea were served in the school-room, the larger number who came for tea overflowing into the shady places on the grass of the chapel yard.

The annual meeting was held in the chapel after lunch, the President, the Rev. H. S. Solly, in the chair. The report recorded a considerable amount of work done for the renovation of buildings and improved apparatus, and several fresh efforts in the direction of extended beneficent activity in the churches of the district, such as the "Martineau Club" for young men at Poole, the gymnastic class for boys at Newport, and the evenings for children and young people at Southampton. The reports from the churches included a farewell message from Chichester, which is transferring its allegiance to the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties. The recovery of the old minute books of the original Southern Unitarian Society, dating from 1801, and of the Southern Unitarian Fund Society, dating from 1815, united in the present Association in 1877, was noted, with minutes in the handwriting of their earliest secretaries, Russell Scott, Robert Aspland, and W. J. Fox. The statement of accounts presented by Miss E. J. Spencer, the treasurer, showed a balance of £26 8s. 9d. on the general account.

THE PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that while they had no great things to record, it was a cheerful report, and they might certainly feel that they were handing on the torch and keeping the flame burning on the altar. He referred to the encouragement they gained from the remarkable success of the effort being made to increase the Sustentation Fund. They felt that in their little group of churches they would have a reserve of force behind them, and while they often had a hard struggle, if they did their best they would certainly not be deserted. It was a splendid discipline of the spirit to serve in those little congregations; their persistence proved the loyalty of their people, and they might feel confident of the future.

MRS. WILLIAM CARTER, in seconding, dwelt on the importance of caring for their young people, and, by the touch of personal sympathy, making them feel that they were wanted. As to their services, she thought there was sometimes a lack of clear appeal that would make people understand their position as Unitarians. They had a glorious opportunity, for there were many who now lived in an atmosphere of unacknowledged Unitarianism, whom their services ought to touch and educate and enlighten, and she longed that they might be gathered into the fold.

The resolution was adopted and the officers and representatives appointed, the Rev. H. S. Solly being re-elected president, Miss Spencer treasurer, and the Rev. V. D. Davis secretary.

The Rev. C. C. Coe then moved, the Rev. A. R. Andreae seconded, and it was resolved: "That this meeting warmly endorses the appeal of the Sustentation Fund for the raising of a further capital sum of £50,000, and urges the members of this Association to unite together to make a common contribution to the Fund."

A welcome was extended to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, on the motion of Mrs. Cogan Conway, seconded by Mr. W. H. Scott, and to Dr. Crothers, on the motion of Mr. Leslie Chatfield-Clarke, seconded by the Rev. J. Ruddle, the memory of Dr. Crothers' previous visit in 1906, when he preached the annual sermon at Newport, being gratefully recalled. Both guests made cordial response, and the meeting concluded with thanks to the Ringwood friends for their hospitable reception of the Association, to which the Rev. C. E. Reed responded.

After tea, service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. G. W. Thompson, of Portsmouth, and the sermon was preached by Dr. Crothers.

DR. CROTHERS' SERMON.

That we are "labourers together with God" was the burden of the sermon, and the text 1 Cor. iii. 9 was contrasted with Romans ix. 20, 21, showing how the conflict of thought remained unsolved in the Apostle's mind. But the former text was the watchword of liberation, of spiritual freedom. That man was a creature in the absolute power of God, like clay in the hands of the potter, became a crushing thought in the doctrine of Calvin and Jonathan Edwards, and they found it in Paul. It seemed to be there in unrelieved conflict with the other thought of freedom and joy in the spirit. The question for them was, what they were to do with it. It represents, said Dr. Crothers, the tyranny of the actual over the ideal and the possible, the tyranny of things as they are in the world over what we feel they ought to be and we can help to make them. And our religion bids us not be daunted by this thought, but realise that God is with us in the effort to resist and overcome, that that is what we are here for, to work out His higher purpose in life, to be fellow-workers, fellow-creators with Him. In the history of the Christian Church we see constantly how forms of that other doctrine, dominating the mind even of great religious teachers, have stood in the way of freedom and progress and made of the Church, not the leader towards a high spiritual ideal, but a power on the side of reaction, making not for emancipation but for compromise, a defender of things as they are, too often on the side of oppression and wrong. That comes of the perversion of the truth of the absolute power of God, blind to the deeper spiritual truth of that high calling of our life, in which He gives to us of His power, that we ourselves may have the energy of faithfulness and be fellow-workers with Him.

The prayer, "Thy will be done," is an utterance of faith and hope, an assertion of what ought to be. We see before us the ideal of right, of truth, and goodness. For the present it is weak, and to many seems impossible to realise. But it is God's will, and because we believe that, we will not be discouraged. "Even if I die for it," a true man says, "God's will is done through my faith." That is the way for us, in obedience, not to the God of things as they are, but to the living God of the urgent spiritual ideal, who has a better purpose for us and calls us into this field of true endeavour. Slowly the world has been working its way out of the old conception of arbitrary power, the paralysing conception that the will of God is revealed to us by the things already accomplished and not rather in the things that ought to be. The most emancipating idea, said Dr. Crothers, has come to us through science, the idea of progressive evolution. It brings to us an enlightenment not given to the ancient world, even to the Apostles and saints in their struggles with those conflicting thoughts. The present form in which life exists is not absolute and final. Forms are fugitive; it is the creative power at the back of them that matters. The man of science proves it in a thousand ways, and the man of religion feels it.

If I disobey the powers that now seem strongest in the world, am I rebelling against God? Is that irreligion? No, it is one of the ways in which the Creative Spirit always manifests itself. God's will is not revealed in any settled form; whether of opinion or of social life. Behind all the forms of things already attained is the great word of religion, a word endless in its possibilities; "Be ye perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect." We are with God in the world. He is in the world, not in a completed purpose, but in a purpose to be fulfilled. God is in the world in the urgency of righteousness, in ideals unfulfilled, in high hopes, in rebellion against evil, in self-sacrifice. God is in the world, not in the power that built and nailed together the Cross—not there, but in the power that endured the Cross, despising the shame. The true idealist is the man whose soul sees the perfection which his eyes seek in vain. The thing that matters is not the present form of life, the thing already accomplished, but the power that keeps on, that rises eternally in the human soul. We are not mere creatures; if we were, there would be little hope for us. The true significance of the human soul is that it is a creator, that it rises out of the dust, no longer yields, but directs and plans, and at its highest feels the Power that is planning with it. We can conspire with the Eternal to take all that is evil in this world and work upon it and against it, till we shatter it to bits. Then we can, God working with us—we can slowly remould it nearer to our own desires.

It is the miracle of human life that in us arises this power of the Spirit. A little child is born and grows unconsciously until at last self-consciousness, and world-consciousness, and God-consciousness come. We cannot explain what happens. But it does happen, and it is the great marvel. Here am I, not an atom in my body, not a molecule in my brain, but has existed in some form or another since the world began. These atoms have been floating about in the star dust. They came together as worlds were formed. They have been in the flame, they have fallen as dew and rain. They have whirled about perpetually obeying laws they did not comprehend and could not disobey. And now something, I know not what, says: "I am, I will, I can"—until at last there comes the sense of sonship to a Power like myself, but infinitely more than myself. Something within me says, "I will arise and go to my Father." I, the creature of a day, I that am akin to the dust of the field, I that am ignorant, I that am sinful, I will arise, and I will go!

What does it mean? It means that there is a power in every conscious personality, a power that grows as the soul grows, that is linked to the eternal destinies of the universe. It is not the clay in the hands of the Potter, it is a Power creative, that makes a man consciously and gladly a fellow-labourer, a fellow-creator with God.

And what does it mean, Dr. Crothers asked in conclusion, to us who have fought our way out of the limitations that have cramped humanity in the past, to us in this fellowship of liberal religion? It mobilises our spiritual forces, it links itself with every effort for the advancement of mankind. In the prayer, "Thy kingdom come," in effort persistent and heroic, in self-sacrificing service, as free men, creative of the new world, in which righteousness shall be supreme, we are brought nearest to the will of God. It is not for us to be conformed to this world (as Paul said, rising far above his figure of the clay formed on the potter's wheel), but transformed by the renewing of our mind, until we know what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Banbury.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last. Addresses were given in the afternoon and evening by the minister, the Rev. H. D. Stephenson, B.A., good congregations being present on both occasions. Gifts of flowers brought by the children were sent to the hospital and to the workhouse infirmary.

Belfast: Appointment.—The Rev. Ernest Harold Pickering, B.A., of Gee Cross, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of All Souls' Church. It is expected that the installation will take place on October 1 next.

Gee Cross.—The Rev. F. H. Vaughan, B.A., of Mansfield, has received and accepted an invitation to become junior minister at Hyde Chapel as colleague to the Rev. H. E. Dowson.

Hollywood.—Anniversary services were held at Kingswood Chapel on Sunday, July 21. The morning preacher was the Rev. Charles Thrift, of Fazeley-street Mission. The Moseley Unitarian Christian Church choir helped in the musical part of the worship. The preacher in the evening was the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, M.A. The collections realised close upon £16.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—A very successful meeting was held on July 22, by kind invitation of the congregation, at Ilford Unitarian Church. From 6.45 to 7.30 p.m. tea was provided, and a short service was then held in the church, the preacher being the Rev. A. H. Biggs. In the course of his address Mr. Biggs emphasised the necessity of replacing the outworn beliefs of the past by a living faith in the Divine Immanence, which would bring to the individual a sense of spiritual power and responsibility in the thought that every life formed a part of the Eternal Life of God. A conference subsequently took place in the schoolroom, the subject being "Unitarianism and the Religion of the Old Testament Contrasted." The openers were Mr. E. Capleton and Miss Amy Withall, both of whom dealt with the exclusiveness of the old Judaism and the inclusiveness of modern Unitarianism; with the emphasis in the Old Testament laid upon the Transcendence of God, and the modern attraction to the thought of His Immanence; and with the difference of spiritual attitude between those who look for a Redeemer to come, and those who trust in the present Spirit of God in the hearts of men. In the discussion which followed the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Messrs. A. D. Beckwith, J. Kinsman, and W. T. Colyer took part. A very cordial welcome was extended to the visitors by Mr. E. R. Fyson, chairman of the congregation, who presided over the meeting. Owing to pressure of other engagements, the President of the Union, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., was unable to be present.

National Union of Unitarian Lay Preachers.—A committee has been at work preparing rules and suggestions for a National Union of Unitarian Lay Preachers. They met in London at Whitsuntide, and they have now issued an interesting communication to the various existing local and district unions of lay preachers. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., is president, and Mr. Stanley P. Penwarden, of 35, Grosley-road, Hornsey-lane, London, N., will act for the present as secretary and treasurer. Mr. Penwarden will be pleased to send information respecting the Union to lay preachers. A meeting will be held next Whitsuntide for the further development and organisation of the Union.

Sheffield.—We are glad to learn that the Rev. C. J. Street, who has been ordered a lengthened period of rest from his ministerial duties at Upper Chapel, is already much better. The July number of the Record contains the first part of a list of the original members of Upper Chapel in 1700. It is interesting to observe that several of the surnames still occur on the membership roll, bearing witness to a long family connection with the congregation.

Synod of Munster.—The annual meeting of the Synod of Munster was held in Stephen's Green Church, Dublin, on Wednesday, July 17. Reports from the congregations connected with the Synod were handed in, from which it appeared that considerable new life and activity were being manifested by the Dublin congregation, shown by an increased membership, and by regular evening as well as morning services attended by considerable numbers of inquiring strangers. A new organ had been built for the church, and other structural changes made, including new and improved heating and ventilating apparatus, electric lighting, and new seating in the gallery. As regards Clonmel, services had been regularly maintained throughout the year, partly by supplies, but chiefly through the disinterested services of the Rev. R. J. Orr, who was resident in Clonmel, though not as the ordained minister of the church. At Cork several ministers had been heard during the year with a view to filling the vacancy caused by the resignation, a year ago, of the Rev. G. V. Crook; and it was hoped that before long a resident minister would be appointed. A resolution was passed by a unanimous vote of the Synod, expressing sympathy with the Rev. G. V. Crook, a former Moderator of the Synod, in the difficulty he was experiencing in finding another settlement, and the hope was expressed that he might soon meet with a congenial sphere of work. The next meeting of the Synod was fixed for Clonmel on the second Wednesday in July, 1913.

The Unitarian Van Mission.—It is matter for very sincere regret on the part of the missionary agent that the services of the missionaries in the early part of the present season have received rather less than the customary measure of acknowledgment. The work that is voluntarily done for the Mission by ministers and laymen in the field is the main cause of its success, and for that reason should not be lightly passed over. Often, too, the meetings themselves prove sufficiently interesting to warrant public mention. Since the end of June meetings have been held in the following places:—No. 1 Van (Wales): July 1 to 7, Trecynon, the Revs. Jenkin Thomas, R. J. Jones, G. Neighbour, and E. R. Dennis, and Mr. Ben Davies; July 8 to 15, Aberaman, the Revs. D. G. Rees and G. Neighbour, and Mr. John Lewis; July 15 to 21, Mountain Ash, the Revs. J. Tyssul Davis, H. V. Mills, J. Park Davies, and C. Neighbour. No. 2 Van (Midlands): July 1 to 9, Congleton, the Revs. W. A. Weatherall and Dr. Griffiths; July 10 to 14, Macclesfield, Dr. Griffiths and the Rev. W. G. Cadman; July 15 to 21, Market Drayton, the Rev. D. J. Evans. No. 3 Van (London): July 1 to 7, Southend, the Revs. Fred Hall, T. Elliott and Messrs. Sloman and Corner; July 9 to 14, Plaistow, the Revs. F. Hall and J. M. Whiteman and Mr. Bertram Talbot; July 15 to 21, Forest Gate, the Revs. W. H. Rose, J. M. Whiteman, and J. Ellis. No. 4 Van (Yorkshire): July 1 to 7, Selby, the Revs. A. G. Peaston and J. Dale; July 8 to 18, Goole, the Revs. H. F. Short, L. Clare, and G. Pegler; July 18 to 21, Howden, the Rev. G. Pegler. The following statistics of the Missions will be found interesting:—The Welsh van has held 40 meetings and 14 others have been lost owing to cold and rain and other causes. The attendances have totalled 9,465, and the average is 236. The Midlands van held 46 meetings and lost 17; attendances, 15,180; average 330. The London van had 56 meetings and lost 12; attendances, 17,575; average, 314. The Yorkshire van held 48 meetings and lost 14; attendances, 7,795; average, 162. Total 190 meetings, attendances 50,015, average 263. These figures are satisfactory in view of the unsettled weather that has prevailed, which, in addition to causing the loss of over 50 meetings, very seriously interfered with the attendances at many more. Wales has scarcely yet answered expectations and Yorkshire has suffered through the handicap at the outset; but London and the Midlands are excellent, in spite of everything. Many remarkable meetings have been held in the Potteries, and nearly every town responded to the van message. We recall one instance. Here is a town in which the Revs. R. N. Cross and L. Short are successively missionaries. When the van went to the place first it met with serious opposition. The seed that was sown, however, bore fruit. Young men in one of the largest places of worship kept in touch with the Mission, and so made their influence felt that to-day the chapel is a centre for the dissemination of advanced principles. Unfortunately, a secession occurred, and the more conservative element in the congregation withdrew. But the cause has not really suffered, and both parties are carrying on the work according to their own ideas. Another chapel has also come into line, and so when the van comes again this season it finds that it is voicing the popular aspiration and is received in splendid earnest by the multitude. In Wales, one of the most interesting places visited is Mountain Ash. When the van was there on a former occasion large meetings were held, and it was considered that there was a good opening for a church. A liberal section of the Baptist Church had, however, withdrawn with their pastor, the Rev. George Neighbour, and it was deemed advisable to avoid any seeming rivalry with him and his friends. Since then this congregation has joined the South-East Wales Unitarian Association and the Mission this year finds a church of its own denomination to welcome it. An interesting item also is furnished by the London van. At Plaistow a score of men signed a paper urging that further meetings should be held in the place. These friends held a preliminary meeting in the Forest Gate Church last week but one, and it was then decided to give effect to the recommendation. Those present formed themselves into a committee to carry out the local arrangements, and the Rev. J. M. Whiteman agreed to deliver a series of open-air addresses at the Greengate end of Dongola-road, Plaistow, on Wednesday evenings. The first of these meetings has been held this week. Next week the London van will be at Walthamstow, and for the next fortnight the meetings will be conducted by members of the London Lay-Preachers' Union. All communications respecting the Mission, and all contributions in aid of the work—and these are greatly needed—should be sent to Thos. P. Spedding, Missionary Agent, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

West Bromwich.—The Sunday school anniversary services in connection with the Lodge-road Unitarian Church, West Bromwich, took place on Sunday. In the morning the Rev. F. A. Homer took the service. In the evening the pulpit was occupied by the Rev. Hugh Towl, Pastor of the High-street Congregational Church, West Bromwich, while the Rev. F. A. Homer conducted the service at the Congregational church. There was a crowded congregation to welcome Mr. Towl on his first visit to Lodge-road Church. The offerings showed an increase on last year.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE MEETING HOUSE AT GAINSBOROUGH.

The Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis has written a pamphlet dealing with the foundation and history of Beaumont-street Church, Gainsborough, one of the many hundreds of meeting houses which were erected during the latter years of the seventeenth century and the first decade of the eighteenth century. There are indications that lead the writer to think the congregation existed earlier than 1688. "It is recorded that one Matthew Coats had his house licensed for worship in the year of the Indulgence of 1672 . . . The Meeting House stood amidst pasture land as late as 1810. The men who figure in the earliest trust deeds are possibly some of those who left the church at the period of 1662, and may be the direct descendants of those Puritan Fathers who remained in their own country, while some went in search of a new home elsewhere. . . From 1700 to 1907 there have been eight ministers, four of whom served the Meeting House for 182 years."

THE HOME OF THE JAPANESE WORKMAN.

The July number of the Vineyard, which keeps up its reputation as one of the most readable and original of the smaller monthly magazines, has a delightful article by Mr. Hadland Davis on "Japanese Arts and Crafts." We are told much about gardens and swords, pictures and fans, and the religious solemnities observed in connection with their work by "weaving maidens," and those who fashion steel blades superior to those of Toledo and Damascus. Mr. Davis reminds us of one of the pleasantest facts of life among the working-classes in Japan when he says "the humble Japanese home always contains a picture after a great artist. The kakemono is not hung up on the wall and left there to take care of itself. The picture is studied, revered. If it should show the least sign of fading, it is put away in a lacquer box, and another hung up in its place. No Japanese room, whether it be in a large house or a small one, is ever turned into a picture gallery, as is so often the case with us in England. The people of Nippon have learnt to sit down and study a picture with the same attention a Nature-lover gives to a sunset, or to the purple and silver mystery of a night sky."

TWENTY-MILE WALKS WITH DICKENS.

Mr. Marcus Stone, one of the most popular of living artists, has recently given a few reminiscences to the indefatigable reviewer. He confided to a representative of the Daily News and Leader that he had at least one talent—that of being lazy, but this statement is borne out neither by his pictures nor by the account he gives of the long walks which he and Dickens used to take when Mr. Stone paid one of his frequent visits to Gad's Hill. "At three o'clock every afternoon," he explained, "we used to have a twenty-mile walk in the country round. Dickens spoke but little while walking, and this, after a time, led me to discover the secret of his amazing industry. He sat only for a few hours at his desk, and I always wondered how he could be so prolific an author. Well, owing to his taciturnity in our country walks, I began to suspect that it was then he evolved most of the plots of his novels. His brain was active all the time, and the task of reproducing on paper the things he imagined and thought about became more or less a mechanical process."

* * *

"Dickens," Mr. Stone added, "was one of the greatest and kindest men I ever met. He was always a good Radical, which I claim to be myself, and employed a portion of his daily work in rendering some service to his neighbour. He was imbued with the true Christian spirit. What particularly struck me at Gad's Hill was the atmosphere of calm and comfort one felt at once on entering the house."

A LEGEND OF ST. DRUON.

A charming little story about St. Druon, Bishop of Arras, an unpretending saint of Flanders around whose name many legends have gathered, is told in the summer number of Bird Notes and News, which has translated it from Le Petit Journal :—

"St. Druon was walking near Arras at the seed-sowing season, and as he passed by a field he met a peasant whose newly-sown furrows were being pillaged by a flight of birds. 'Who will rid me of these accursed thieves!' cried the man. 'I would part with my share of paradise if not one single bird could approach within a league of my farm.' 'Never mind,' said the Bishop, drawing near; 'there is no need to call so loud for such a favour.' Then, tracing a sign in the air, he said, 'My friend, your prayer will be granted.'"

* * *

"Returning to the village a year later, he found the same peasant seated outside his cottage, dejected, his head buried in his hands. 'What ails you, my friend?' asks the Bishop. 'What ails me?' repeats the other in anger. 'It is you who are the cause of my misfortunes. The insects devour my crops, because the birds no longer come and eat the grubs and worms; the field-mice ravage my ground, and leave me not a single root now that the owls and hawks no longer make war upon them. And all round me is dull and sad because I hear no more the songs of the nightingales.' St. Druon said to him with a smile, 'A year ago you wanted to give your share of paradise if no bird could come within a league of your fields, and now you are in despair because you have your wish!'"

EXCAVATIONS IN THE SUDAN.

Recent excavations at Meroë, between Athara and Khartum, with its pyramids and tombs of Ethiopian kings and queens, have brought to light many hidden treasures, temples, sculptures, and fragments of pottery which furnish illustration of unexplained or neglected passages in ancient writings. Some of the results of these excavations are now on view in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries at Burlington House. Of special interest is a discovery made by Mr. Schliephack, the skilled artist of the staff, of a fresco in one of the official buildings. "The theme of decoration," says the Times, "shows the King and Queen seated in state, their feet upon the bowed and sometimes tortured forms of prisoners. In front of the Monarch his chief agent, or grand vizier, is seen, clad in gorgeous robes, and upon his neck a small cross hangs as a pendant in the ordinary way. The cross as a Christian emblem is not hitherto known in the earliest centuries of Christianity; but the frescoes, it would seem, must be assigned on independent grounds to within a century of the birth of Christ."

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

NOW READY FOR JULY.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.
Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.
of every description accurately typed.
1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—

Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-

Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY,

AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

PLUMS.—Persnore Egg Plums, 24 lbs. 6/6, 12 lbs. 3/9. Victorias, 24 lbs. 8/6, 12 lbs. 4/9. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric "Flaxella." Washable, wears for years. Scores of fascinating designs, beautiful shades. Sale Catalogue FREE. Write.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

SALE BARGAINS!—Genuine White

Art Irish Linen Remnants, big pieces, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give

highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday July 27, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3658.
NEW SERIES, No. 762.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net.

MAN'S CHIEF END,

and other Sermons.

By B. R. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of
ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Modern Handbooks of Religion

Crown 8vo. 2/- each net.

The Jewish Religion in the Time of Jesus. By Dr. G. HOLLMAN, of Halle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 150 pp.

The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 176 pp.

Paul: A Study of his Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 200 pp.

The Apostolic Age. By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. 144 pp.

Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. Dr. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg. Translated by V. D. DAVIS, B.A. 160 pp.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT
St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

The Tides of Devotion. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 27.

"Values of the Faith." By W. SCOTT PALMER. July 20.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Professor FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.

Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.

Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.

NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

WEESEN - on - the - WALLENSEE.

In connection with Mr. LUMMIS' Swiss tour, special tickets are issued for the latter part of August (16 to 27), giving ten days at Weesen, at an inclusive charge of nine guineas. —15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHREUBALL, } Directors.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS. — Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.

HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—

PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

FRENCH LADY, distinguished singing professor, wishes to spend two or three months au pair in respectable English family, in or near London. Willing to exchange singing lessons against English conversation.—Address, Mrs. LEISSERS, 40, rue Albony, Paris 10.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, August 4.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Brompton, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11, Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.; no evening service.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. V. Fox; 6.30, Mr. E. R. FYSON.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Mr. V. MOODY.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11, no morning service until Sept. 15; 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, Sunday School Sermons, 11, Rev. AMBERST D. TYSSSEN, D.C.L., M.A. Subject: Bishop Ridley the Martyr. No evening service.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Mr. F. E. ALLEN.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road. Closed during August.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15, Mr. A. TITFORD; no evening service.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. A. E. CARLIER; 6.30, Mr. VICTOR FOX.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 15.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. R. W. PETTINGER.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A., of Manchester.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel. Closed during first three weeks of August.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. A. HOMER.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and
 STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. LANG BUCKLAND.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. T. DAVIES.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30. Closed.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. KING.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDBEAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. TURLAND.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Mr. A. D. BECKWITH.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE, 16, Langdale-road, Victoria Park, Manchester.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY,"—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

MARRIAGE.

BUSHROD—GABRIEL.—On July 18, at Chorley Chapel, by the Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, the Rev. Walter Thomas Bushrod, Minister of the Chapel, to Lucy Gabriel, of Chorley.

DEATH.

GREEN.—On July 30, at Peshurst, Woodlands Park, Timperley, Mary Louisa Green, sister of the late Sir Francis Green, of London, aged 82 years.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

SALARY OPTIONAL.—Lady, well connected, requires post Housekeeper, Companion to invalid, etc. Domesticated; nursing; supervise servants.—P., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, for the Argentine, experienced Nursery-Governess. Must be fond of children and quiet country life.—For all particulars apply, 30, Sheepcote-road, Harrow.

WANTED, an Organist and Choir-master for the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Hackney. £25 per annum. Two services and practice weekly.—Apply to Miss WHITEHEAD, 63, Clapton Common, N.E.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	—	1 8
PER HALF-YEAR	—	3 4
PER YEAR	—	6 6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	515	QUESTIONS AT ISSUE :—		FOR THE CHILDREN	524
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		The Eugenics Congress and After	521	MEMORIAL NOTICE :—
The Christian Minister	516	CORRESPONDENCE :—		The Rev. Andrew Chalmers	525
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		The Late Rev. Charles Voysey	522	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
Values of the Faith.—III.	518	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		The Retirement of the Rev. Joseph Wood	525
The Ideals of the Cambridge Platonists .	519	The Religion of the Pharisees	523	John Pounds House	526
Words and Music	520	The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher .	524	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	527
		Christianity and Business	524	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	527
		Publications Received	524

 * All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is a matter for gratitude and satisfaction that the best organs of public opinion in Germany have not made the recent Naval debates in the House of Commons the occasion for political fireworks or unfriendly suspicions. In summing up the international situation, the Berliner Tageblatt writes as follows, and we are confident that its words will be endorsed by the best elements in English life :—

“The will for an understanding is, at least on this side of the Channel, as firm and determined as ever, and in spite of the armaments race on both sides we still think that the towering difficulties can be surmounted with the exercise of some goodwill. Only we would like to see at last what the diplomatists of both countries could do in the matter. Every new disappointment leaves a modicum of distrust behind it, and thereby renders the work of achieving an understanding more difficult. Let us hope that this problem, which is the most important for the two nations, will be delayed no longer.”

WE are glad to see that Manchester is leading the way in holding a Town’s Meeting “with a view to supporting His Majesty’s Government in taking such steps as may be necessary and practicable in order to prevent the continuance or recurrence of the shocking barbarities which have recently been perpetrated in the Putumayo district of Peru, and brought to light as the result of an inquiry undertaken by Sir Roger Casement under the direction of the British Government.” In these days of over-crowded political programmes and a cautious suspicion of the value of moral knight-errantry popular indignation is an indispensable weapon. The correspondence in the Blue Book gives very little ground for hope that there will be any improvement unless very strong pressure is brought to bear. At the present moment there is too much reason to fear that these hideous cruelties are still being perpetrated, and it is English trade which draws the largest share of the profits.

THE project for sending a Roman Catholic mission into the Putumayo district has given rise unfortunately to some controversy. We hope that this will not cause any delay in getting its humanising influences to work. It is guaranteed that the missionaries will be British subjects and members of the Franciscan Order, and the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs has stated that it “has a far better chance of getting something done than any other mission that could be sent.” At the same time it is satisfactory to learn that Peru is not closed to other forms of religious effort, in spite of the article of the constitution which affords exclusive protection to Roman Catholics. On this point both the Bishop of the Falkland Islands and the Rev. F. B. Meyer have given important evidence. The more tolerant policy is probably simply a matter of political expediency, but the opportunities it affords should be put to good use. It is pioneers of Christian civilisation that are needed. These nameless horrors are only possible in a land of darkness.

THE statement in regard to Indian policy which was made by Mr. Montagu, the Under-Secretary, in the House of Commons on Tuesday was of unusual breadth and interest. It seems likely that the question of primary education, which Indian reformers have long held to be one of the crying needs of the country, will be taken in hand seriously. The Government is not prepared to accept Mr. Gokhale’s scheme for free compulsory education, as in their opinion the country is not ripe for it, and in many districts it would be likely to arouse resentment. For the present the intention is to increase the number of schools, to make them more efficient, and to provide more highly qualified teachers. Mr. Montagu said that the education grant of £330,000 announced at Delhi was to be spent mainly on primary education, and it was but the prelude to a much more expensive programme. The programme to which the Government hoped to work in due course was as follows :—To increase the number of primary schools by 90,000 or 75 per cent., and to double the school-going population.

THE appointment of a Royal Commission to examine and report upon the public services in India is another sign of an enlightened desire to adapt the machinery of government to changing conditions and to make the happiness and welfare of the people themselves the determining factor in our policy. The growing political consciousness of India itself, as expressed, for instance, in the National Congress, and the large number of Indians who have received a Western education, have created a situation which was not foreseen when our present Civil Service was organised. It is significant that one of the terms of reference to the Commission is to examine and report upon such limitations as still exist in the employment of non-Europeans.

* * *

It was a strangely representative gathering of all the strongest elements in English journalism which assembled to do honour to Sir E. T. Cook last week, and it was graced by a speech by Lord Morley, which all journalists will desire to welcome for its generosity and to lay to heart for its wisdom. In his view, he said, the Press had distinctly and definitely, in all the marks by which the wholesomeness of it was to be measured, improved. At the same time he suggested that there might be some connection between the unrest of the age and the flaming garish colours and dashing emphasis of the newspapers, a high feverishness and Brobdignagian attempts in type of all kinds. He did not mind who wrote the leading articles if they gave him full control of black type and the headlines.

* * *

In concluding his address Lord Morley said he wanted to say one thing very seriously. They were all living in times of tremendous difficulty. In every Chancellery in Europe one cause of the difficulties—some of them said the main cause—arose from the conflagrations of opinion kindled or extended by the Press. The prime duty of the Press all over Europe was to seize every opportunity to abate, to assuage, and to minimise, and, so far as they could, to remove international suspicion and international susceptibility instead of warming these horrible things into their hateful life.

* * *

THE Eugenics Congress, which finished its proceedings this week, has been kaleidoscopic in the range of subjects discussed and the variety of opinions expressed. While we value the challenge it has given to inert habits of thinking and the public interest it has aroused in a grave social problem, we think that its promoters will have to learn caution and concentration if they desire to have any practical effect upon either conduct or legislation. Upon many people of intelligence the impression left by the discussions must have been a twofold one. Firstly, that the whole movement rests far more upon a feeling of something wrong than upon a clear perception of the way to put it right. And secondly, that the field for practical action, which would be either justified by scientific knowledge or tolerated by public opinion is, at the present moment, a very narrow one. We are convinced that very little progress is likely to be made in eugenic propaganda until it is agreed that life cannot be reduced to simple physical terms.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTER.*

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

"And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up; and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written:—The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."—LUKE iv. 16-19.

We hear very much in these days of the decay of the pulpit and the decline of public worship. It is said that two great classes of English society, the educated and the artisan, are hopelessly estranged alike from the preacher and from habits of devotion. The rough indifference of the great working class at one end of the scale, the polished scorn of the great intellectual class at the other, make it abundantly clear that the pulpit, as an institution, is on the wane. Even among the adherents of our churches there is not that interest in preaching and constant attendance upon public worship there used to be. The offices of Religion, the Church with its affairs, have not the same meaning for the solid middle class they had for our fathers.

Well, let us face the facts of the case, and acknowledge whatever there is of truth in these statements. We may at once and frankly admit that nowhere is the pulpit of that engrossing interest it once was. The press, the lecture, the magazine, the fascinations of art and science, even the spread of rational amusements, have stepped in to dispute the claims of the Church to the sole possession of the thoughts of men. At one time, when life was more circumscribed than it is now, when newspapers were dear and rare, when books were the privilege of a few, when the means of communication were scanty, when there were no free libraries, no science lectures, no art classes, the pulpit was almost the only change from their business many men had; it supplied for many their only intellectual stimulant; it was the one weekly break upon the monotony of life. But now there are a hundred other attractions enlarging the range of the most limited lives. Within the last half-century influences have been at work which have materially affected the position which the pulpit formerly enjoyed. A flood of wholesome and popular literature has poured through the country and stirred the dullest minds into something like intellectual activity. The most sacred subjects are discussed with freedom and boldness in magazines of the widest circulation. Knowledge is no longer the prerogative of a few. Men have the best poetry, the finest thought of the age, the most recent speculations, brought to their doors and laid on their tables at a nominal price. The Sunday service is no longer the only thing which takes a man out of home and business. There are political meetings, school and philanthropic committees, lectures by distinguished wits and scientists, the concert, the club, the particular section of the Institute he affects, all helping to widen the circle of interest, so that the pulpit in some measure suffers eclipse. There are numberless influences to attract men where a generation ago there was only the Church—the great æsthetic and dramatic influences, the great scientific, political, and philosophical influences of our times, all combining to diminish the attraction of the pulpit.

I do not complain of this. It is perfectly natural, quite inevitable, and, as I think, altogether healthy. I only demur to the assumption that the pulpit has, therefore, no legitimate place in modern life—to the assumption that the moral and spiritual life can do without the help of ordered services, of habits of devotion, and of the offices of the Church. It is not true that the soul can feed on magazine articles, however highly seasoned with epigrams, nor that the neatest laws of chemistry or geology can ever become a substitute for public worship. Man is gregarious in his moral and religious instincts as well as in everything else. When men are deeply interested in a given subject they meet together; thought and feeling play more quickly, respond more heartily in company than alone. You take a scientific book and study it in your own room, and that is one thing; but you go into a crowded lecture hall, and hear the man who wrote the book excite by his living voice and the magnetism of his personal presence the interest of a multitude, and you are moved and fascinated as you never were by the book. It is the same with the enjoyment and appreciation of music. A concert in the presence of a scanty and unsympathetic audience is not half so satisfactory as the same music performed in a full room, and to an audience quick to catch up its points. The pleasure is much greater; the sympathy of numbers quickens your feeling and your power of feeling.

The same need of sympathy and desire to associate with others pervades religion. Men come together in churches not only because they are interested in religion, but that their interest may be kept warm and living. A belief gains infinitely when shared by another; a pleasure is doubled in value when its music is echoed by a friend, and faith, hope, and love, which are dim and ashy shut up in the lonely soul, become glowing and intense when heart meets with heart in the great congregation. There is much in the presence of numbers inspired by a common feeling. Sympathy calls forth sympathy. There may be one here and there who can keep alive the flame of religion without the help of others, but for the most part, any such attempt ends in the flame dying out. A man will hardly continue the habit of private prayer who never joins in public prayer. To worship God amid the solitude of the hills and under the blue sky is scarcely possible for the man who observes no set hour or place for worshipping Him. It is found very difficult to make all the week a Sunday, unless you make Sunday something special. There are exceptions, but as a rule no man will enter Heaven except in company; for we need the kind looks, the encouragement, the living sympathy of our brethren. Far be it from me to deny the existence of a lonely way, but it is like the bridge leading to the Paradise of Mahomet, finer than a hair and sharper than a sword, and few there be who can tread it with safety. For the great majority a broader path is needed. The man who thinks he can sustain his love of mercy, pity, and peace, his feeling for God, his hope of Heaven, without the help of kindly comrades, is greatly mistaken. You may object to this form of public worship and that, and there may be reason in your objection, but almost any form of public worship is better than none at all. If you cannot sit down to a banquet exactly suited to your palate you do not, therefore, refuse to take food at all. Rather than starve you will dine off a crust and water. This or that form of public worship may be as simple and homely as bread and water, but it may be just the nourishment which the soul requires.

* First delivered on the first Sunday of Mr. Wood's ministry in Birmingham, August 10, 1884; re-delivered, with an appendix, on Sunday, July 28, 1912.

Nor can the world, or religion, or the religious life do without the pulpit. The new and manifold interests which compete with it make it a task of much greater difficulty than of old. It requires more culture, individuality, and power; the pressure of the times makes it hard for the pulpit to hold its own. And yet if any man has a real living word for his generation, the pressure of the times is rather for him than against him. The preacher considered as a mere professional person is held of small account in these days; the class as a class, will never have that deference paid to it as of yore. But whenever the man bursts through the ecclesiastical buckram, and a warm heart diffuses warmth around, there the preacher will have his place. Books can never take the place of men; a tract on theology, or a sermon in a magazine, can never be compared with the speech of an earnest, sympathetic man for power to move the human heart. The printed sermon may be a much cleverer production, marked by a logical force, a wealth of illustration, and a literary finish with which the other can never compare. But let a man speak in ever such uncouth language of that which he knows and has verified in his own experience, and the subtle magnetism of his personal conviction and presence will impress others until they too feel a fire in their bones.

Listen to this from Carlyle:—"That a man stand and speak of spiritual things to men. It is beautiful—even in its great obscurity and decadence, it is among the beautifullest, most touching objects one sees on earth. This speaking man has indeed, in these times, wandered terribly from the point; has, alas! as it were totally lost sight of the points; yet at bottom whom have we to compare with him? Of all Public Functionaries, boarded and lodged on the industry of modern Europe, is there one worthier of the board he has? A man ever professing, and never so languidly making still some endeavour to save the souls of men; contrast him with a man professing to do little but shoot the partridges of men! I wish he could find the point again, this speaking one, and stick to it with tenacity, with deadly energy; for there is need of him yet. The Speaking Function—this of truth coming to us with a living voice, nay, in a living shape, and as a concrete, practical exemplar; this, with all our Writing and Printing Functions has a perennial place. Could he but find the point again—take the old spectacles off his nose, and looking up, discern, almost almost in contact with him, what the real Satan, and soul-devouring, world-devouring Devil—Now Is."

The point! the point! Where is it? What is it? Do you think it is in discussing to distraction nice theological subtleties, or that it is in calm philosophical essays which carefully weigh the arguments for and against the truths of religion, and decide that there being twenty for and nineteen against, Religion has it! It seems to me from what I hear and read that there are preachers nowadays who have no kind of message from Heaven for the human soul. They are afraid to say that anything is, for fear of being thought dogmatic. They invite people to hear their elegant essays, their historical disquisitions, their speculations on Fetichism; and weary, hungry souls, longing for bread, are fed with stones. I do not wonder that Carlyle complains of the preacher for wandering so terribly from the point. Unless he has a message for sinning, suffering human spirits from the Father of Spirits, I do not see that there is any particular need of him. That message may be given in broken accents, or in the music of a perfect speech; it may come from simple, unlettered lips, or be accompanied with all the adornments of learning, eloquence, and imagination; the point is that it be a message, warm with brotherly love, bright with heavenly hope, with power to refresh the outworn, to re-inspire the brave, to re-kindle faith and prayer, to change the hideous, arid, and vile of human life into the wholesome, generous, and sweet, to make God and heaven, and the immortal life, and human progress the great realities of thought and being. Do not mistake me. I am not at all for narrowing the sphere of the pulpit. All that concerns the social, the intellectual, the political, the physical, and the spiritual welfare of man, concerns the preacher. The Church has lost immensely in the past by shutting herself up to so-called sacred subjects, and ignoring the great influences, dramatic, commercial, political, social, and æsthetic, which engage men. The Church is influential just in so far as she enters into the manifold life of men to claim all that is sound and healthy and human in the wide world as the sphere of her rule. No mistake on the part of the Church can be more profound, more disastrous, than to withdraw from the inevitable, onward current of the world's life, activities, and ambitions. The kingdoms of this world, the kingdom of art, the kingdom of commerce, the kingdom of science, the kingdom of political aspiration, belong to our God and His Christ as truly as the kingdom of prayer and devout feeling. But preachers have too often missed their opportunity because they have looked askance at the secular life of men. They do not understand that the Christ who has so many things to say to us, is saying them in a wider knowledge, and a new science, and a freer political life, and a healthy criticism. Unless the Church learns to appropriate the thought and movement of the age, and to keep touch with all the growing life of mankind, she will be left behind as a thing waxing old and ready to vanish away.

And yet, and yet, the business of the preacher is first of all with religion. Theology is good, art is good, science is good, criticism is good, political aspiration is good, and in their place may well be heard in the pulpit. But first of all it is life—true life, loving life, pure life, gracious life—character, moral and spiritual culture, which is the preacher's concern. All the rest is subsidiary—good as it ministers to life, valuable as it redeems and sweetens life; but life is first.

Who is the Christian Minister? What is he? Surely, if we would answer that question, we should look at Christ and take the declaration of such an office from His own lips. He was standing on the threshold of His ministry, preparing to take the first step forward in that wonderful three years' experience of teaching and work, of grace and healing, of sympathy and tragedy. And standing there He tells us what His mission was—what was the work He was called to do. "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because He hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to proclaim release to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." I love that scene. "As his custom was he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day." He, so near to God, so full of spiritual peace and power, He did not feel that He could do without these sacred customs, the public gathering, the sympathy of many, the set time of prayer. He revered and conformed to the old hallowed usage of His fathers. And then from the ancient scriptures of His people He read forth in words which have never been surpassed, the ideal and office of the Christian ministry He came to found. Good tidings to the poor, sight to the blind, release to the captives, liberty for the oppressed, the acceptable year of the Lord—the year of promise, of righteousness, of hope, of peace, the golden year of all the poets and prophets.

But we shall not understand these words aright if we consider them only in the narrowness of the letter. Do you think He simply meant the poor in purse, and men in actual prisons, and the outwardly blind, and the socially oppressed? No doubt He did mean all these, for His gospel has worked a social revolution in the interests of the poor; it has set flowing healing, civilising, and redeeming influences which have abolished slavery, reformed prisons, built hospitals, and uplifted the whole secular life of men. But these are the outward and visible signs of a more inward, radical, and spiritual work. "Good tidings to the poor"; yes, for men are poor in spirit, poor in affection, poor in hope, poor in thought, poor in aspiration. "Release to the captives"; yes, for men are in bondage to sin, selfishness, and ignorance, as well as to political tyranny. "Sight to the blind"; yes, for how many are blind in spiritual vision, seeing no God to trust, no Heaven smiling above them, no Divine Providence at work in their lives. Light to the mind, healing to the soul, freedom to the will, conscience and spirit, this was the work and message with which He was charged.

We stand away at a great distance from Christ; no preacher to-day can measure himself by that wonderful figure; the best of us are far-off imitators of Him and His excellence, and yet, unless a man can say this, humbly, tremblingly, but still with profound conviction, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor, to heal the broken-hearted, to preach release to captives, sight to the blind, and liberty to the bruised," I do not know what call he has to be a preacher. He may be scholarly, original, scientific, critical, eloquent, but the question and point of all is, has he any light, any healing, any grace, any deliverance? Has he anything for the sore, the wounded, the blind, the burdened, that will make them better men and women, better fathers, better mothers, better brethren? Oh! how bitter is the self-condemnation of the preacher, as he looks at his office in the light of an ideal like this. Never can you pass a judgment upon him so severe as that which he passes upon himself. And yet, if he has brought a single ray of Heaven's own light to long-closed eyes; if he has opened a way for any weary foot to God and rest; if he has set at liberty the bound in heart, and made life and thought freer for them; if he has lightened the burden of a single conscience; if he has made men believe ever so faintly in the acceptable year of the Lord—that is, in goodness, love, and truth, as the all-conquering forces of the universe; then, although his ministry has in it a thousand mistakes and weaknesses, he may feel that he is taking part with Christ in the redemption of the world, and in the slow upbuilding of the grandest of all temples—the temple of redeemed humanity.

It is this gospel of Christ which is the preacher's message to-day; nothing has made it stale or obsolete. For men and women in their essential characteristics are the same to-day as yesterday. The sense of wrong-doing still follows man like his shadow; conscience still makes a coward of him; sin is the same insupportable burden as of old. Care still sits with us at our feasts, sorrow is the same familiar, unwelcome guest. Tears are shed at our birth and our death; we baptize the marriage altar and the grave alike with those sacred waters. Our farewells, our partings, are like the infinite wail of the wind. Who does not feel the sadness, the burden, the mystery of human life? To-day, also, as of old, people are troubled by the awful question, "Whence and Whither?" Whence comes the bird into the lighted hall? Whither has he gone when, after enjoying the brightness and warmth for a moment, he flies out again into the night? Still the heart cries out for the living God. Still the questions are asked, Who is God? What is His method of working? What is His purpose in this wonderful world? What is the soul of man? What is Life? What is Death? There is a restless mystic tendency within us which means nothing unless it points to God. We want to know whether a blind fate or a living love is creation's final law. The shadow of eternity is upon us.

For all this the gospel of Christ has a living message, deliverance from fear, light for the eyes, grace for the heart, promise of the hope. And it is in the congregation of worshippers where heart beats with heart in concord, where common wants and experiences move men and women into sympathy and communion, that the power of the Gospel is chiefly made manifest; and it is there the preacher's words, if he be natural, brave, and reverent, and with any insight into human nature, will be received with joy as the thirsty fields receive the rain from heaven. Never while man sins and suffers, while there is weeping in his house, and aspiration in his soul, can the voice of the preacher lose its music when it tells the tale of Infinite Pity and publishes the "glorious gospel of the Blessed God."

* * *

This was the Ideal which I cherished when I began my ministry in Birmingham twenty-eight years ago. It was with a certain fear and trembling I accepted the invitation to become your minister. I came not with any pretensions to the possession of a wisdom greater than that of other men, nor with the least shred of priestly or ecclesiastical authority. I came to be, if God so willed, a friend and comrade on life's journey, to be an encourager of your endeavours and a helper of your excellences. To-day I am painfully conscious of having fallen far short of the Ideal with which I began. My service in this place has been marked by many faults and stumblings. Yet amid all its imperfections—this one thing I have always had before me—to exalt the powers of Faith, Hope, and Charity, as the saving powers of human life, and the sum and substance of the gospel of Jesus. Amid the distractions of our times, the jangling of opinions, the war of creeds, it has been my effort to keep a way open for Religion—a way for the feet of little children, of burdened men and women, and of all who feel the call of the soul within them to realise its high possibilities. I came to preach in a very true sense, the old gospel—not, it may be, the gospel of learned doctors and venerable churches; certainly not the gospel according to Calvin, or Luther, or Augustine; nor yet of necessity the gospel according to Priestley or Channing, but the gospel of the Sermon on the Mount, of the two commandments of love, of the greater parables—the gospel of a Father in Heaven who is Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love, the impassioned, infinite gospel that God has a care for men and wills their eternal welfare. I have waged war against everything in creed, opinion, theology, or worship that would narrow and limit this universal gospel and confine its blessing to a particular church or school of thought. To be entrusted with this gospel I have felt to be an unspeakable honour—its proclamation an unspeakable joy. My one prayer is that under my successor it may have free course, run and be glorified.

And now that we come to the parting of the ways, what shall I say but this—that by your kindness, patience, and sympathy I have been all these years cheered and sustained; that my heart is full of gratitude to our Heavenly Father for permission to labour so long in the vineyard, and full of gratitude to you for your dear and unfailing friendship. May God bless you with His grace and peace, may God bless this Church with increase of life and light, may God bring us all, when earthly partings are over, into the presence of His exceeding joy.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

VALUES OF THE FAITH.

III.

WHEN the problem of revelation, or rather of what we mean when we speak of revelation, presents itself, we can neither forget that our articles of faith are intended to contain and guard truth revealed to men by the Spirit of God nor the fact that our growing knowledge of the process of the human mind has effected, for many of us, changes that are profound, although less so than a first glance or a superficial study would suggest. For it is evident that, in the belief of all men and all ages, a prophet to whom truth had been made known by revelation and who declared that the Lord God had spoken to him would certainly not mean or admit that when he spoke he used the mechanism of human speech. St. Paul, too, when he contrasts what he thinks he has from the Lord with what he is sure he has of himself, does not imply that the revealing voice was uncertainly heard by him, using either Greek or Hebrew, or some half-known tongue.

It is true that there are on record accounts of revelation reaching other men (never the writers of those accounts) in which God communicates his word through means perceptible to sense, notably in the giving of the Commandments on Mount Sinai. But, leaving aside all questions of documentary or historical criticism, we have in this very fact a testimony to the necessary and important part played by man in any process whereby truth is revealed. Whatever may be the pains taken to eliminate the hidden but direct operation of the mind upon that which God communicates, there remains the need to use tools made by the mind, instruments that bear with them the mark of its infirmities as well as of its powers. If God is pictured as dispensing with the interior co-operation of man, and as using a passive, inert material means—the tables of stone—nevertheless he cannot but give his message in words of man's invention, by a means into the character of which the very life of man has passed, with his habits and conditions, his partial knowledge and his ignorance.

And in the message conveyed by every prophet and teacher in all times we always find not only the common tools of language, the massed experience of men as represented in their language, but the character and immediate circumstances of the prophet himself. Therefore the message of one prophet may, and does, differ widely from the message of another, and the prophetic manner alters from generation to generation, is different in one people or in one class of men from what it is in others. Therefore, too, we can never say that any message is infallible; we must always "try the spirits," test our prophets and ourselves, recognise and allow for the human medium and element, and the inadequacy of language to express that which is of "spirit and life." What, then—let us ask ourselves again—do we mean by a divine revelation of truth? How does God convey truth to the minds of men?

A purely external revelation is clearly inconceivable. To reach our minds revelation must become one with our minds, according to their "principle of immanence"; it must enter a man as fulfilling his needs, as making explicit in him that which was implicit. It must become a part of himself, living, interpenetrating, working in him and being worked upon, changing him, but, in its turn, being changed. That is, unless it is given to him as we may give a catchword to a parrot, or a philosophical summary to a child to learn by rote. This, however, is clearly not the way in which God works. He neither writes with his finger on a stone, nor speaks with tongue and lips. His revelation comes to us through the men to whom it is given, not as a parrot-cry or a stated form of words, but as a living voice—the voice of living, intensely living, man. His prophets palpitate with their own life; they are no passive instruments, they spend themselves as they convey what God has given them, and he works upon them according to the principles inherent in the operation of their minds.

The divine touch and communication bring both new stimulus and new power. The man is raised in the scale of his own being; his vision opens; that which he sees is transfigured before him, the "things that are made" take on new significance. There is revealed to him, in short, something more of their inner and divine secret—the secret that is embraced within the meaning and the desire of God. The light of God is shed abroad for him upon the world and man, reflected too upon the prophet himself.

Here, in the communication of God within, and in the reception of the sacrament of truth presented by that which is without, is the process of divine revelation. And in proportion to the glory of the sacrament and the freedom of the divine communication is the degree to which revelation may extend. In relation to all the things that are made, and finally in the consummation of human life by the sacrament of humanity crowned in Jesus Christ, the man who is moved by the divine touch and strengthened by divine might embraces ever more and more of the truth of God, of the world and of himself. "Flesh and blood" have not revealed it to him; he might gaze on these sacraments for ever and receive nothing of their "inward part," if he studied them in the merely discursive and reflective way and had not yielded up his spiritual life to God to be enlightened and enlarged. No man reads the writing of God in the book of earthly life, save by the light given him of God within. The process of revelation is, in fact, one with the uplifting of man to his proper perfection; but it is neither merely within him nor merely without him; it is of the concrete whole of a life and an experience lived in commerce with God, of a spirit permeated by his spirit, an eye that sees by his communicated light.

No man can say that Jesus is the Lord except by grace given him; yet there is nowhere so plain a writing by the finger of God as in him whose face showed men the light of the knowledge of divine glory. Could anything written on stone, even scored across the marvels of the stars, be so plain to see? Yet even this glorious radiance of truth cannot be discerned except by the man whose spirit sees with "the eye of God." All things reveal God to him who has this power of vision, and in the measure of its clearness lies the measure of the revelation given him of God. The prophet, then, is the man who communicates to us, in human speech, his story of that which is revealed to him according to his measure, according to the clearness or obscuring of the inward eye by which he discovers truth presented from without. His spirit feeds on this sacrament of God, given, taken and received; he puts it to use, and grows in the knowledge of divine truth as he is fortified, enlightened and enlarged, through the permeation of his spirit by the Spirit of God given him to become his own.

All truth is of God and comes to man from Him. In a broad sense all truth may be said to be revealed; but truth of "Spirit and life" is revealed, as none other is, by the touch of spirit on spirit, the gift to man of the highest life he can receive.

It is this revelation that gives us the articles of our faith. They have behind them the power and the light of God. But all revealed truth is transmitted to us by human means and under conditions of human imperfection. The words of our dogmatic articles are not pure "spirit and life," although they may convey it. They are sacramental; but they are lacking in the simplicity of those "sacraments of grace" whose vehicle is a mere material thing; for the complexity and imperfection of the mind of man have entered into them.

W. SCOTT PALMER.

THE IDEALS OF THE CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS.

"THE high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard"—apparently such has been the verdict of philosophers upon the idealists of Cambridge in the seventeenth century. No finer or more comprehensive school of thought has ever appeared in England, but its influence was limited in scope and duration. Its power was scarcely felt outside the Universities, and within fifty years it rose and flourished and died away, giving place to its old rivals, Materialism, and a merely mechanical type of Rationalism.

These three systems arose almost simultaneously—Materialism with Hobbes, largely influenced by the new scientific movement originating with Bacon; and Rationalism with Descartes' "Discourse on Method," which was taken up enthusiastically by students of the more intellectual types, including several of the first leaders of the Cambridge Platonists, and at Oxford John Locke, who afterwards became its clearest exponent. The Idealist school found it hopeless to combine these new theories with the philosophy of Plato and Plotinus and the practice of Christianity, and accordingly it consistently opposed Hobbes, rejected Descartes' mechanical theory of the Universe as ingenious but inadequate—for "The primordials of the world are not mechanical but vital"*—and had no wild hopes of the results of the new discoveries in science. Neither in mere rationalism nor in materialism and natural philosophy could the whole content of truth be found, for to them man was not simply a dual creature of mind and body—he had a mysterious but convincingly real spiritual life, which could not be left out of account, and might indeed prove to be his raison d'être.

The Cambridge Platonists were themselves Rationalists in the highest sense of the word, and they also had a due regard for authority, represented by the revealed religion of the Church and the Bible, but uniting Reason and Authority were the facts of individual spiritual experience, forming as it were the keystone of the arch of Faith. In the last resort the test of the Cambridge Platonists was always personal conviction—it is the theme of Whichcote's sermons, of Henry More's voluminous writings, and the discourses of Smith and Culverwel, and it is also the rock upon which was wrecked Cudworth's magnificent attempt at Christian apologetics, "The Intellectual System of the Universe." In a sense they were even "Pragmatists," for they believed not only in what they knew by the senses and the intellect, but also in all those intangible experiences of the spiritual life which are inexplicable and yet effective in their working. Mysticism was then as now a "word of fear," but it cannot be denied that the philosophy of the Cambridge Platonists was of a distinctly mystical character. Cudworth and More were saturated with the spirit of Plotinus (the most Eastern of Greek thinkers), and were influenced by the Hebrew Wisdom-literature, Philo, Clement of Alexandria, and also by the dubious writings attributed to Pythagoras, Hermes Trismegistus, Dionysus the Areopagite, and other discredited or forgotten transcendental philosophers. The Cambridge Platonists recognised a mysterious element in life and the visible Universe, and sought to solve their problems not only by faith and reason, but by the way of the mystics in all times—the refinement of mind and body by the practice of holiness, of self-denial and devotion, until that "Divine Sagacity" is attained to which belongs supernormal insight like that of Dr. More, of whom it was said "All things in a manner came flowing unto him."

* Dr. Henry More's Divine Dialogues.

With all the depth of their learning and the breadth of their thought, the ruling ideas of the Cambridge Platonists were remarkably lucid and simple. They based their belief in the existence of God and the soul not only upon revelation and the consensus of human opinion, but also upon the witness of "the Light within a man." This was not merely conscience, the moral sense, but that which is, and knows itself to be, immortal and "a partaker of the Divine Nature." The inner conviction of this Divine Immanence was indeed the very foundation of all their theories, though Henry More is the only one of this school who can definitely be claimed as a mystic in practice.

The philosophy of this school was more eclectic than original, combining Platonism and Stoicism with the Christianity not only of the Gospels, but of the seventeenth century. Its ethics were certainly Christian, and its theology loyal to the principles of the Church of England, but the metaphysical speculations in which Ralph Cudworth, Henry More and Joseph Glanvil indulged were Neo-Platonic, sometimes to an incomprehensible degree for the uninitiated. Even in their theories of the immortality of the soul there are speculations which may have seemed extremely complex and bewildering to simple minds used to the crudities of Puritan eschatology.

The Cambridge Platonists had clear and definite schemes not only of the "macrocosm" of the universe, visible and invisible, but also of the "microcosm" of the human soul, and its progress through the stages of manifestation. Immortality was the favourite theme of Henry More (whose "Discourse" won the praise of Dr. Johnson a century later), and many who know nothing else of his work will remember that fine verse from the "Song of the Soul"—

"But souls that of his own good life partake
He loves as his own self; dear as his eye
They are to him; He'll never them forsake:
When they shall die, then God himself shall die;
They live, they live in blest eternity."

His theories of the soul and its "vehicles" or bodies are most fully developed in the "Discourse of Immortality." He did not believe in the doctrine of the special creation of every human soul, for he had adopted the Plotinian theory of "emanation," and consequently of transmigration and re-incarnation. The World-Soul from which life comes into consciousness and into which it returns at the death of the body was in his view a threefold soul, vegetative, animal, and human. He did not accept the Eastern notion that it was possible for a human soul to relapse into the form of an animal, but, with most of his followers, he certainly believed in a return to human life after a period of rest and refreshment in the "Aerial" sphere. This was a kind of Purgatory, but was not entirely cut off from communication with the world of living men, and Henry More firmly believed in apparitions from this sphere. Beyond this psychic state he inferred the existence of an "Aethereal" sphere of higher bliss for more thoroughly purified souls, and from this there need be no return to the conditions of human life, though souls might choose to descend to earth to "declare the being and nature of the gods."

This is Henry More's most characteristic doctrine, and he was both the simplest and the most profound teacher of this school. Ralph Cudworth was more scholarly and erudite, but he had less originality of thought or sympathy with practical needs, and he lacked the power of forming a definite system of philosophy. Although he wrote extensively, only a part of his "Intellectual System of the Universe," and a "Treatise on Eternal and Immutable Morality" were published. In the matter of Christian ethics and practice, the discourses of Benjamin Whichcote and John Smith had the greatest influence. Whichcote's sermons are said to have inaugurated the movement in 1644, and, with all their seventeenth century diffuseness, they are still well worth study. "Heaven is first a temper, then a place," he affirmed, and there is a whole philosophy in that simple phrase. From him also comes the watchword of the Cambridge Platonists, "The Spirit of a Man is the Candle of the Lord; Lighted by God and lightening us to God."

The chief reason for the failure of this Idealist movement obviously lies in the fact that its lofty ethics were incompatible with the easy morality and frivolity of the Restoration period. Though there was no gloom or morbidity in their Puritanism, their ideals of conduct went deeper than the ordinary social virtues. They insisted that "Charity, Humility, and Purity," rather than intellectual powers, are the means by which to attain Reality; and self-denial, even to the uttermost degree, the way to knowledge and influence. With all their great learning, the Cambridge Platonists had no sympathy for intellectual pride, and deep study was to them no matter for conceit and display, but simply a duty and a delight. This humility of mind was the first step in their spiritual life, and probably not an easy one, for they had "great possessions." Similarly, Charity was neither formal almsgiving alone nor vague benevolence, but a deep and universal love of humanity and all creation—though unfortunately at this period it often failed in the point of religious tolerance. Their ideal purity also was "a sanctity of soul and body which the sensually-minded do not so much as dream of"—and it was an ideal of inward holiness which could not fail to make the outward life beautiful, calm, and free. There was nothing new in this rule of "Humility, Charity and Purity"—it was only the way of the Buddha, St. Francis, and all the mystics. For they were poets, visionaries, and saints, as well as philosophers—these gentle and wise divines of the seventeenth century, who worked out their ideal theories in the seclusion of their University, taking little heed of the violent changes in Church and State. Perhaps it was a penalty of this aloofness that their speculations so far out-soared the comprehension of their materialistic contemporaries, and that even now there are but few kindred spirits who appreciate the spirituality and sweet reasonableness of their teaching.

WORDS AND MUSIC.

THE alliance of Music and Poetry is probably as old as the arts themselves, and the alliance must be permanent. The early "makers" sang their own creations. The two arts joined into one were no doubt generally fascinating, and the trend of modern music seems to be towards closer alliance with literature. It is a fact that numbers who do not care for either music or poetry considered separately derive pleasure from hearing a song sung, seeing an opera performed, and perhaps, in a less degree, listening to an oratorio. Behind this alliance the artistic mind is subconsciously aware of a higher unity of art and artistic expression towards which it constantly aspires. It is even impatient at times with the limitations of its own medium and yearns for a greater explicitness than its own art affords. There is always "One word more"; and this may be in another language of art. No one has ever stated this feeling so well as Browning in that unique offering to a unique love:

"... No artist lives and longs, that longs not

Once, and only once, and for one only (Ah! the prize!), to find his love a language—

Put to proof art alien to the artist's
Once, and only once, and for one only."

And Dante's picture and Raphael's sonnet were each efforts towards this final synthesis. It is an old contention whether poetry or music approaches more closely to the overlying unity. There are great names on both sides. Shelley in his "Defence of Poetry" claims the highest place for language: "A poem," he says, "is the very image of life expressed in its eternal truth." On the other hand, Pater's well-known dictum that "all art constantly aspires towards the condition of music and the perfection of poetry seems to depend in part on a certain suppression of mere subject, so that the meaning reaches us in ways not distinctly traceable by the understanding," makes a rather specious appeal to us in certain moods of vague desire. This identification of form and matter, "this strange chemistry uniting in the integrity of pure light contrasted elements," was, Pater believed, only reached in music, and the more poetry approximates to music in this identification the more relatively perfect it becomes. There are certain splendid examples of poetry trying "to pass beyond itself and become another art"; and when we are under the glamour of "La Belle Dame sans Merci," the "Grecian Urn," the "Nightingale," "The Eve of St. Agnes," Shelley's "Skylark," "The Blessed Damozel," and even Mrs. Browning's

"Musical Instrument," with its "Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan," it does seem as if the meaning reached us not so much by the words as by their absolute perfection of sound. Francis Thompson in his "Essay on Shelley" sees the masters in the sister arts as already together in the eternal synthesis. For the absolute "virgin-gold of song," scarcest among human products, we can only go, he tells us, to Coleridge, Shelley, Chopin, and Keats; though he warns us afterwards that we should not take thought too greatly for richness of diction in poetry, but seek first (not only) the spirit, and all these things shall be added unto us. When Browning, pre-eminently the poet of music though not the most musical poet, reaches his highest flight in pure poetry, "Abt Vogler," his subject and his imagery are alike of music. He seems to see music as the art of which the "symbols," as Arnold said, are the most nearly "equivalent with the thing symbolised," and is carried by it towards the transcendental unity which "we musicians know." Shakespeare looks for music to that higher air where the "smallest orb" is "still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims," though "whilst this muddy vesture of decay doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it." For Wagner it is "the great pathfinder in the wilderness," and words may be its servants and companions.

We need not multiply examples. Whether Music hovers over the highest peak of Parnassus or not, there is no doubt that the expression of one art in terms of the other—that is, poetry in terms of music—has often resulted in a supreme manifestation of the beautiful in poetry. But in our cooler moments we suspect that no one art can really assert itself as the type nearest to perfection, and that the losing of the matter in a sort of golden bliss induced by the medium will not be the sole or even the perfect development of poetry. Neither art can in the long run do without the other. We show this even in our ordinary speech. When (in Dryden's phrase) we call poetry "music made articulate," when Carlyle says "see deep enough and you see musically," when we speak of a cathedral as "frozen music," of a piece of heroism as "an unwritten poem," of a picture as "a symphony in colour," of a piece of music as "a tone-picture," and use all the other familiar metaphors, we prove the interdependence of the arts. The mystery of one seems to approach some solution by borrowing the imagery of another.

The debt of poetry to music may be conceded as great. The debt of music to poetry, or more largely to the definite medium of words, will not be conceded so readily. To many music's "immortal clarities" seem to be dimmed and materialised by words; and probably with all the very greatest music the intrusion of words would be felt an impertinence. To the true music-lover the modern custom of commenting on or "explaining" a great work of musical art by pages of lurid "word-painting" is surely a weariness to the spirit. If Beethoven cannot reach the soul through his sonata he will not do so through the programme; if he does so speak his subtle language makes the wordy commentary superfluous. Mendelssohn thought the inner meaning of music was much more definite than words, and this must be, one would imagine, the view of the pure musician. Nevertheless, the alliance of Poetry and Music still holds good, and, as we said before, increasingly so to-day. One of the encouraging features of the time is that the younger song-writers who count turn more and more to the lovely things of the sister art that they may "set them to music." The "choristers," the "gloomings," the insipidities and sentimentalisms so much in vogue yesterday seem to be departing. It is, of course, a daring thing to do, a challenging thing—to take flawless verse and try to enhance it by means of music. It requires, in fact, genius. One shudders at the idea of one of Keats's Odes, for example, becoming smirched and dragged by a popular melody. Fortunately, there is little fear of that. The modern school of song-writers looks askance at melody. We have in mind Mr. Frederick Nicholls, a young composer better known to musicians than to the general public, whose essays in songwriting are a noticeable fact in modern music. He has ventured to take Tennyson's and Shakespeare's lyrics and spread about them a beauty of his own which is a worthy shrine. We have before us his latest work, the setting to music of five songs from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses." * Stevenson's mastery of his own vehicle may well make his lovers regard with apprehension the attempt to express an already perfect expression by new harmonies and cadences. This fear is unfounded. Mr. Nicholls is as subtle in his way as Stevenson was in his, and shares in that inter-penetration of sound and sense which was Stevenson's secret. The curious quality of "Where go the Boats?" and "Foreign Lands" is well preserved by Mr. Nicholls's accompaniment. It is a new joy to find favourites in this sympathetic setting, where the wedding of "airs" and "verse" into linked sweetness long drawn out is once more justified.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

THE EUGENICS CONGRESS AND AFTER.

THE first International Eugenics Congress met in London in July of this year. To some extent its meeting marks the advent of a new outlook in society. It had five sections, as follows:—(1) Biology and Eugenics, (2) Practical and Legislative, (3) Education and Eugenics, (4) Sociology and Eugenics, (5) Medicine and Eugenics. The general criticism which can be raised with some truth against this movement, namely that it is directed by the amateur rather than the trained worker, is apparent from this classification, for, of course, Medicine should come under Biology, and in this section the Practice of Eugenics should have been compared with the Practice of Public and Private Health (or Hygiene) and with the Practice of Public and Private Medicine. Nevertheless, the eugenic outlook has almost certainly come to stay, and every thinking man and woman will, ere long, have to ask themselves to what extent changes of mental perspective will be needed by this new appeal.

* Five Songs from "A Child's Garden of Verses." By R. L. Stevenson. Music by Frederick Nicholls. London: J. H. Larroway, 14, Wells-street, Oxford-street, W. 2s. net.

Of course, the plea for race and posterity is not a new one, but what is new is the attempt to scientifically direct the thoughts of men and women towards this end.

EUGENICS A PRACTICE, NOT A SUB-SCIENCE OF BIOLOGY.

If it is not clearly recognised that eugenics is a practice and not a science in itself some very grave errors of thought must arise, for sciences are to some extent self-contained, while every practice depends on the science from which a practice can be deduced. Thus the practices of medicine, surgery, hygiene and eugenics all depend upon studies of men and women (individually or collectively), and the narrower application of eugenics depends solely upon the knowledge which is possessed of one system of our bodies, namely, that one by which parentage is realised and new beings are formed. With that part of parentage that has to do with the nurture of the new being, both before and after birth, eugenics is not concerned, it is only interested in those qualities of parents that cause offsprings to vary from or correspond to the stock from which they have sprung. Eugenics thus depends for its scientific position on our knowledge of heredity, and mainly upon that aspect of heredity which reveals what is perpetuable from parent to child.

To realise this thought clearly is at once to recognise that the practice of eugenics must never outstep the most positive and certain teachings of heredity, and as our knowledge of heredity is at the present time rudimentary, only that evidence which is unchallengeable is available for eugenic practice. It is therefore necessary to note that the only human types that have been the subjects of close study up to the present time are idiots and imbeciles, and, while knowledge is rapidly accumulating, nothing is yet known with certainty about the genius, the criminal, the ordinary citizen, and those individuals who are unhealthily predisposed to disease, and only little is known of the feeble-minded. There appears to have been no paper at the Eugenic Congress which has in any way helped to clear up these difficulties. It is most essential to realise these facts, otherwise legislation will outstep the bounds of the scientific knowledge upon which it ought to depend for its foothold.

This admission does not mean that heredity and eugenics can be dismissed from the social horizon, for the one certain fact which students of heredity have established, in general terms, it is true, but nevertheless unquestionably, is that heredity is transcendent in every direction over environment, and that the eugenic factor must be recognised in the future, though we must move very cautiously to-day.

The importance of eugenics, its dependence upon hereditary knowledge and the backwardness of this knowledge at the present time, are the first essentials for us all to grasp. What are other points where a clear apprehension of the outlook is required?

HUMAN LOVE AND EUGENICS.

Writing in the least controversial manner, with the object merely of stating what is little more than an historical fact, it is certain that, broadly interpreted, the social advance of man has been associated with an increasingly definite element of comradeship between the man and woman who become parents, and that one basis of modern marriage is this comradeship or love factor. Sir Francis Galton claimed that partiality and preference for certain individuals could in its early stages be modified by holding up a different social ideal; that, in fact, human love could be directed towards some human types and away from others; and to some extent, no doubt, such a contention rests on reality. The objection to marrying cousins is, as he claimed, a case in point. Oliver Wendell Holmes also believed that association of men and women formed a large part in the factor of love. But while not wholly denying this, careful study of married people does not bear this out. Most marriages, especially among working class people, have far more in common in the aims of husband and wife than is usually supposed. And a marriage for eugenic reasons, that lacked the love factor, would not only be cold and often unhappy, but it would be against modern social evolutionary tendencies, which favour this natural understanding between parents, not only for the sake of the husband and wife themselves but for the children that are born to them. Where ideals of husband and wife differ widely, the mutual aid and assistance in the interpretation of their children's minds, one of the greatest helps is lost, and discordant views of upbringing favour lack of discipline and lack of sympathy, the two things most essential to wise understanding of child life. I know that in France the loveless marriage is the custom, and that Germany and other countries value love less than ourselves, but the lower moral standard of French literature is a sufficient counter-argument, and the tendency of evolution even in French and Continental life generally was until quite recently towards the English ideal, and the recent movement in most countries towards easier divorce laws is not only against religious teaching, but also against the steadily lengthening demands of child nurture and the pushing upward of the immature period of child life, so that the school age is tending to be increasingly prolonged and the child more and more dependent upon the parents. There is no likelihood, therefore, that the love marriage will be replaced by the eugenic one of mating, and the eugenicist must not only acknowledge this fact, as for the most part he wisely does, but he must set to work to answer the question, to what extent the eugenic claim can be admitted in marriage without hurtfully prejudicing this ideal of human love. This is not a matter for speculation, but for inquiry to discover if the selection of love is or is not eugenic in its influence, and to discover where eugenic moral reasons ought to prohibit the love ideal being realised in marriage and parentage. I have dwelt rather lengthily upon this point, for I believe it is the central theme in the eugenic horizon.

OTHER DIFFICULTIES.

There are many other difficulties that must be faced before eugenics can be said to rest on a sure foundation. Foremost among these is the relation of the eugenic to the hygienic ideal. If the tendency of hygiene, which is to humanely preserve all life born, is anti-eugenic, and the struggle for social betterment has resulted not only in types being born which must otherwise have died, for this is of course the fact, but that these types are less fitted for the demands of modern civilisation, and this has to be established; if this contention of the survival of the socially unfit by improved hygiene were once proved, one of the most awkward deadlocks in science would be produced, and eugenic and hygienic practices would alike suffer. One thing is, however, certain, that until this and some other difficulties are clearly met no real advance in the subject will be made. There still remains, after these points are settled, the discussion of what method of inquiry shall be adopted for the determination of the question as to who are the eugenically unfit and who the fit. Sir Francis Galton believed, and Professor Karl Pearson believes, that probability is the foundation of eugenics, that the method of inquiry must be mainly mathematical. The medical method is that of an individual personal inquiry, and a diagnosis made upon facts which are unequivocal, or nearly so. I feel little hesitation in asserting that the latter method is the more scientific, and far less open to the possibility of error; but, again, until medical men are agreed, firstly to accept the thought of eugenics, and secondly to apply it by a method that they all accept, no real advance can be made.

THE PLACE OF RELIGION.

What part shall religion play in this movement is perhaps for us all the most necessary question to ask ourselves. Eugenics presents, as we have seen, a new point of view, and cannot be dismissed or disregarded, nor must the religious student disregard its appeal. I believe in three ways he can be of real, tangible assistance: (1) By keeping the largest and noblest value of man, individually and socially, before his fellows, so that the danger of the physical mating aspect of the subject can be effectually met, and in this respect upholding unhesitatingly the ideal of marriage on its loftier mental side, and opposing the tendency towards easier divorce, while favouring every healthy influence that makes the careless entrance into marriage less frequent. (2) By raising the common thought of the mass of the people about the value of human and even animal life, and teaching them to realise its sacredness in all its aspects. This means almost a new education both for old and young. (3) The insistence upon the grandeur of unselfishness and of human brotherhood. No observant student of social life can doubt that we are on the verge of important social changes, changes which will demand for a healthy national life real sacrifices from all classes for the maintenance of a developing, noble, national ideal. The mother will be asked to think of her child in a newer, higher, but nevertheless more binding light; the father will be asked for help and assistance in the home after his day's work, and for the cessation of some of his outside social activities; the problem of a real living wage will never again fall below the horizon of modern civilisation, and for the moneyed classes this problem must be sooner or later understood and accepted. For the worker also, his life must no longer remain on the lower plane of bodily pleasure that, with some notable exceptions, is now the case. Physical sport, gambling, alcohol, and low quality of work must be alike struggled against. For one and all sacrifice, as in all past ages, will be demanded for the birth of a new life.

For this the Christian appeal in its broadest and strongest intensity ought to be of real assistance to man, and the eugenic movement will be only one of many others that needs the upholding of this unselfish aim, but it, and they, will need it if success is to be attained.

To sum up eugenics is a real point of view, it is a practice, not a science, depending upon heredity which is still in a backward state; its activity will depend not only upon hereditary applications to life, but upon a non-conflicting co-operation of its methods with human love and hygienic ideals, upon a sound method of applying its aims and upon the co-operation of the religious spirit of unselfishness with the other ideals of social reformers. "To climb steep hills requires slow pace at first," and the upholders of eugenics will be wise if they build their foundations deeply and strongly, and are not too hurried in their efforts to obtain practical results before the kind of superstructure that they would build has become clear to them.

J. LIONEL TAYLER.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE LATE REV. CHARLES VOYSEY.

SIR,—I am sure that many of your readers will share my disappointment in reading your notice of the death of the veteran fighter in the cause for free religious thought who for the first time was with the majority on the 30th inst. While recognising the late Rev. Charles Voysey as "a man of transparent sincerity and warm personal piety," you sum up his individuality as consisting of "intellectual prejudices and peculiarities," and you speak of "his lack of imaginative sympathy with the great Christian forces by which he was surrounded." As one who came in contact with the minister of Swallow-street from time to time during his long life, I hope you will allow me to say that my experience of Mr. Voysey leaves quite other memories of his personality. It was the fact that he was intellectual that kept him free from prejudices. Like all other men of character, he had peculiarities, but that word without explanation grates on the reader when applied to one whose peculiarities were of such a noble character as those which made Mr. Voysey what he was. Instead of a lack of sympathy with the great Christian "forces" of our time, any record of Mr. Voysey's life will show that he not only had every sympathy with these "forces," but was no small factor in their being. I venture to think that it would be difficult to point to any one of the great movements, philanthropic or educational, in which the Christian "forces" of our time have manifested themselves, in which Mr. Voysey did not take an active part. He not only supported these movements, but was a pioneer in many. You doubtless are right in saying that "the extent and radical nature of Mr. Voysey's heresies" made his expulsion from the Anglican Church inevitable. But like many another inevitable defeat, it was better to have fought and lost, better to have made the effort to still further widen the basis of the Church, the narrowness of which he only saw after entering it, than to have voluntarily accepted the powers that be as the powers that are to continue to be. If he failed to secure within the Anglican Church the liberty for which he fought, his action made more secure the lesser freedom which for the time satisfied the Robertsons, the Colensos, and the Stanleys of the English Church.—Yours, &c.,

MARK H. JUDGE.

7, Pall Mall,
July 29, 1912.

[We are glad to have the opportunity of publishing our correspondent's tribute; but perhaps we may point out that we did not sum up Mr. Voysey's individuality as consisting of intellectual prejudices and peculiarities. We simply said that his intellectual prejudices and peculiarities made it difficult for him to co-operate with other people, which is a very different thing.—ED. of INQ.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE RELIGION OF THE PHARISEES.

Pharisaism, its Aim and its Method. By R. Travers Herford, B.A. London: Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.

THE object of Mr. Herford may be clearly stated in his own words. He maintains that the religion of the Pharisees was "a real expression of spiritual experience, the inspiration of holy living and holy dying," that its best disciples loved God with their whole heart and soul, yea, and their "neighbour as themselves." I may say at once that he, in my opinion, has completely proved his thesis. It is not for one like myself, ignorant of Rabbinic literature, to estimate the work of a distinguished scholar like Mr. Herford. But one feels throughout that one is in the hands of a competent and impartial guide. The presentation of the matter is excellent. Mr. Herford writes in a clear and interesting way, and the writer of these lines can testify that he had read every syllable of Mr. Herford's book through twice at least, without the slightest weariness.

In his historical sketch we are reminded that Pharisaism is really Judaism as established by Ezra and maintained ever since. It would, of course, be absurd to call Ezra a Pharisee; still, he promulgated that divine revelation of His will which the God of Israel had made in the Pentateuch, and the Pharisees were the legitimate heirs of his spirit and of his authority. Not, indeed, the immediate heirs. When there was in the Jewish people an inclination to adopt Greek usages, the Chasidim or "saints" set their face like flint against the slightest concession to the attractions of Greek culture. Again, when under Maccabean rulers, the purity of Jewish religion was contaminated by admixture of secular politics, the Pharisees contended for Jewish religion in its strictest form. They were well called Pharisees, because they formed themselves into voluntary associations, pledged to observe certain rules of ethical and ceremonial purity, these rules being handed down by written law or by the tradition of the Scribes. At the present day nobody calls himself a Pharisee, but orthodox Judaism in the twentieth century represents in substance the teaching of the Pharisaic doctors.

No doubt, as Mr. Herford urges, Pharisaism has been unduly depreciated, because it has been considered with constant reference to Christianity. We may say that its chief use has been supposed to lie in acting as a foil to the later and nobler religion. Yet how great are the achievements of that legal religion which has been so much despised! It cannot be called a sacerdotal religion. Priests, to be sure, were required for the temple ritual, but the real authority was vested in the Scribes, the men learned in the law. It was to them that the most extravagant praise was ascribed, and it was they who were fiercest in their opposition to Christ. For good or evil, they are the representative men of Israel, and a moral and religious law which needs to be interpreted and applied is certainly a higher ideal than that of a priest with mysterious and supernatural powers. Moreover, in the Synagogues worship reached the highest point known in pre-Christian times. Here we have a spiritual service of praise and thanksgiving without material sacrifice. The origin of the Synagogues is obscure. They began after Ezra, they were already old and familiar in the time of the Maccabees. The order observed consisted of prayer, reading of the law and the prophets, and a "word of exhortation" from anyone who felt inclined to speak when asked to do so by the president. The man, whoever he may have been, who discovered the Synagogue made the first experiment in congregational worship, and the impulse which he gave survives at this hour, not only in Judaism, but all over Christendom. It is not too much to say that Christianity, the purer it is, holds the more closely to the forms of the Jewish Synagogue. It would be a mistake to suppose that the Synagogue worship was formal and unfriendly to earnestness in prayer. On the contrary, the pious Jew is admonished thus: "When thou prayest, make not thy prayer a fixed form but a prayer for mercy and an entreaty before God." The Jew in a prayer dating from the second century of our era and still in the liturgy, approaches God not "trusting in his own righteousness" but in God's "abundant mercies." The familiar words our "Father in heaven" are Jewish as well as Christian, and we have no reason to suppose that they failed in the past, or fail now in the present, to awake filial trust and love in many a Jewish heart. There may have been Jews, as there are assuredly many Christians, who claim a divine recompense for their good works. The following sayings of great Rabbis quoted by Mr. Herford, show how unfair it would be to charge the Rabbinical school, as a whole, with the inculcation of selfish motives for serving God. We are to "delight in the commandments, not in the reward of the commandments." "Be not like servants who serve their master for a reward." "The reward of one commandment is the opportunity to fulfil another." Of course earnest Jews knew very well that they were sinful men. But the Rabbis accentuate in the strongest way the truth that God's love is deeper than man's sin. "If ye come to Me" in repentance for sin, however heinous, "is it not to your Father in heaven that you come?" The Psalms, many of which were Maccabean, and some of which were in all probability written in Pharisaic times and in the Pharisaic spirit, prove abundantly that Pharisaic religion in the experience of its followers was felt to be a joy and a privilege and not a burden. "O how I love thy law! All the day long is my pleasure in it." "His delight is in the law of his God." Much in the same way, Catholics, if in earnest, delight in the law of their Church and accept its minutest observance with love and gratitude.

The reason why St. Paul could find no rest in Judaism, or Luther in Catholicism, is a question which cannot be discussed briefly and by the way. We may, however, find space for reference to one or two important points on which we venture to criticise Mr. Herford. He contends that St. Paul was misled, and misled others, in translating "torah," which is the object of Jewish reverence, by the word νόμος or law. Now we all know that torah was not originally restricted to the sense of a legal code. It is used of instruction in the widest sense, whether human or divine, prophetic or priestly. We must not, however, forget that in the Pentateuch torah had been rendered by νόμος two centuries and a half before the birth of Christ, so that we can hardly blame St. Paul for doing what everybody did. Besides, there are many passages in the Hebrew Bible where law in a just rendering; nay, the Pentateuch itself may justly be called law from the legal element which makes up the largest and most important part of it. It was the legal part which engaged the chief attention of the Scribes. It was their glory that they made the dead law into a living principle which threw its light on new questions of ritual or moral importance as they arose. Now it is possible to maintain that a legal religion is by its very nature inadequate to express the relations between God and the human soul. We can reach through Christ religion in its simplest and purest form. But a Pharisee bound to the law cannot, as Christ did, set aside the distinction between clean and unclean food. True, Christians have grievously marred the simplicity of Christ by an overgrowth of dogma and ritual. Still, the reforming spirit never has died out in the Christian Church, and appeal to Christ and His teaching lies open to all.

Again, the Lord drew lessons of wisdom from the Bible, and also, as we may well believe, from the traditional wisdom of the Scribes. Parallels may be found in Rabbinical literature to some of the phrases in the Lord's Prayer, and even to parts of the Sermon on the Mount. But we have to recognise the fact that in Christ's teaching all is pure gold; there is no admixture of baser metal. We are willing to make, for the argument's sake, every concession to the Jewish way of looking at things, and to be content with the admission that no other teacher can compare with Christ for purity and simplicity of religion. Before Christ came the Fatherhood of God was "not utterly unknown." It was, however, Christ who took the faith in the Fatherhood of God from the circumference and set it in the centre of religion. To see this, one has only to contrast the two or three verses in the Old Testament and the Apocrypha where God's Fatherhood in relation to individual souls is implied or stated, with the rich and profound treatment of the same theme in the New Testament, especially in the Synoptic Gospels. Once more, the Jews subordinated the prophets to the law. Christ reversed this method, and the light which came in Him passed on to the Gentiles. Israel, on the other hand, has fallen from its high calling, and has ceased since the Christian era to influence in any great degree the religious life of the world at large. Spinoza is the one great religious teacher among Jews of a later date and Spinoza was not a Jew.

However, I do not wish to end by expressing difference of opinion. I should prefer to say, in conclusion, that Mr. Herford's great knowledge puts him under a positive obligation of imparting it more than he has done for others. Seldom are attractive style and profound knowledge of an obscure and, at first sight, repulsive subject united in one man. Why does not Mr. Herford give us a book on the plan of Weber's, but with more insight, and eager to appreciate rather than to depreciate, the fruit of "il lungo studio e il grande amore"?

W. E. ADDIS.

THE WORKS OF BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.
Vol. X. Edited by A. R. Waller,
M.A., Cambridge. At the University
Press. 4s. 6d. net.

MR. WALLER has finished his undertaking and takes leave of us very modestly in this volume. We thank him for a hard task well done. This concluding volume has in it much that is precious to those who love the "bards of passion and of mirth." It has Beaumont's lines to Ben Jonson, which bring us straight to the Mermaid among that company which epitomised completely the Elizabethan Age, its imagination, its audacity, its fearless revelry in the whole of life. Then there is Beaumont's "Masque of the Inner Temple," dedicated to Bacon. "These Things are but Toys," Bacon has said, but then this is the charming toy of a charming age, and its bits of song indeed find us young and always keep us so. The tragedy of "Thierry and Theodoret," with which the volume opens surely has not much of Beaumont in it. The moral attitude reads more like Massinger. The contrast of the wicked and chaste women is typically Elizabethan, but not even the praise of Charles Lamb can warm the limp and languid Ordella, and the wicked Brunhilt is a squalid sinner after all. "The Woman Hater" has some of the qualities we know so well in Elizabethan comedy. The Epicurean gentleman makes poetry of the things for the stomach, and I think must have furnished hints to the Milton of the "Paradise Regained" on the spreading of tables; then the Woman Hater himself has the fine exaggeration of his class, and the man who affects learning is a pleasing variation of type. "The Nice Valour" is an exercise in the fantastic. The coward is admirable, he adds logic to instinct, and is more reasonable than the hero of "Arms and the Man." And in this comedy are those two songs, the one dying of melancholy and the other of splitting laughter. Did these suggest to Milton his immortal contrast? Frank Beaumont and Jack Fletcher—there is something touching in the friendship of these poets who lived together and are said to have shared the same clothes. These volumes continue the tradition, and after all it is difficult to tell which from the other in the matter of genius. Both had a dainty lyric gift, both had a vein of comic power, and Fletcher, if he did write the Wolsey scenes of Henry VIII. was almost as great a master of fine style as Beaumont.

CHRISTIANITY AND BUSINESS. By Edward
Grubb, M.A. London: T. Fisher
Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.

THE Editor of The British Friend has revised and expanded into a little book some chapters which appeared in his paper as the result of a discussion on Business Morality, introduced at the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, in May, 1911. None is better fitted to discuss this question than a member of the community to which he belongs, and the book is written with all the candour and grasp of the Quaker spirit at its best. There is no shirking of issues or failure to state the facts. As Mr. Grubb says at the outset, the problem is how to meet the fact that "Christianity has not yet shown, unless in certain small and isolated and temporary communities, that it is able to embody and express itself in the social and industrial life of men. Unless it can find the way to do so, it can hardly become a world religion." He discusses the ethics of competition, co-operation, socialism, and in a concluding chapter shows how far in his opinion the Socialist criticism of society is valid and where he is obliged to part company with it. The book contains a great deal of thought compressed into very small space, and would be an admirable manual for elder scholar classes or adult schools to take as a text book for study. We should like also to see it widely circulated on the Stock Exchange and various other places, which are the mainsprings of commerce and industry.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS:—Outdoor Philosophy: S. D. Kirkham.

MR. A. H. STOCKWELL:—St. Paul's Misconceptions: Emil P. Berg. 3s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—Great Issues: Robert F. Horton. New edition. 2s. 6d. net.
The Gift of Sleep: Bolton Hall. 5s. net.

THE NATIONAL FOOD REFORM ASSOCIATION:—Our Children's Health at Home and at School. Edited by C. Hecht, M.A. 5s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Contemporary Review, The Nineteenth Century, The Cornhill Magazine, The International Journal of Ethics, The Expository Times, Mind.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOHN MILTON.
1608-1674.

II.

"My song shall be of mercy and judgment: unto Thee, O Lord, will I sing."—Ps. ci.

WHILE Milton was with Cromwell he went quite blind. His blindness was brought on by studying too hard, and you can think what a trouble it must have been to him to be shut off from all books, as he was now, and from seeing the faces of his friends. He has written one beautiful sonnet (a sonnet is a short piece of poetry of fourteen lines) about his blindness, in which he tells us how he was tempted to fall into despair when he remembered that God had given him this gift of poetry (a "talent" he calls it, comparing himself to the man in the parable) to make the best of, and how he was hindered from doing this by his blindness; then how he comforted himself by thinking that God had hundreds of other people who were well and active and able to do His bidding "and post o'er land and water without rest," and that "they also serve who only stand and wait"; that is to say, that if one is not able to do anything else, one is serving God just as truly by waiting patiently until He pleases to take us out of this world. But in spite of his blindness, Milton wrote his greatest poem afterwards, as we shall see, by the help of the patience which he learnt at this time.

Cromwell died in 1658, and we know that Milton thought him a very great man by another sonnet which he has written to him, beginning, "Cromwell, our chief of men," praising him for all his battles, and finishing by begging him to hold out against the bishops and priests who wished to make slaves of people's minds. Two years after Cromwell died, King Charles II. came to the throne, and Milton was for a short time thrown into prison, because he had been an enemy of Charles I., but a friend, another poet, persuaded the King to let him out. When an enemy of Milton's said after this to the King that he wondered he did not punish him more, the King answered, "He is punished enough; he is old, poor, and blind." Yet though to most people this would have been a hard punishment, to Milton it mattered very little, for he lived in a world of his own thoughts, which were better than any of the riches or honours which many people seek after. He lived quietly in his house in Bunhill Fields, London, thinking over his great poem that he was now just beginning to write. For years past he had been thinking what kind of a poem would interest everybody, whether they were English or foreign, and at last he fixed upon the story of the Bible—how Adam and Eve disobeyed God and were driven out of Paradise, and how our Lord Jesus Christ taught us the way to live and die so as to reach Heaven, though we cannot go back to the Garden of Eden again. So Milton called his poem "Paradise Lost," and the second part, which tells of the life and death of Christ, he called "Paradise Regained." They are "songs of mercy and judgment."

Perhaps you wonder how he wrote poems when he was blind. Well, he did it in this way. He thought out his grand lines in his head, and then repeated them to his daughters, and they wrote them down for him. He had also taught his daughters Greek and Hebrew, that they might read to him in these languages. We know from the accounts of other writers living then how he passed his days at this time. He rose every morning at 5 o'clock, listened to a chapter of the Hebrew Bible, and studied till mid-day; he had his mid-day meal at one o'clock, then he went out and walked for an hour; after that he usually played for another hour on the organ or viol (a sort of fiddle), for he was a good musician, and this must have been a great comfort to him when he was blind; then he studied and wrote again, and in the evening visitors and friends used to come to see him and talk with him. They describe him as being clad in black, sitting in a room hung with faded green tapestry. His hair was light brown, and fell down on each side of a face that in his old age was still beautiful; his eyes were clear and grey, and showed no signs of blindness. He was of middling height, and was strong and muscular and a good swordsman; he always ate very little. Shakespeare and other great men who had lived in Elizabeth's reign were still living when he was a boy so he must have been able to talk about all kinds of interesting things. He finished "Paradise Lost" in 1665, and sold it to a bookseller for £5, which seems ridiculously little to us; but people did not know then so well what a very great poem it was; indeed, it was only after his death that Milton was thought as much of as he deserved to be.

In 1666 came the Plague of London, a terrible time, when hundreds of people died every week (1,500 died during one week of September), and soon afterwards the Great Fire, which burnt down nearly half of the town. Milton went into Buckinghamshire to escape the Plague, and while there he wrote "Paradise Regained," and a very fine poem on the story of Samson which we can see he thought was like his own life in many ways, for Samson in his old age was blind, poor, and despised, and living among the Philistines, his enemies. Milton lost a good deal of property by the Fire, so he became poorer than ever; but after all this did not matter much, as he was very near his end. He returned to London after the Fire, and died there in 1674.

A monument has been put up to him in Westminster Abbey, but he is best remembered by his poems. They are some of the greatest works ever written in any language, and when we think of them we should remember how Milton was firstly a great man, and secondly a great poet, for unless you have a noble mind and heart you cannot write words that are noble. So you must remember that that is the greatness of poetry—the reason why we ought to love it and learn things worth knowing from it. It is not just a set of pretty rhymes; it is wisdom spoken by a man or woman who is much more highly gifted and often nobler than most people living. Of the three poets I have told you about in recent articles—Caedmon, Chaucer and now Milton—Caedmon and Milton are the most alike, for they both wrote about the Bible story, though Caedmon was only an ignorant man and Milton was a scholar. But they were each of them true poets, and we should be thankful for both.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. ANDREW CHALMERS.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death in his 72nd year, of the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, which took place at St. John's Mount, Wakefield, on July 24. He had been seriously ill since Christmas, and his death was not unexpected. Mr. Chalmers was born on August 1, 1840, at Hythie, in Aberdeenshire. In early life his intellectual position was profoundly modified by the study of Darwin's Origin of Species, and he resolved to enter the Unitarian ministry. He attended classes at Berlin and Heidelberg during 1868-9, and from 1869 to 1872 he was a theological student at Manchester New College, London. On entering the ministry in 1872 he settled at Oldham, moving to Cambridge in 1877. In 1880 he was appointed to Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, in connection with which his name will be long and affectionately remembered. During his ministry, which lasted for twenty-nine years, the ancient chapel was restored, and its present appearance will be a permanent memorial to his taste and to the devoted care with which he attended to everything which could enhance the beauty and helpfulness of the services. For a number of years he served the Yorkshire Unitarian Union as treasurer, and in 1899 was its president. In Wakefield itself he was widely respected as a citizen of noble ideals, and a zealous worker on behalf of education and public health. He also had a considerable reputation as a local antiquarian. In this connection the Wakefield Herald says of him:—

"As a local antiquary and folk-lorist Mr. Chalmers had no rival. When presiding at the remarkable lecture 'From Milnes' House to Crewe Hall,' the Right Hon. C. Milnes Gaskell declared that Mr. Chalmers certainly knew far more about his family than he did himself. He knew by heart every scrap of the history of old Wakefield, including the annals of Westgate Chapel, with which were associated many of the former notabilities of the town."

Mr. Chalmers found a great deal of quiet pleasure in devotional writing. He composed several hymns as well as a series of litanies for use in Westgate Chapel. He also ventured into other fields of authorship, and published several years ago "A Red Cross Romance," a verse chronicle of heroic deeds, and "Transylvanian Recollections."

The funeral service, which was held at Westgate Chapel on Friday, July 26, was largely attended by members of the congregation and representatives of the various public bodies with which Mr. Chalmers had been connected. The Rev. W. T. Davies, minister of the chapel, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Leeds, officiated. In the course of his address Mr. Shanks said that he wished to speak some words which would, in some small measure, indicate their feelings and his own regarding the great loss they had suffered as a congregation, as a town, and as a community of Christian men and women. Mr. Chalmers had not been taken suddenly. They had long been waiting for the one clear call, which had come at last; and now he had entered into the higher life of thought and feeling. He had laboured for the betterment of their homes, their schools and hospitals, and their highest interests generally. He had done his work, let them thank God for it.

The remains were afterwards cremated, and the ashes interred in the churchyard of Mr. Chalmers' native village in Aberdeenshire.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE RETIREMENT OF THE REV.

JOSEPH WOOD.

MEETING AND PRESENTATION IN BIRMINGHAM.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE HALL, Birmingham, was crowded on the evening of Wednesday, July 24, when the congregation of the Old Meeting Church and many other friends assembled on the occasion of the Rev. Joseph Wood's retirement from the Old Meeting pastorate and from regular ministerial work. Mr. Wood is so well known and so greatly honoured throughout the churches he has served so long that no words are needed to tell of the importance of the event, particularly in connection with the liberal religious movement in Birmingham and the Midlands. After twenty-eight years of strenuous labour in Birmingham Mr. Wood has laid down his charge, and it only remained to make some suitable recognition of the large service he had rendered and to bid him God speed. In the proceedings on Wednesday there was necessarily an undertone of sadness, but quite as deep and strong was the note of gratitude and of admiration. Many letters of regret for inability to be present were read by Mr. Madeley Mole, the junior warden of the Old Meeting Church, amongst others from the Lord Mayor of Birmingham (Alderman Bowater), the Bishop of Birmingham, Principal Carpenter, Dr. John Hunter, of Glasgow, and the Revs. H. Gow and J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Mr. George Yoxall, the senior warden, presided, and after speaking of the purpose of the meeting, and the influence of Mr. Wood on the members of his church, illustrated the latter point from his own experience. He had been led through questioning and doubt to clearer thought, a higher outlook, and a deeper moral life. He then moved the following resolution: "The members of the Old Meeting Church desire to record their appreciation of the great services rendered to the congregation and the cause of Liberal Religion by the Rev. Joseph Wood during the twenty-eight years he has been its minister, and to express the hope that retirement from active work may enable him to enjoy many years of renewed health and happiness."

The resolution was seconded by Alderman Sir James Smith, who said they must not look merely on the sad side in bidding farewell to Mr. Wood. In setting their pastor free from the responsibilities of office they were giving him the opportunity of much-needed and well-earned rest, and the opportunity of new forms of happiness in many directions.

Many other speakers then supported the resolution in brief speeches, paying their tribute to the work and influence of Mr. Wood.

Alderman Sir George Kenrick spoke on the services rendered by Mr. Wood in connection with education. He referred to the old struggle for the establishment of School Boards in which Mr. Wood had played a foremost part. He soon showed that he had a thorough grasp of educational matters and a vast sympathy with the people. The members of the old School Board soon felt that they had in Mr. Wood a colleague capable of giving them a lead. In this they were not mistaken, as events proved.

Lieut.-General Phelps spoke as one of the older members of the congregation, and was followed by Mr. W. J. Cross, who on behalf of the schools and classes expressed the deep gratitude all felt to their pastor. Mr. Wood, he said, had done no finer work than that among the young people of the church. He was leaving to his successor a great and flourishing enterprise. Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, representing the Midland Christian Union, referred to Mr. Wood's services on behalf of Liberal Christianity in the Midland district, and the Rev. J. W. Austin, representing the ministers, gave expression to the great affection in which he was held by his colleagues, and spoke of the high lead he had always given them in religious work.

Further warm tributes were paid by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, Dr. S. M. Crothers, who referred to Mr. Wood's many connections with America, and Mr. Septimus Harding; and then Mr. Ernest Martineau, in a short moving speech, presented to Mr. Wood a cheque for £1,100 subscribed by members of the congregation, the institutions connected with the church, and a few other friends. Mr. A. J. Cotton, on behalf of the choir, presented a copy of a Raphael Madonna. The motion was then put, and carried with acclamation, all standing.

Mr. Wood, in his reply, thanked his friends from the bottom of his heart for all their kindness, patience, generosity, and willing co-operation during the twenty-eight years of his ministry. They had journeyed together over a long period of time. He had been permitted to share their joys and sorrows. He had stood in hope and gladness with some of them at the marriage altar, and with many in grief at the open grave. Together they had shared the bitter-sweet cup of life. It had been one of the greatest blessings of his life to have won their friendship. No man could desire a more affectionate congregation. He also counted it one of his great privileges to have been the first minister of the new Old Meeting Church, and to have been allowed to give it a certain character—to have had the joy of making its pulpit an influence, not for sectarianism, nor denominationalism, nor theological disquisition, but for Liberal Religion, the life of charity, and freedom of the spirit. Since he began preaching, fifty years ago, great changes in the thoughts and outlook of men had taken place; the political world had changed, the social outlook was quite different, the churches and their message had received another emphasis. In that time such a change had passed over theology and preaching as amounted to a revolution. This was true of all the churches: they none of them stood exactly where they did half a century ago. There was much greater freedom with regard to the Bible and Biblical criticism. Even bishops admitted the presence of a human and fallible element in the sacred writings. Then, happily, there was a great difference between the attitude of religion to science and of science to religion. Anything like the famous encounters fifty years ago at Oxford between Professor Huxley and Bishop Wilberforce would to-day be impossible. There had also been a great change in doctrinal exposition. No treatise on theology could now be written with the phraseology current fifty years ago, nor from that point of view. In bringing about these changes the Liberal Christian Churches had played a conspicuous part. They had been in the van of the movement; they had carried the banner of progress and made these great advances possible. But let them not think the task was at an end. Theirs was still the larger faith, the wider knowledge, the more catholic vision. In the future, as in the past, let them rise to the responsibilities of their glorious gospel.

The meeting concluded with the hymn "We come unto our fathers' God," and the Benediction pronounced by Mr. Wood.

JOHN POUNDS HOUSE.

THE annual public meeting and "pound day" of this Institution was held on Saturday afternoon, July 13. Mrs. Bertram Falle, wife of the Junior Member for Portsmouth, took the chair, and was supported by Mrs. Pollard, Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Langelaan, Mrs. Carling, Miss Spencer, Mr. J. W. Gieve, J.P., and Mrs. S. Rogers (hon. sec.). There was a fair attendance, and some of the girls—inmates of the Home—were present, looking smart and neat in their white aprons and caps.

Upon taking the chair Mrs. Falle said she had that morning received a letter from an old friend who was 90 years of age, who knew John Pounds and could remember his little shop. The letter which Mrs. Falle read expressed the hope that the meeting would be a success and help those who were continuing his work upon somewhat different lines, to perpetuate his memory in the manner he would most have desired. Proceeding, Mrs. Falle said great results often arose from very small beginnings, and the Home which, when first opened, was only able to deal with a very few girls, now placed out some 50 annually, so helping many of the most uncared-for girls to a respectable and useful life. Employers all felt the difficulty of getting good servants, and in this connection the Home should be supported in every possible way. One great point she noted was that the Home was not in debt; it was much more satisfactory to give money for current expenses than for debts that had been incurred. All honour was due to the lady who had given so much of her life to the Institution and kept its head above water.

Mrs. Rogers read the secretary's report, which spoke of the steady growth of the Home, 50 girls being received annually. Applications for servants far outnumbered the supply—four times the number of girls could easily have been placed out had the funds permitted. Mrs. Rogers said that the fact of mothers bringing their daughters one after the other as they left school, and old girls who were married or in service their sisters and friends, showed that they really appreciated the Home and the help given there. In the absence of the treasurer, Mrs. Langelaan, chairman of the committee, read his report, which showed a small balance in hand. She pointed out that £106 3s. 6d. subscriptions, and £145 7s. donations, left a large amount to be raised by other means, the year's expenditure being £420 16s. 7d., and asked for increased and new subscriptions, which would greatly lessen the work and anxiety.

Encouraging addresses were given by Mrs. Pollard, Miss Spencer, Mr. J. W.

Gieve, J.P., and Mr. Thompson, all of whom urged upon those present to make the Home known to their friends and to do their best to further its objects. Votes of thanks closed a very successful gathering. A goodly number of "pounds" were sent by friends and well-wishers in groceries and other things, also several cheques and postal orders from friends at a distance.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Aberdare.—On Thursday, July 25, a meeting of the members of the Highland-place Unitarian Church was held in honour of Miss S. George, Headmistress of the Higher Standard School, and daughter of the late Rev. J. J. George. During the evening a handsome presentation was made to Miss George on behalf of 105 subscribers to commemorate her long and faithful services as organist.

Accrington.—The last of a series of seven open-air meetings was held on Thursday evening, July 25, when the Rev. W. J. Piggett, of Burnley, gave an address on "The Strange Story of the Bible and the Church," and there was a large audience. The meetings have been held under the auspices of the Oxford-street Church, and the Missionary Conference provided the speakers each evening. The audiences ranged from 80 to upwards of 200, and were composed of thoughtful men and women, who gave the speakers an attentive hearing and put intelligent questions at the close. At the closing meeting the Rev. W. G. Topping, who presided throughout the series, announced that it was possible that further meetings would be arranged for the month of September. A successful united meeting of the branches of the Women's League at Burnley, Blackburn, and Accrington was held at Accrington on Saturday, July 27.

Boys' Own Brigade.—The Liverpool Battalion, consisting of No. 7 Company (Mill-street Domestic Mission), No. 8 Company (Hamilton-road Domestic Mission), and a representative three from the Birkenhead Company (No. 10 when fully formed), camped in the Isle of Man from July 20 to 29, at a delightful spot called Kirk Michael. The battalion was under the command of Captains J. L. Haigh and Norman Hall, Lieutenants Armitage, Lane, Gerrard, and Rimmer, with the Revs. H. D. Roberts, T. Lloyd Jones, and Mr. Lawrence Holt as visitors. Nearly all the boys, in detachments of about twenty, had a sail in Mr. Holt's yacht to Peel and back. Bathing parades took place as often as possible. The camp and its surroundings, with the stretch of sea in front, were idealistic; but the weather was of that variable character which made boating, bathing, and fishing spasmodic delights instead of perpetual attractions. Route marches to Glen Helen, Sulby Glen, and Peel gave the boys a good impression of the beauties of the island. With its bugles and drums in front, and its ambulance section behind, the battalion looked, as it followed the winding, well-kept roads, as though it "occupied" the little island in a peaceful semi-military sense, and was joyfully declaring the fact to all concerned. The farmers, their wives and children, their horses and cattle, were all greatly interested in the display, and capitulated to the musical might of the invaders as it rolled over the rounded hills and among the echoing valleys. Who could resist the bugle and the boy? Church parade took place in camp on Sunday, the 21st ult., when Mr. Gerrard conducted the service, and made all assembled wonder at the foolishness of the man who built a house for himself by trickery and deceit, but undermined the true foundation of his own character, thereby robbing himself of the most precious of all things. On the 28th the battalion marched to the local Primitive Methodist Chapel and heard an appropriate address on "Trust in God and do the right." Rain beat mercilessly on the canvas homes during the whole of the afternoon; but this only gave Mr. Holt and the officers the opportunity of teaching the boys how necessary it is to exercise great care if campers want to remain dry and warm. The ambulance and guard tents received all the soldiers whose bedding had been touched by the rain, and next morning everybody was found fit and hearty. No. 7 Company won the flag for the cleanest and tidiest tent, and also gained the greater number of marks for guard mounting. The boys returned to Liverpool, followed all the way by a good strong "sou'-wester." Parents and friends in goodly numbers awaited the boys on the landing stage. The battalion separated into its two companies, and marched home surrounded by an admiring crowd. Kirk Michael will be an oft-repeated word for many months to come.

Crewes.—The Sunday school anniversary services at the Beech-street Free Christian Church were held on Sunday last, and were conducted by the minister, the Rev. G. Pegler, B.A. There were good congregations.

Doncaster.—On August 22 the Doncaster Free Christian Church will begin a new epoch in its history. Ever since 1692 the flag of religious freedom has been kept flying by a sturdy and heroic band. In 1910 the congregation at the Unitarian Chapel was reinforced by a Congregational Church, which had been driven from its home by heresy hunters, and the Unitarian premises were found altogether too small. For months now the builders have been in possession of the site, demolishing the ancient sanctuary and erecting two halls with the necessary offices, a large hall to seat 600 to be used at present for Sunday services, and a small hall for the numerous activities of the week. The work is now rapidly advancing, and every prospect pleases save the financial one. There is an urgent need of £500. An earnest appeal is made for help in raising this sum. Donations will be gratefully received by the Rev. Percy Jones at 20, Morley-road, Doncaster.

London District Unitarian Society.—The London District Unitarian Society have decided to hold a united service similar to the one which was so successful two years ago at the Dutch Church in Austin Friars, which the Rev. Dr. Baart de la Faille and his Consistory have kindly lent again, on Sunday evening, October 20. The Society is seeking the co-operation of the churches by their closing on that evening, as it is felt that the good that is done to the members by joining in such a united service outweighs the harm done by closing the church on one evening in the year.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. H. E. Speight, M.A., will enter upon his duties as Junior Minister on September 1. A Service of Induction into the Ministry and Welcome by the congregation will be held on Friday, October 4. Commemoration services in memory of the ejected clergy deprived and silenced by the Act of Uniformity, August 24, 1662, will be conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston on August 25.

London: Kilburn.—It is announced that the service at the Unitarian Church next Sunday morning will be in memory of the Rev. C. Voysey. It will be conducted by Dr. A. D. Tyssen.

Manchester.—Mr. Sam H. Whittaker, 21, Holmfild-avenue, Moston, Manchester, one of the hon. secretaries of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, writes:—"Will you allow me through your paper to inform composers of tunes that the hymns for next year's number of 'Hymns and Choral Songs' have been selected? I shall be glad to send a copy of them to anyone who would like to submit tunes to my committee."

Mansfield.—An interesting experiment was tried last week at the Old Meeting House. The minister, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, invited the school children who are on holiday at the day school, to come for a Children's Hour from 3 to 4 p.m. each afternoon in the chapel. After a short religious service the time was spent in hymn singing and story-telling. Tales, like Tolstoy's Parables and Ruskin's "King of the Golden River" were adapted for the children. About 100 came, and showed by their attendance and attention how much they appreciated the services. The experiment is a variant on the holiday school, and suggests one way of using churches on other than the stated occasions. That it was good for the children few could doubt who are familiar with the holiday pursuits of so many who attend our Council schools.

Mexborough.—On July 21 special services were held by the Free Christian Church in the Empire Palace, the largest hall in Mexborough. The afternoon service was presided over by Councillor Wood, J.P., who gave an address to the children and parents. At the evening service the minister, the Rev. T. Anderson, preached to a very large congregation, about 1,200 being present. The collections amounted to £21. The scholars now number 237, teachers and officials 17, adult conference 70, which for five months' growth shows earnest and energetic work.

Synod of Munster.—The Rev. G. V. Crook writes:—"Owing to some misunderstanding the notice in last week's INQUIRER in connection with Cork and the Munster Synod is incorrect. The Rev. Geo. V. Crook still remains a member of the Synod of Munster."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

JAPAN AND THE NEW THEOLOGY.

We learn from the Japan Weekly Mail that the Rev. R. J. Campbell's book, "The New Theology," has just been translated into Japanese by Mr. Imaoka Shinichiryo. In the April number of the Kaitakusha Mr. Okada writes in praise of the original work, and bears testimony to the faithfulness with which it has been rendered into Japanese. Japanese young men being free from the strong prejudice against new theological ideas felt by so many Europeans and Americans, Mr. Campbell's "New Theology" will doubtless find a large number of readers among them. According to the Weekly Mail rationalistic Christians like Mr. Okada are already pretty numerous in Japan, and the "New Theology" in its Japanese dress is likely to add to their number.

THE LONDON PIGEONS.

According to the Animal's Guardian, the London pigeons show a tendency to disappear. "When horse traffic was at its height, the pigeons flourished and grew in great numbers until the increase was so rapid that the authorities in the City, particularly with regard to St. Paul's Cathedral, had to declare war on them.

The same decrease is observable in Palace Yard, Westminster, underneath Big Ben. It is said that the motor is proving their undoing, and the birds are hard put to avoid starvation; such of the pigeons as remain are depending almost entirely upon citizens of friendly disposition for one square meal a day. There was still a handsome group in the grounds of the British Museum recently. . . . Probably some of those of Cockney birth have gone farther into the country, where the chances of obtaining food are better."

SYNTHETIC RUBBER.

A great deal of interest has been aroused by the announcement that rubber has been produced by artificial means, and speculation is rife about possible commercial developments. A leading article in the South American Supplement of The Times in discussing the question says that it still remains to be proved that the chemical product can be converted into a commercial article possessing the resiliency and durability of the natural product. In any case it is probable that there is room for both. "The demand for rubber increases daily, and there are various potential new applications of the substance which would become actual were it available in sufficient quantities and at a cost which, if lower than at present, would yet permit the natural product to be grown at a profit."

* * *

"On the whole, therefore," the article concludes, "it seems probable that natural caoutchouc, especially if the planters are careful to adopt the best methods that science and organisation can provide, will continue to hold its own, and that while the prospect of plantation rubber may well perturb the souls of the forest-workers of the Amazon, the menace of the chemist need not seriously distress them. In this aspect of the question most people's sympathies will favour the human rather than the mechanical agents of production; but if the world's supply of natural rubber is to continue to furnish opportunities for fiends in human form to commit such atrocities upon defenceless natives as Sir Roger Casement's report has revealed in the Peruvian Amazon region, the sooner synthetic rubber becomes commercially possible the better for humanity."

SUNDAY CLOSING IN GLASGOW.

The results of Sunday closing in Glasgow are strikingly illustrated by the return just issued by the Chief Constable of Police. The following are the apprehensions for being drunk and incapable:—Monday, 8 a.m. to Tuesday, 8 a.m., 1,448; Tuesday, 8 a.m., to Wednesday 8 a.m., 1,349; Wednesday, 8 a.m., to Thursday, 8 a.m., 1,100; Thursday, 8 a.m., to Friday, 8 a.m., 1,017; Friday, 8 a.m., to Saturday, 8 a.m., 1,325; Saturday, 8 a.m., to Sunday, 8 a.m., 6,560; Sunday, 8 a.m., to Monday, 8 a.m., 348. This table also shows very clearly that means to purchase drink leads to excessive drinking, for it will be noted that as the wages in the possession of the workers diminish during the week the arrests for drunkenness decrease, whereas, as soon as funds begin to come in on Friday the arrests increase. The returns also show that in addition to the 13,147 proceedings for being drunk and incapable, 7,681 other persons were dealt with for offences committed while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Of these cases 420 were assaults on wives, and 5,077 breaches of the peace.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.

A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.

Reading for Children. Charles Roper B.A.

Gautama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.

The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.

The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching

—II. A. Stephen Noel.

Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.

The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.

Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.

Bertram Lister, M.A.

T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.

F. J. Gould.

H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.

Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]

Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.

By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.

Of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

PLUMS.—Persore Egg Plums, 24 lbs. 6/6, 12 lbs. 3/9. Victorias, 24 lbs. 8/6, 12 lbs. 4/9. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c. Bundles of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable; wears for years. Scores of beautiful designs, fascinating shades.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 3, 1912.

•• Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3659.
NEW SERIES, No. 763.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net.

MAN'S CHIEF END, and other Sermons.

By B. R. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of
ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Modern Handbooks of Religion

Crown 8vo. 2/- each net.

The Jewish Religion in the Time of Jesus. By Dr. G. HOLLMAN, of Halle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 150 pp.

The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 176 pp.

Paul: A Study of his Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 200 pp.

The Apostolic Age. By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. 144 pp.

Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. Dr. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg. Translated by V. D. DAVIS, B.A. 160 pp.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT

St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 138, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

The Tides of Devotion. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 27.

"Values of the Faith." By W. SCOTT PALMER. July 20.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Professor FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.

Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.

Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.

NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

WEESEN - on - the - WALLENSEE.—

In connection with Mr. LUMMIS' Swiss tour, special tickets are issued for the latter part of August (16 to 27), giving ten days at Weesen, at an inclusive charge of nine guineas. —15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—

PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, August 11.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7.
 Berrymondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11, Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.; no evening service.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. F. K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. J. W. GALE.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Mr. V. MOODY.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Mr. S. MOSSOP.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., no morning service until Sept. 15; 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11, Mr. T. MAYNARD. No evening service during August.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. G. COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road. Closed during August.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15, Mr. P. YOUNG, LL.B. No evening service.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. J. W. GALE; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 15.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. S. P. PENWADEN.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Mr. W. T. COLYER.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. H. W. HAWKES, of West Kirby.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel. Closed during first three weeks of August.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. H. SHELLEY.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.
 BRIDFORD, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and (STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate-Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CEADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. G. TOPPING.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30. Closed.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. G. G. MOORE.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TEAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. J. WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. DAWTREY, B.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAN, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. TUDOR JONES.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. R. SMYTH.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE, 16, Langdale-road, Victoria Park, Manchester.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

WANTED, an Organist and Choir-master for the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Hackney. £25 per annum. Two services and practice weekly.—Apply to Miss WHITEHEAD, 63, Clapton Common, N.E.

SALARY OPTIONAL.—Lady, well connected, requires post Housekeeper, Companion to invalid, etc. Domesticated; nursing; supervise servants.—P., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, for the Argentine, experienced Nursery-Governess. Must be fond of children and quiet country life.—For all particulars apply, 30, Sheepcote-road, Harrow.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 531
CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY 532
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—
Values of the Faith.—IV. 533
Adam Lindsay Gordon 534
Rodin and Realism 535
CORRESPONDENCE :—
Boards of Guardians and the Blind . . . 536

BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—
The Historicity of Jesus 536
St. Clare and her Order 537
A Cross-Bench Mind 538
Voluntas Dei 538
Man's Chief End and other Sermons . . 538
Communings with the Father 539
How a Modern Atheist Found God . . . 539
Wounds of the World 539
The Gift of Sleep 539

FOR THE CHILDREN 539
MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
Summer School of Theology at Oxford . 540
Portuguese Slavery 541
The National Peace Council 541
The Putumayo Atrocities 541
Dr. Crothers in South Wales 541
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES 542
NOTES AND JOTTINGS 543

♦♦ All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N. W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN the House of Commons on Tuesday Lord Robert Cecil asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the accusations which have been made against the Peruvian Amazon Company, particularly in foreign countries, the Government would consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire whether any responsibility rested upon the British directors of the company for the atrocities on the Putumayo; and whether any changes in the law were desirable to prevent the machinery of the English company law being used for such nefarious practices. Mr. Asquith replied that the Government had considered this suggestion, and in view of the exceptional circumstances of the case, they approved of the appointment of a Select Committee. This announcement is highly satisfactory, but it is very unfortunate that the Committee is not to be appointed until the House reassembles after the recess.

THE English pulpit at the present time is not in much danger from prophetic frenzy or unbalanced moral passion. The sermon which Canon Hensley Henson preached in Westminster Abbey last Sunday on the Putumayo atrocities was as timely as it was startling, and the effect upon the congregation must have been electric. He deliberately named the English directors of the British Amazon Company, and pressed home their responsibility with terrible incisiveness. "I have dealt at such length on the case of the directors," he said, "because I desire in this church—the central shrine of English-speaking Christendom, where an ancient and religious race preserves with jealous care the memorials of those whose service to the poor, the suffering, and the oppressed has illuminated the national history and exalted the national ideal—to express what is certainly in the minds of thousands of considering men and women throughout the British Empire and in the United States of America, that the time has come for such change of commercial law as shall render it impossible for those who make money by the oppression of native races to wash their hands of all responsibility for the crimes of their agents in those regions, however remote, where their wealth is gained."

THE sermon closed with a demand that the directors, who shared out the blood-stained gains, should be arrested and brought to public trial as "the irreducible demand of justice"; and with a cordial endorsement of the project to send out immediately an English Roman Catholic Mission into the Putumayo district, which had in it the true ring of a passionate charity, "reckless of name or sect or creed," in face of a terrible wrong. "This is no time, when the Indians are perishing, to debate the merits of churches and to inflame the mind with the recollections of ecclesiastical differences and conflicts. For my part I prefer to recall the glorious achievements of Roman Catholic missionaries in the past and in the present. I refuse to see in them any other character than that of fellow-Christians called to an urgent and difficult work; I rejoice to aid their effort, and I pray God to bless it."

WE are glad to see that public opinion in other directions is crystallising into a demand for definite action. A Town's Meeting has been held in Manchester, at which the Lord Mayor presided, and addresses were given by Bishop Welldon, the Vice-Chancellor of the University, and

Mr. C. P. Scott. The latter expressed his belief that the measures in contemplation by the English, American and Peruvian Governments would prove effectual; but if they should not, there was no step we should not be justified in the name of civilisation in taking in order to put an end to these crimes. He would not stand, he said, by international rule in a matter of this kind. If we wished for a precedent we need only remind ourselves of what our fathers thought and did in a less extreme case than this, when without any right or authority whatever they put an end to the African slave trade at the beginning of the last century, and no man and no country dared to say them nay. It was recognised that they were doing a work of humanity, a work which no other Power was prepared to do, and that they were justified before God and man in doing it; and they did it. In the present case no measures so extreme were at all likely to be needed, but if they were we should be fully justified in taking them, however strong they might be.

WE have received this week several new publications from the National Peace Council, among them "The Importance of Instruction in the Facts of Internationalism," by Mr. J. A. Hobson, and "The Promotion of International Peace through Universities," by Principal Carpenter. The American Association for International Conciliation, with its proud motto Pro Patria per Orbis Concordiam, was, we believe, the first to realise the educational value of a regular series of cheap pamphlets, and we are glad to see that such an excellent example is being followed in our own country.

PRINCIPAL CARPENTER calls special attention to the significance of the World's Student Christian Federation, whose common activities are only possible under conditions of peace. Though not concerned directly with peace propaganda it is undoubtedly a powerful factor in international goodwill. It was founded in Sweden in 1895 and has now become a world-wide organisation with 2,288 local societies, and a membership of 152,000 students and professors. As Dr. Carpenter points out, "In the vast variety of its operations concerned with social problems at home and foreign missions abroad, in the periodic gatherings which bring together delegates from diverse lands, in the constant interchanges of travel and the circulation of increasing literature, the fundamental demand is for mutual understanding and brotherly sympathy."

* * *

MR. HOBSON'S pamphlet is a powerful plea for the teaching of history in accordance with our growing internationalism in thought and trade in place of the "hard-shell nationalism" which is still taught in many schools. "If every boy and every girl really understood that nations are not trading units, that Germany and France and England and America are not engaged in competing with one another about the world for a limited market, that these nations are not trading firms at all, and that an elaborate process of co-operation between Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, and people of other nations is going on in the world, that there is no ultimate antagonism, but that the healthy competition of different persons of different nationalities is essential towards that wider co-operation for the benefit of all—if this was clearly taught and understood, it would go very far towards enabling them to realise that nations are not the separate things they are at first disposed to conceive them, but are growing into ever closer union." The whole argument is one of great force and interest, and has in it an element of political imagination, which is one of the best securities of peace.

* * *

THE returns of the Census which was taken last year in the Union of South Africa are very interesting, but at the same time they reveal very clearly the grave difficulty of the political and social problems which have to be faced. The country has to a large extent recovered from the severe back-wash of the war, and immigration has again set in on a considerable scale, but in the race with the coloured population the white man is still losing ground. Out of a total population of 5,973,394 only 1,276,242 are Europeans as compared with 4,697,152 natives. When these figures are analysed and compared with those of the previous census, we learn that the increase in the coloured population has been 15.72 per hundred compared with an increase of 14.27 per hundred among Europeans.

CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.*

THERE are one or two sentences in WILLIAM LAW'S "Spirit of Prayer" on which I want to dwell for a few minutes. He speaks of the greater part of mankind, nay, of Christians, as being asleep, and their various dreams as being only their particular kind of worldliness. "The learned and the ignorant, the rich and poor, are all in the same state of slumber; only passing away a short life in a different kind of dream." This comparison of life to a sleep, and human activity to a dream, is in no sense novel or original. WORDSWORTH speaks of our birth as being but a sleep and a forgetting. We come from GOD, who is our home, trailing clouds of glory, and that is one way of regarding this life as a falling from a higher and a diviner mode of being. Those of us who cannot believe that we have lived before this life may yet be convinced that we have been sent here by GOD, that our existence here has a special meaning, that it is intended to fulfil a divine purpose, that we have a career to run, a character to shape, a divine promise and a destiny to fulfil.

BUT WILLIAM LAW'S suggestion is more definite than this. It is this, that "Man has an eternity within him, is born into this world, not for the sake of living here, not for anything this world can give him, but only to have time and place to become either an eternal partaker of a divine life with GOD, or to have a hellish eternity amongst fallen angels; and therefore every man who has not his eyes, his heart, and his hands continually governed by this twofold eternity may be justly said to be fast asleep—to have no awakened sensibility in himself." Or, as he puts it later on, "He comes into this world on no other errand but to rise out of the vanity of time into the riches of eternity." In other words, we are here to choose day by day, moment by moment, life or death—the blessing or the curse. Poor and miserable as this life is, according to this writer, yet "we have all of us free access to all that is great and good and happy, and carry within ourselves a key to all the treasures that heaven has to bestow on us. We starve in the midst of plenty, groan under infirmities, with the remedy in our own hands; live and die without knowing and feeling anything of the one only good, whilst we have it in our power to know and enjoy it in as great a reality as we know and feel the power of this world over us; for heaven is as near to our souls as this earth is to our bodies. . . . GOD, the only good of all intelligent natures, is not an absent or distant GOD, but is more present in and to our souls than our own bodies."

* An address delivered at a Wednesday evening service at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham.

Among many reflections which these pregnant sentences of the mystic bring to birth is this central and critical one, that we are here so to use our body as to transfigure it into a soul. There is a sense, then, in which every man is the creator or the destroyer of his own soul. A soul is only given to us in incompleteness in order that it may be made into a complete totality. It is given as a seed that we may cultivate its growth into perfection. The terrible responsibility laid upon every one is nothing less than the making of his own soul.

On any view of life, then, this present existence of ours is critical. In it we make or mar the nature of our immortality. Indeed, there are some thoughtful and devout people who argue that there is no immortality by nature, or of necessity. There is for every one of us, only the possibility of an immortality. Whether we become actually immortal or not depends on what we do with ourselves here. Immortality is thus something we have to win by our own effort. It is conditional on our prayers and strivings. We may, through neglect, through selfishness, through sensuality, through sin, forfeit our birthright, and work our way downwards through gloom and horror into utter extinction; we may through sacrifice and service, through heroic and holy living, realise all our birthright and actualise our spiritual possibility, and so make ourselves immortal. Whether we shall advance beyond and through death into immortality depends, according to this theory, on the use we make of this mortal life and its opportunities. He that lives to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; he that lives to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap eternal life.

I have stated this view of conditional immortality because I think it throws into bold and striking relief the critical character of our life here. It brings home to us the fact that our conduct is decisive of much beyond what the thoughtless imagine. Our thoughts, our feelings, our actions, are terribly weighted with eternal issues. Every moment is vocal with the alternative: Choose ye—life or death, the blessing or the curse.

BUT I do not personally believe that the fact of immortality is conditional. I believe its nature, its quality, is conditional. I do not think that the cruel sensualist and the villain are going to escape the harvest of their sins by annihilation. Nor do I think that the little innocent babe who has not made one conscious effort for good is going to forfeit immortality because its immortality has not been earned or won or achieved. No, the vile will have to face the resultant of their life hereafter even as the saint. There is, I believe, ample provision in GOD'S spiritual universe for all disciplines to burn away the foulness of our moral disease. There is place for cleansing by purgatorial flames; and those flames will not be less agonising, not the less consuming, but the more because they are not material but spiritual, being the pangs of self-condemnation, the horrors of remorse, the agony of a conscience become sensitive to its guilt and to its treachery to God. Death may be an awful revealing of what we have done or not done here for our beatitude or for our misery. Our earth-life is laden with decisions that affect us not only now but hereafter. At the core of our being our soul is being made or unmade moment by moment.

Let us think of that seriously and solemnly. It is a theme for frequent meditation. But let us remember for our encouragement that however gross or sensual or carnal a life may have been, there are yet saving sources open to us by prayer and effort and consecration—sources of purification and amendment of life able to wash us clean of the filth of sin. The vilest sinner may yet "cleanse him in great waters, and with bitter herbs make him whole." We turn away from the evil and turn upward toward the good. And how glorious it is to believe, with a constraining and operative and fruitful belief, that through all suffering and struggle and weariness we are building up and fortifying the soul's life, and increasing our joy in God now and hereafter. That all that is dark in our experience, all our trials, our loneliness, our griefs, our daily martyrdoms and persecutions, if such be our lot, are not in vain, if through them we rise steadily out of time into eternity, if through them we are brought nearer to CHRIST, and have a sweeter communion with him and a closer walk with God, if through them we are shaping and moulding our inward soul into a strong personality that shall at last stand in its integrity before the very light of lights to glorify God and to enjoy them for ever. We endure every cross for the joy that is set before us in a glorified and ascended life.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

VALUES OF THE FAITH.

IV.

WE must remind ourselves (for there are many who forget) that the articles of the Christian faith are not of one class alone.

In considering some we find that philosophical or psychological criticism and construction help us best to enter into the general mind of the Church, others we have to look at more particularly in the light of historical, literary, and exegetical knowledge. But the principle and method of interpretation remain the same. In every case we would distinguish between spiritual and moral truth supported by the Christian witness to experience—the authority of which increases in weight along the ages—and the constitution of verbal statements, framed according to certain transient intellectual prepossessions of ignorance and knowledge, by which that truth is handed on from generation to generation, man to man. We would distinguish, in short, between the outward and the inward parts of the sacrament of Christian social and individual experience, as this is communicated throughout the Church by a vehicle of word and phrase and sentence, of philosophical, psychological, scientific, or historical affirmation. For we find that in this distinction lies not only the hope of permanent harmony among the different demands of our complex mental and spiritual activities, but a great part of the strength of our defence against attack made upon the faith from without, as well as a solid support for missionary advance in aid of a world sorely needing the good news of Christ. We can only serve those men who now reject Christianity en bloc, for intellectualist reasons and by critical means of an intellectualist nature, if we are able to tell them that since God has not been pleased to save mankind by science or by historical accuracy, any more than (as St. Ambrose says) in dialectica, or through successful ontological speculation, their attack altogether misses the mark of our Christian faith.

We shall have to own that we ourselves have shared their intellectualist error, have judged the work of God in man as though it were primarily a work of the reflective and discursive power of the human mind; that we have defended amiss as they attack amiss. But in this we shared an all too common delusion, from which, it seems, few except the saints and prophets have escaped. And it was hardly to be expected that we should escape from it before our scientific and philosophical prepossessions had been effectively revised, and historical and documentary criticism had acquired sufficient strength to clear away the obstacles that stood before us in the way.

How should men, Christian men, who lived by the truth of those articles of faith, who knew God in themselves, Christ living in their life, know also that the verbal expression which had not hindered a conveyance of the truth to themselves, carried with it also the speculative imperfections, the ignorance and inadequate guesses, of men? How could they know this before those guesses, that ignorance, and those imperfections had been brought convincingly home to them? Scientific men for long did no better. Because the Ptolemaic astronomy, the caloric theory of heat, the atomic theory of the ultimate constitution of matter, each and all, have worked, those guesses were held for long and by many as revealing inmost secrets of the material world. When they ceased to cover and have room for all the known facts, they were of necessity superseded; but even now there are men who believe as firmly in the theoretic truth of scientific guesses that have replaced them, believe in the newer hypothesis as a final revelation of truth. We Christians were never driven to our discovery by finding the faith break down under the test of practice and experience, as those bygone hypotheses of science broke down. When we behaved towards God as personal we were always met as by a personal love and personal power given unto us; when we sought the influx of his Spirit, a greater Spirit became our own; when we strove after the mind of Christ we found a new mind working wonders in ourselves. In the sacrament of love we discovered love; in the risen Lord we found present salvation. How should we think of changing our theoretical statements concerning these realities of life, as the men of science were so often forced to do? It was not in their working that our hypotheses broke down. They work still if a man accepts them still, work to the fullest of all moral and spiritual tests he can apply, all moral and spiritual facts he knows.

We had to learn new science, new philosophy, new psychology, more history, more about our documents. These things are affairs not of religion and the faith, but of the minor matters of our theoretic knowledge; concerning which we have to learn like other men, but with a greater or a lesser measure of which we, like them, can live to the utmost of our spirit's power. It is our business, now, to put things right before the world, and to ourselves; to set value against value, contrast religion in its everlasting significance and character with a changing body of theoretic knowledge. The Christian faith and its articles are vulnerable indeed, if, in our defence of the Christian faith, we allow ourselves to be led away from the open field of religion and the full exercise of reason, into those artificially closed lists where intellectualism lays down its arbitrary rules and the fight must be conducted like a game. Our faith will be shown before men with the strength of corporate life, the massed experience of men who have put it to the test, if we refuse to let ourselves be bound in such a way, in any way, and take our stand upon the whole and our relation to the whole. And when, or if, we plead authority, we must make clear to men that if we do not acknowledge it as an extrinsic power or as absolute, yet neither do we esteem it an authority of each man for himself in a false antithesis towards the whole.

We can hardly, indeed, bring our discussion to a fitting close without amplifying this point, nor, so it seems, more effectually than by quoting (in translation) the following paragraphs from an editorial article in "Les Annales de Philosophie Chrétienne" (Fourth Series, Vol. I., pp. 13-16):—

"But since we are never isolated, since, in spite of the inalienable autonomy which is ours in our inner life, we are bound to the Whole, the Whole is prolonged in us and we have to live as a function of the Whole, it is also as a function of the Whole that we have to think; the work of thought, personal and intimate as it is, is none the less social. No man accomplishes it alone; to attempt it is to go inevitably astray. At no moment is it expedient to break with the past, in no circumstances is it expedient to shut out the present. We never begin another world, another humanity, another life. Truth dates from no man, the truth, that is, which gives a meaning to our life. No man is the starting point, no man the centre. And the attempts of any man to act as though he were so bring trouble and disorder, suffering and death.

"This is true in the material order; it is true, and in a higher degree, in the spiritual order. And more especially in the realisation of the most interior ideal, of that which in one aspect belongs essentially to our intentions and our freedom, our solidarity manifests itself at its deepest and widest, reaching even to infinity. For in mind and heart and soul we cannot attain to our fullest development unless we share in the totality of being, unless in our depths, in front of us, above and beneath us, we feel that there is nothing alien from us, nothing which, limiting our vision and our movement, darkens and confines us. It is impossible to conceive a more fallacious claim than the claim to enclose ourselves within ourselves, there to live apart; there is no tour d'ivoire. The individual lot of each one of us depends upon the co-operation of all, and the work we have to do is social because our existence is essentially social, because, if we demand that the whole should work with us and for us, the whole also demands that we should work with and for the whole.

"It is this demand of the whole which we see translated into authority for individual men in every effort which life makes towards organisation, however rudimentary. And, consequently, authority is everywhere in the world. Men only seek to destroy authority by putting another in its place, and in order to do so. Those who pretend to do without it always either impose it or submit to it, deceiving others or themselves. It is, then, inevitable that we should find authority in the life of religion, or elsewhere, and even more than elsewhere, although with another character, for the proper note of the religious life is to be social in the highest degree. The thing that should really surprise us is that men should take offence at it there, as if there above all life were not more than the individual life, as if there most of all we do not need to hear the voice of all that works with us towards the realisation of our common destiny.

"And if authority in this case is brought to bear on thoughts and intentions, if it penetrates into the inmost recesses of the mind, it cannot be otherwise, since its office and function is to serve the development of the spiritual life in order to realise the communion of souls. But at the same time also it only serves this end because it is essentially spiritual. Relatively to the end for which it exists it is absolutely impossible that it should constrain. It differs from the authority of Cæsar in that it is addressed to the inner man, and seeks a hidden result. Certainly it demands the allegiance of the mind, the will, the heart. But heart and will and mind are never captured from without. The head may be forced to bow, the knee to bend, the lips to speak, but no man can force the mind to think, the will to desire, the heart to love.

"To this spiritual authority there is then a spiritual obedience which is a true response and is truly efficacious. To endure it, to submit to it merely, is to remain opposed to it. All submission which does not come from the depths of our being, which is no willing adhesion, from a spiritual motive, is by the very fact illusory and unreal. For to socialise our outward man, to harmonise it for the moment and in appearance with the external demeanour of other men—this is nothing, unless we have brought our inner life into the social harmony. There is a pharisaism of obedience as there is a pharisaism of independence, of which we may say that each is worth exactly as much as the other.

"And since, however supernatural the destiny to which religious authority brings its support, this destiny is always that of a free being, who can only realise himself in freedom, it seems, therefore, that the true obedience which alone counts, which alone is congruous with the spirit and the purpose of this authority, is something quite other than a passivity which allows itself to be shaped. It is an activity, as full, as whole, as profound as possible, which, starting from humility, from the very poverty of the conditions of our existence, bends itself to the work of transfiguration and of inner growth to which we are all called. And it is evident that to utter with the lips the accepted formulas is not sufficient for this end. The accepted formulas are the voice of tradition, the voice of the truth which has become a human truth in order to reach us. But on our side, we must go towards it, and, that it may not remain a dead letter, we must translate it into our own intimate convictions. To pretend to receive it would only end in the determination to do without it, while we try to make our own truth begin in ourselves. We can only welcome it with an honest welcome and without reserves, by seeking so to understand ourselves as to comprehend it, and vice versa; for by the solidarity which connects us with the point of departure, as by the communion of minds which ought to be at the term, these two things are one.

"The work which we have to do is, consequently, at the same time and by the same title a work of obedience and of initiative, of respect and of freedom. And it is in respect and in obedience that initiative and liberty find freest play. Separating these things we wrong their nature; we create on the one hand servility and superstition, on the other rebellion and pride."

If from the ancient centre of the Christian Faith we receive a message such as this, if a Roman Catholic Christian comes thus far to meet us, we may surely take heart for the future of the Christian world.

W. SCOTT PALMER.

ADAM LINDSAY GORDON.

THE customary sketch that we have come to expect in the current journals of the life and work of noted men is of no mean value, in days when few find time to read biographies. A time-saving age—save the mark—must needs have its condensed and predigested information.

In January we deck a Trafalgar Square statue, and write eulogies in the papers of a hero all must delight to honour. No one grudges the great and noble their meed of praise and glory, yet the thoughts of some dwell for a moment on the strange diversity of character and circumstance which gave life in the same year to two men so diversely fated as the distant cousins, Charles George and Adam Lindsay Gordon.

He of the wreaths and statues lives in a nation's admiration, though no man may show his grave. Upright, fearless and kind, he died happy in the knowledge that he had always done his best. Surely, a life well lived, full of energy and effectiveness, was for Chinese Gordon the best the gods had to bestow. And the other—his relation, born in the same year, from the same ancient stock, and starting in the same profession at the Royal Military Academy of Woolwich, lies in the far country where life, before he took it with his own hand, drew from him the mournful lines:—

"Men toiling, and straining, and striving
Are glad peradventure for living.
I render for life no thanksgiving,
Glad only to die."

Could a man under the shadow of inherited melancholy have sought a more fruitful field in which to develop it? "In Australia alone is to be found the grotesque, the weird, the strange scribbles of Nature learning how to write," is the verdict of one who knew its great silences and the depressing loneliness of its monotonous blue gums. The very names, Mt. Despair, Mt. Dreadful, and the like, given by early explorers, indicate the general impression. Gordon's was the sensitive, impressionable type of mind that takes colour readily; but who can talk of "might have beens" when the mould is warped? He had felt keenly the banishment decreed by family pride.

"My parents bid me cross the flood,
My kindred frown at me;
They say I have belied my blood,
And stained my pedigree.
But I must turn from those who chide,
And laugh at those who frown;
I cannot quench my stubborn pride,
Nor keep my spirits down."

His youth, though reckless, and on one occasion almost violent, was so full of generous impulse and fine chivalry that one wonders how it could have been thought well to send him where no tie of affection would guard and check the wildness of excessive animal spirits.

While the future hero of Khartoum was fighting in the Crimea his poet cousin was among the mounted police of Australia. Always a daring, skilful rider, he entered into the rôle with zest. In 1867 he opened a livery stable at Ballarat, and was noted as an adventurous steeple-chaser. He had previously, but only for a short time, held a seat in the Victorian House of Assembly, and it was not till within a few years of his untimely death that he openly wrote for publication. His poems were mostly written at odd moments, often in the saddle, for he was shy of being known as an author. They are healthy, open-air verses, and he is peculiarly dear to Australian hearts for his manly interpretations of life in the wide, free spaces of their land.

During those adventurous times he was stock-rider, horse-breaker, and indeed tried many diverse occupations. More than one chance companion was surprised at the culture and knowledge of this strange, silent man, who would ride with a Latin classic in his pocket and to a sympathetic listener quote widely and well, then quietly take his place in the servants' quarters at the journey's end. He was very proud, and his position in those days must have been a trial to him.

There is pathos in a little incident told by an Australian lady who met him in her youth and was thrilled by his achievements on horseback. He was training a spirited young animal at the time, and each morning she went to a certain paddock, where she watched with delight his daring and skilful feats. One morning he rode up to her, and in answer to her enthusiastically expressed admiration, asked gravely if her mother knew she came to watch him every day.

"Dear me—no!" she exclaimed; "she couldn't look at a steeple-chase herself, and would be horrified at me if she knew."

"Then you mustn't come again," said Gordon. "You are young, and don't know the world and the risks of misrepresentation as I do. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," she said, holding out her hand. He hesitated, and then, as he took it, "It is the first time I have touched a lady's hand for many a year." He had a high regard and courtesy for all women.

Perhaps his most popular poem is "How we Beat the Favourite": every word rings true with a note of personal knowledge and excitement. But many of his haunting, mournful rhymes are what some of us love best. The passionate reserve of his love poems, and the tender yearning in those to his home folk, show us the great, strong, yet sensitive and nervous soul which fought valiantly against the heavy odds of heredity.

Oh, gaily sings the bird! And the wattle boughs are stirr'd

And rustled by the scented breath of spring;

Oh, the dreary, wistful longing! Oh, the faces that are thronging!

Oh, the voices that are vaguely whispering!

Oh, tell me, sister dear, parting word and parting tear

Never pass'd between us; let me bear the blame.

Are you living, girl, or dead? Bitter tears since then I've shed

For the lips that lisp'd with mine a mother's name.

Oh, harshly screams the bird! And the wattle bloom is stirr'd;

There's a sullen, weirdlike whisper in the bough.

"Aye, kneel, and pray and weep, but his beloved's sleep

Can never be disturbed by such as thou!"

The end came in 1870, but for several years the clouds had been gathering, and the success of his first volume of poems failed to disperse them. The crowning misfortune in his chequered life came when a well-meaning kinsman urged him to put forward his claim to the ancient family estate of Esslemont. It had been most strictly entailed, and he had excellent authority at home for believing his claim valid. It was only after the expenditure of borrowed money that the lawyers discovered, what they ought to have known from the first, that that particular kind of entail had been swept away years before. It was more than his already depressed state could support. Early on the morning of June 24, 1870, he was found, not far from his home at New Brighton.

The tribute of his friend Kendal is the thought of him we like best to cherish:—

"The one who never wronged

A fellow man; the faithful friend who judged

The many, anxious to be loved of him,
By what he saw, and not by what he heard,
As lesser spirits do; the brave great soul
That never told a lie, or turned aside
To fly from danger; he, I say, was one
Of that bright company this sin-stained world

Can ill afford to lose."

RODIN AND REALISM.

RODIN, the great French sculptor, has power of expression not only in clay and stone, but also in words. This is shown in a book by Paul Gsell, recently published by Grasset, in Paris ("Entretiens Réunis" par Paul Gsell), in which he reports conversations with the man whom he recognises as a master. Rodin is able to give the reasons for his sculptures, and communicates the feelings which inspired them by means of these Conversations. As a manifesto of the faith of realism, what could be better than this:—"To the artist, overflowing with feeling, everything is a revelation. Throughout all Nature he perceives a great consciousness like his own. There is not a living organism, not an inert object, not a cloud in the sky, not a green shoot in the meadow which does not confide in him the secret of an immense power hidden in everything. Look at the masterpieces of art. All their beauty comes from the thought, the purpose which their authors believed they found in the universe."

The realist depicts what he sees. He cannot see everything that is: he sees only "the extremities of things which are prolonged into infinite obscurity." "Quite near to us there are a thousand things hidden from us because we have not the means of knowing them."

In modelling an arm, a leg, a body, Rodin remembers that he is representing only the part which comes into view, but that there is much more beneath, of which there is suggestion in that which can be seen. It is, for example, the outward part of a complete muscle which he models. And expression is found in every part of the body, so that in the sculpture of a leg, or part of a leg, the character of the human being is shown, not only in the face. You may see a mere fragment of a statue by Rodin, and that only as reproduced in a photograph, and learn from it what the man is doing and what sort of man he is. "The human body is throughout the mirror of the soul, and thence comes its greatest beauty."

In like manner the great whole of Nature is far from the possibility of our thorough knowledge: we see only the extremities, the surface of things; but if we see these rightly we have an expression of the character of the whole. We may look upon any surface thing as a thing in itself, and miss a great deal that is really there, and there to be seen by a greater and more real realist; or we may divine from its expressiveness something of the meaning and working of the great whole. The more real we and our vision are, the more we shall see, and the more readily we shall see it, in the least and most common expression that comes to the surface over which our vision extends.

Thus it is that to the realist there is "nothing common or unclean." Corot saw God in the branches of his willow, spread Him over the fields and on the surface of his lakes. Millet saw Him in the bent, toiling back, in suffering, in resignation. "Character is the intense truth of any view of nature beautiful or ugly." "To the great artist, every thing in Nature shows character." He can "penetrate to the hidden meaning of everything."

"And that which is considered ugly in Nature often shows more character than that which is called beautiful, because in the contraction of a diseased face, in the hollows of a vicious appearance, in all deformity, in all withering, the inward truth shows more readily than through the regular and healthy features."

The interpretation of these words seems to be that there is a higher beauty in the struggle for better things than in the satisfied enjoyment of the pleasure that is easy, and that all decay and corruption is the manifestation of force, life, reconstruction.

"There is nothing ugly in art except that which is without character; that is to say, that which sets forth no truth either external or internal." The false, the artificial, that which attempts to be attractive and pretty instead of expressing truth, that which parades beauty and grace is ugly in art. "When the artist with the intention of embellishing nature adds green to spring, red to the sunset, purple to young lips, he creates ugliness because he lies."

Complete devotion to truth is the religion of the realist, but he is a pseudo-realist who sees only the surface of things and does not see the character of the creative power behind these manifestations. The true artist "perceives clearly in all that he sees the intention of design. Above his own agonies, above his worst wounds, he fixes the enthusiastic regard of the man who has divined the decree of Destiny."

Rodin faces the extreme of life's perplexities. Perfidy, ingratitude, the destruction of one being by another, decaying vigour, self-destroying genius, produce an artistic joy, because the artist is face to face with "the will that decrees all these solemn laws." The realist worships Truth, and, like the true scientific investigator, will leave nothing out that belongs to the truth of his subject. Though Rodin says little about the dangers of realism, there are passages in his conversations which suggest that he knows them. The morbid realist will dwell more on the apparently ugly than the obviously beautiful, therein seeing falsely, and expressing inadequately the truth of Nature, even going astray from the truth till he presents a world of painful struggle and defeat contrary to the wide-visioned full reality of things as they are. And the shallow realist will see events, surface ends of things, apart from that continuance into infinity of which Rodin speaks in inspiring words and which he reveals in his sculptures.

The danger of the idealist is the opposite of this: the morbid idealist has no eyes for what is at first sight ugly; he turns away from it; he dwells on the beautiful surface of things and discards all that disturbs his feeling for the beautiful appearances. He imagines the disturbing elements out of his way and pieces together what he likes. The shallow idealist, like the shallow realist, keeps to the surface view, the one being attracted by prettiness, the other by deformity. Essentially there is not much to be preferred in the one over the other. They are both, unconsciously perhaps, falsifiers. But the thorough idealist who sees Nature as an expression of divine energy, and receives loyally all its manifestations, believing that the beauty of everything will be revealed even when it cannot yet be seen by him, who finds symbols of good and struggle towards good in chaotic and temporarily repulsive objects, has a faith which is not opposed to the realism of Rodin. He, too, will say "There is nothing common or unclean." Struggle towards good is itself good and beautiful. Endurance is a lovely thing. Decorative prettiness of selfish ease is more ugly than the grime and strain of the overburdened slave. There is less of the ideal, as there is less of the real in it. So the contradictions between realism and idealism in art are not very marked in the deep seers and broad, deep, truth lovers—the contrasts are, rather, in the shallow and morbid workers. Differences there are in the choice of subject: the one may open our eyes to greater beauty than we knew in the things and manifestations that are undoubtedly beautiful. The other may bring us more into the realm where ugliness is supposed to be, and show us that there is beauty there also where we had not seen it. There is no need to decide which is doing the nobler work. Both are needed.

In Greek sculpture the gods and goddesses, in great strength and loveliness, sit or stand above us to be worshipped, each limb or feature of the body expressive and beautiful. Their art seems perfect, but it was the art of a class: it did not express the life and feelings of the labourer, the helot. The great mass of hard working people were struggling and bearing distorting burdens, and slavishly overstrained: of them art took little notice; they were but the servants of the great actors who were the subjects and lovers of art. Michael Angelo, and Rodin after him, express in sympathy with toiling multitudes and the struggling soul discontented with the restrictions of a class ideal, the great modern effort to get civilised on a higher level and with larger life. They come down in brotherhood to the struggling, toiling mass of humanity, humanity which at present does toil and struggle whether it might do otherwise or not; the great realists see God in the struggle: they are nearer the common heart and effort of the active world. The realists often have sympathy when they are not prophetic. The great realists see a new heaven in the old earth, and are, at the same time, therefore, idealists; but they bring ideas and ideals to the test of actual life here and now.

Still the idealists are profoundly right, too. The effort, the struggle, is not as eternally true as the beauty. It passes in form: it shall pass altogether. Peace and serene beauty and joy of love are the reality beyond all struggle, and the real idealist, the ideal realist, may see and show these as he looks upon the activities and successes and failures of the world.

Not by declining a full share of human difficulty, or living in a fool's paradise whence it is intended all disturbing influences shall be excluded, will this joy and peace and calm love be attained, but by looking straight at all things, including all, accepting all that is ugly as well as beautiful, going into the depth and height and breadth of them all, avoiding or shutting out nothing whether we like it or not, seeking to have the truth, the pain of it, the joy too, and so working and loving into reality beyond the conflict.

In a criticism of Tolstoy, Alexander H. Craufurd says, "The best kind of art must plant its feet firmly on the broad homely earth of primal human instincts and feelings, though its head may be in the far-off stars of God."

Stars and earth are both divine: stars are earth; and earth is a star.

P. P.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

BOARDS OF GUARDIANS AND THE BLIND.

SIR,—Some time ago it was publicly stated that an Act of Parliament existed by which Boards of Guardians were empowered to establish workshops for the blind within the union area. However acceptable this information may have been, it was unhappily not correct. It is a great pity.

Mr. Halley Stewart has recently stated that "as a man was not consulted as to his birth, and was not allowed to end his life, he should have the opportunity of earning a living, and was entitled to the assistance of the State." This would apply particularly to the blind in their pathetic position. Yet, whilst no Act of Parliament exists to the purport indicated above, there are still Acts of Parliament meant to have an entirely general application, which would give Boards of Guardians great power in those administrative efforts which they might direct specifically to the benefit of the blind. As St. Paul would say, we must strengthen the things which remain. In other words, if an Act of Parliament will not help us, we must do the same thing without its aid which we could have done better with its assistance. Every Board of Guardians has tremendous powers if it would, in all necessary cases, use them to the utmost. As in the sphere of theology, so in that of administration, it is well to take some hard old phrase and give it the most liberal and enlightened interpretation possible. It is proverbial that one can, for good or evil, metaphorically drive a coach and four through any Act of Parliament. By this means has been built up that which is the glory of our Constitution, the law of custom. It lies within the power of any Board of Administration by courageous and continuous action to establish for the whole nation those precedents which are stronger than our statutes and more enlightened than our laws.—Yours, &c.,

E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

Derby, August 7, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE HISTORICITY OF JESUS.

The Witnesses to the Historicity of Jesus. By Arthur Drews, Ph.D. Translated by Joseph McCabe. London: Watts & Co. 6s. net.
The Historicity of Jesus. By Shirley Jackson Case. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. Agents for the United Kingdom: The Cambridge University Press. 6s. net.

THE first of the above works "is an abbreviated and amended version, for English readers, of the volume which the author recently published as the second part of 'The Christ-Myth.'" Its chief aim "is to collect, examine, and refute the arguments which are advanced on the theological side for the historicity of Jesus." Its method may be likened to the siege of a castle in course of which the outer defences—represented in the plan of the book by "The Jewish Witnesses" and "The Roman Witnesses"—offer apparently little resistance to the foe, thus enabling the latter without much loss of time to concentrate his main attack upon the line of inner defence ("The Witness of Paul") and the central citadel ("The Witness of the Gospels"). From each of these positions the historical Jesus is so summarily dismissed that the very ease and completeness of the victory creates a natural suspicion! Is it credible that the many redoubtable foes who undertook to defend Jesus' historicity can have been so signally routed as the book would have us believe? A closer examination of the field of operations makes it speedily manifest that the victory is more apparent than real. Thus, when dealing with the Jewish witnesses, and particularly with the evidence of the Talmud, our author says: "It is poor consolation for the supporters of the historicity of Jesus when an expert on the Talmud, Chwolson, says that there was no contemporary Rabbinical literature. In the extant Rabbinical literature of the second century there is, on his own showing, much material and many sayings that 'belong to the Rabbis of the second and first centuries of the Christian era.'" (P. 11.) Here follows a reference to the pamphlet of Chwolson ("Über die Frage ob Jesus gelebt hat," p. 11) from which the concluding words are ostensibly quoted. As a matter of fact the original says "the second and first centuries before Christ." Moreover, in addition to being misquoted Chwolson receives in other respects less than justice as a witness for the historicity of Jesus. His argument is briefly this:—Much material and many sayings are recorded which are derived from the Rabbis of the second and first centuries before Christ and the first century after Christ. Naturally considerations of date exclude the earlier sayings as possible witnesses for Jesus while the character of others makes them inadmissible. These are sayings of a general moral character, together with those concerned with ritualistic or purely legal practices. Hence it is all the more remarkable that in the remainder there should be found three passages which imply knowledge of Jesus' actual existence, one of such passages taking us back to the year 71 A.D. and representing, in the view of Chwolson, the earliest citation from any of our gospels. It is true that Drews deals with these three passages and attempts in a by no means convincing way to belittle their evidential value. But neither here nor elsewhere is the witness for the defence fully heard. In the preceding section of his book Drews summarily dismissed the evidence of Josephus chiefly on the ground that liberal theologians had cast doubt upon each of the Christian references. Would it not have been more candid to add that this "learned Jew" (Chwolson) strongly contends for the authenticity of all of them, although believing that the most famous of them suggests later Christian modification? But the fact is that one feature of the book is the marvellous celerity with which its author is able to pronounce on questions that have long puzzled experts. If, for example, the discussion turns on the nature and value of the references of Papias to Mark and Matthew how really simple is the solution of the difficulty, how misapplied the time and energy hitherto devoted to the elucidation of one of the passages:—"We cannot avoid the suspicion that these supposed sayings of Jesus, 'the words of the Lord' of Papias, which Matthew is said to have collected, were not the words of a single definite individual or an historical Jesus, but were merely placed in his mouth afterwards." (Pp. 127-128.) The too ready resort to theories of that kind is in itself suspicious. Again, the greater the magnitude of the question, the more numerous and varied are the opinions called forth in its discussion. It becomes then comparatively easy to find amongst them one that will support any hypothesis. If the question of the genuineness of the Pauline epistles is under debate how convenient it is to be able to quote at length the views of Professor van Manen, irrespective of the fact that they represent an extreme standpoint frequently opposed and far from generally accepted! (Cf. p. 104, p. 105, pp. 105-106.) Nor is a certain inconsistency lacking. Although elsewhere Professor Drews has done his best to discredit the Book of Acts as an historical witness he here makes use of its presentation of early Christian conditions in order to make the account in the Pauline epistles unhistorical. (P. 109. Cf. "Die Christumythe," p. 213.)

In the last and longest section of the book the author's task is two-fold:—(1) To demonstrate the unhistorical character of the gospels and their contents. (2) To account for Christian origins by a mythical hypothesis. We have already suggested reasons why the author's claim to have achieved success in the first part of his task is more than premature. As regards the second part few persons, we imagine, will be convinced thereby, save those who share the author's monistic views. The gospels contain much more than is offered by the ingenious interweaving of materials taken from Isaiah, the Book of Wisdom, Psalm xxii, and astral speculations. Nowhere is Professor Drews more hypothetical and unconvincing than when relating parts of the gospel narratives to astral myths. Notwithstanding that the most sweeping conclusions are drawn from evidence only hazily suggested by such myths, we later have this naïve admission: "Here there is a field open to future research which has as yet been touched only by a few isolated students, and from which historical theology may expect some unpleasant surprises." (P. 193.) We very much doubt whether future research will reveal greater surprises than may be found in the present book. (Cf. pp. 190-192, Appendix, pp. 309-315.) It only remains to say that the translator has done his work well, the result being a very readable book.

We can only hope that readers whose interest in the problem has been quickened will have an opportunity of reading Mr. Case's presentation of it. His work is certainly the clearest and most complete account we have so far read in either German or English. Not only does it admit and seek to answer the difficulties created by modern criticism, but the detailed treatment of such difficulties is never allowed to obscure the nature of the resultant problem for faith. (Cf. p. 57.) No one could desire a more thorough and thoughtful review of the controversy which began, as the author shows, as early as the end of the eighteenth century, and has reached its climax in recent times, than appears in the second chapter, "The Mythical Christ of Radical Criticism." Equally careful and markedly candid is the author's attempt to give an estimate of the negative argument against the historicity of Jesus, both as regards its treatment of the traditional evidence and also its proposed explanation of the origin of Christianity. (Cf. chaps. III. and IV.) We would particularly instance his examination of Jensen's supposed Gilgamesh parallels and the manner in which he controverts Professor Drews' conclusions concerning the statements of Epiphanius. But Mr. Case's book is much more than a criticism, although it deals most trenchantly with some features of radical interpretation. (Cf. pp. 76-77.) It attempts to place the reader at the early Christian point of view as a means to a better understanding of the early faith. "What must the primitive Christians' gospel contain in order to insure its effectiveness in the thought-world of their day?" Obviously we must expect to find, in the author's words, "pragmatic phases of primitive tradition." These are successively indicated—the need of salvation, the necessity of counteracting the popular belief that certain well-known features of Jesus' career were contrary to messianic faith, the belief that the earthly life revealed a special type of conduct. Thus, there finally results "the transference of his saving work from the realm of eschatology into the realm of history." (Pp. 148-149.) But in spite of such pragmatic considerations what our gospels offer is a progress from the man Jesus to the exalted Christ—the very reverse of what we should expect to find if the mythical hypothesis were tenable. Many readers will, we think, turn with special interest to the author's treatment of "Jesus' Significance for Modern Religion" (chap. x.), a very suggestive and fresh treatment of an important theme. It should be read in conjunction with the closing section of Professor Drews' book on "Idea and Personality" (pp. 301-8), since in both we have the problem for modern faith well handled from opposing points of view. The value of Mr. Case's work is enhanced for the student by its admirable foot-notes—showing a very full acquaintance with the literature—and the Indices at the conclusion of the book.

HERBERT J. ROSSINGTON.

ST. CLARE AND HER ORDER.

St. Clare and Her Order: a Story of Seven Centuries. Edited by the Author of "The Enclosed Nun." London: Mills & Boon, Ltd. 7s. 6d. net.

ST. CLARE is perhaps the most lovable of the women founders of religious orders. She had not the extraordinary genius of St. Catherine of Siena or St. Teresa, and except for the one critical moment when she withstood the mercenaries of Frederick II. she mingled little in public affairs, but she will always be memorable for the womanly charm of her friendship with St. Francis and the prudence with which she guided her Order through the first difficult years. We know little of the outward details of her life. Her legend, written soon after her death and attributed to Thomas of Celano, has been translated recently into English by Father Paschal Robinson. It is our chief source of information, and the writer of the book before us can do little more than embroider its narrative. The later chapters, however, must have involved considerable research and patient collection of materials. They contain a survey of the history of the Order of Poor Clares during the 700 years of its existence. To most readers the ground will be quite unfamiliar, and there is so far as we know no other book in English in which the information is accessible. Even Holzapfel, in his standard work "Handbuch der Geschichte des Franziskanerordens," devotes only twenty pages to the subject. But the history of the Second Order loses much of its interest owing to an enforced apostasy from the early ideals of the mendicants. However faithfully it might cultivate the virtues of poverty, it did so in strict seclusion from the world. Had wiser counsels prevailed it might have been a confraternity for human succour and forestalled St. Vincent de Paul's sisters of mercy by four centuries.

The author is at some pains to defend the spiritual value of a life of seclusion and ascetic discipline. She feels herself the nostalgia of the soul amid things that are seen and temporal, and is deeply convinced of the hidden reasonableness of a form of piety which persists in inspired monotony from age to age. When we attempt to demur, and possibly whisper something about the absurdity of it all, she has her answer ready, effective if not quite convincing: "From an impartial point of view there is as much hardship and absurdity in going with bare arms to dance at midnight as in going with bare feet to prayer at midnight." The book is well illustrated. Two unfamiliar portraits of St. Francis and St. Clare, ascribed to Tiberio d'Assisi, are particularly interesting, but it is an unfortunate omission that no particulars are given of their artistic history.

A CROSS-BENCH MIND.

Modern Democracy: A Study in Tendencies. By Brougham Villiers (F. J. Shaw). London: T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.

MR. F. J. SHAW'S study of the tendencies of modern democracy appears opportunely at a time when all political parties are in a state of flux, when some of the most immovably Conservative people in the kingdom will ask you to lunch with them at their club—the National Liberal, when many of the most open-minded and genuinely progressive citizens persist in calling themselves Tories, and many most rampant Individualists expect their fellows to believe that they are Socialists. Possessed of a real historic sense and an unusual capacity to penetrate beneath mere surface appearances, Mr. Shaw is able to discern what are the real present aims of the political parties—possibly better than they do themselves. He perceives that the working-class elector at least is gradually feeling his way towards a policy, which, after Fourier, he calls "guarantism," or what Mr. Sidney Webb calls a policy of the "National Minimum," which demands that human life shall in no case be allowed to fall below a minimum standard in health, education, or comfort. It can hardly be gainsaid that the most advanced Liberalism, the most thoughtful Socialism, and a goodly proportion of Toryism all alike are tending in the same direction. Whether the tendency be good or ill, posterity alone will be able to tell. Perhaps out of the present chaotic state of politics and with the help of many individuals who are not at present much enamoured of any of the recognised camps, a party of real reform will emerge, which understands its own aims, and will advance without haste and without rest to the attainment of them.

Mr. Shaw has, in the good sense of the term, the "cross-bench" mind, without being the impractical will-o'-the-wisp that some cross-bench people are. His aims are thoroughly democratic and popular, though he is nullius in verba magistri. Best of all, the criticism which he offers, and which he is so well qualified to give, is the sympathetic discerning criticism which helps. We can have no higher praise for the book than to say that it is on the same high level as the author's "Socialist Movement in England."

VOLUNTAS DEI. By the Author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." London: Macmillan & Co. 5s. net.

THE writer of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia" continues to wear the veil of anonymity, preferring to be known by what is still the best product of her gracious pen. If we are wrong in detecting a woman's hand by many intangible signs and in the words of dedication to the present volume—"To my brothers who live the life of which I speak"—no apology can surely be needed. "Voluntas Dei" has many of the delightful qualities of its predecessors, the calm assurance of the realities of the spiritual life, a reverent freedom in dealing with traditional religious theory when it has ceased to be a helpful explanation of the facts, and the sweet reasonableness of tolerance in face of sincere differences of belief. Here is a characteristic passage which conveys admirably the moral temper of the whole: "There cannot be supposed to be the slightest moral delinquency indicated in the candid acceptance of the mechanical, or the spontaneous, or the divine, hypothesis of the universe by the man who honestly finds his powers of mind best satisfied, even provisionally, by any one of these. It would seem at first entirely absurd to make this trite remark, but, in the light of much modern controversy, it is not superfluous to say that the religious Theist could not more seriously take God's name in vain than in proclaiming any man's intelligent adherence to what seems to him truth to be offensive to God." The object of the book, as the title itself indicates, is to set forth the creative purpose in terms of a living Divine Will, and to show this purpose as culminating in "the common Christian purpose—to make men fit for the reign of God as foretold by Jesus." If we say that in our judgment the parts of which it is composed are greater than the whole, we simply mean this, that the sustained argument of the book has not held our attention so much as the beautiful fragments of spiritual teaching which are scattered through its pages. "Wherever a human soul may find its next field of activity, its power of thought cannot be more restricted or less forceful than it was in this world." "Christian repentance ought to be a glad thing." "Corporate humanity has always flourished best under the notion that Deity was very closely allied to humanity." And what could be more timely than the warning that if we would "patiently try to rebuild mental images in the place of those that have been cast down, we should be wiser than in attempting to maintain a vital religion without any resting-place for our religious imagination"?

MAN'S CHIEF END AND OTHER SERMONS. By Robert B. Drummond, B.A., T.C.D. London: At the Lindsey Press, 3, Essex-street. 1s. net.

MR. DRUMMOND'S ministry of more than 50 years at St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, has been quiet and scholarly, and partly for this reason it has never had a place in the public eye at all commensurate with his fine intellectual gifts. For many years his highly trained literary taste enriched the columns of The Scotsman, where he carried on an anonymous apostolate in the things of the mind. His one book, "Erasmus, His Life and Character," published nearly forty years ago, is still one of the standard authorities on its subject. It is fitting in every way that his retirement from active work should be marked by the publication of a selection from his sermons, though the slender volume before us hardly does justice to the range of his powers, and we wish that it had been enriched by the inclusion of some of his literary essays. The sermons are only seven in number, a small selection from "the accumulation of many years." Some people will perhaps notice that they are longer than the ordinary sermon, but then it must be remembered that they were preached in Scotland, where people are not satisfied with snippets of emotion. They are also clear and argumentative in style, and depend very little upon any fervour of appeal. But, again, it may be remembered that there are people keen enough about the intellectual aspects of religion not to resent some challenge to their thinking powers or the occasional intrusion of the expert knowledge of the critic. "Man's Chief End," "The Element of the Beautiful in Religion," "The Divine Motherhood," "The Law of Retribution in Greek Tragedy," these are some of the subjects. The treatment is never conventional, the manner very unlike that of the ordinary preacher. Mr. Drummond has chosen his own method, calm, restrained, reasonable; and in doing so he has illustrated once again the catholicity of the Christian pulpit.

COMMUNINGS WITH THE FATHER. By James C. Street. London: At the Lindsey Press, 3, Essex-street. 1s. 6d. net.

PRAYERS are not spoken to be criticised. We even doubt whether it is suitable that they should be reported. Mr. Street was, however, quite unconscious of the presence of a reporter taking notes, and it was only afterwards that he discovered that the outpourings of his soul in the Church of the Saviour, Birmingham, had been preserved. We are sure that many of Mr. Street's friends will plead that the value of the gift justifies the means which were taken to secure it, for here they possess a most characteristic and beautiful memorial of his ministry. The glow of the preachers' conviction, the tenderness of his heart, the rich music of his voice live on in the printed words. In the preface which the Rev. C. J. Street contributes to the volume he says of his father that he had to a remarkable degree "the gift of prayer." It is this intensely personal note which gives these prayers their value for the religious mind. Like many other fervent outpourings of the spirit they would sound strange, possibly a little overcharged with emotion, on the lips of other men. We welcome them accordingly, not so much for any use that may be made of them in public worship, but as a treasury of private devotion, and in a special sense as an aid to the discipline and preparation of the heart, without which there can be no helpful leadership in congregational worship.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD. By G. A. Ferguson. London: At the Lindsey Press, 3, Essex-street. 1s. net.

THERE is a remarkable candour and clearness of statement in this chapter of spiritual autobiography. It tells the story of the way which a sincere man had to travel from the safe moorings of his childhood in Presbyterian orthodoxy through the wilderness of materialism and negation, first to a reverent agnosticism, and then to a spiritual faith in God. Mr. Ferguson's difficulties seem to have been chiefly of the intellectual order. He has the Scotchman's passion for clear statement and cogent argument. Temperamentally, we gather, he was never averse to religion, and contact with the more aggressive forms of atheism seems to have had something to do with his recovery of faith. He tells us himself that he was never really satisfied with his hopeless unbelief. "I was not like some extraordinary people I have since met, who seemed actually to prefer annihilation to immortality, and the cast-iron laws of the unknowable Power to a heavenly Father's love and care. I never for a moment underestimated the extreme value of what I had lost. But I was naturally of a sanguine disposition; and I determined to make the most of life such as it was. There was always humanity to live for, and the reward of a good conscience. So I was not unhappy, even without hope, and without God in the world." Later on we learn that he abandoned agnosticism as an intellectual failure, because it could not account for the compulsion of conscience or justify the desire to live a noble and self-sacrificing life. The story which Mr. Ferguson unfolds is thus chiefly one of the removal of difficulties, and for that reason it does little to extend or enrich our knowledge of spiritual experience. It is the confession of the student and not of the penitent, and it records nothing which can be described as conversion. But for this very reason it may make a strong appeal to people of a similar temperament, and it will have served its purpose if it gives them some assurance that the habit of hard and sincere thinking and a resolute facing of the facts may lead, in the end, to a clear belief in the truth, the love, the goodness of God.

WOUNDS OF THE WORLD. London: John Ouseley, Ltd. 3s. 6d. net.

THIS volume of short stories by members of the Wesleyan Methodist Union for Social Service is excellent in intention. We wish we could say the same about its manner of execution. The names of some of the contributors—Mark Guy Pearse, Frank Ballard, and Samuel E. Keeble, are among them—raised hopes of better things. If social propaganda is to be carried on by means of fiction, the fiction must be strong in construction and arrest the attention of the reader by its close grip upon reality. It must, above all, avoid the pitfalls of a feeble sentimentality. These stories and sketches are not good in themselves. They lack both biting realism and moral passion. The hard-hearted employer appears among the stage properties, but he is only a pasteboard figure. Two of the stories turn upon the hardship incidental to the introduction of new machinery and consequent loss of employment, but there is no attempt to grapple with the problem or to suggest a remedy. A sentence like the following: "There was happily too much of the spirit of Christ in the clergyman's heart to permit of the vulgar snobbery which would give help only on condition that the receiver should be always acknowledging social inferiority," reveals an attitude of mind which helps to instil prejudice instead of enlarging the possibilities of co-operation. We have spoken plainly about the impression of sentimental ineffectiveness which this book has made upon us, because we are so deeply interested in the work which is being done by the different Social Service Unions, and we are extremely anxious that they should win their right to be heard among thinking men. If they are to do that they must set themselves to the hard tasks of study and thought. They must also avoid resolutely conventional prejudices and the popular rhetoric of the platform, and realise that what the world needs is not pitiful tales to move it to weak tears, but a close knowledge of facts to arm it for wise action.

THE GIFT OF SLEEP. By Bolton Hall. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.

THERE is a popular idea, probably it is a fallacy, that books may be used as a wholesome sleeping draught. Whether a volume devoted to a study of sleep is likely to have the soporific quality in a quintessential degree we are unable to say, but it ought in any case to be soothing and hardly suggests the midnight oil or the bedside lamp. Here are fifty-four chapters—to be sure each one is hardly longer than a dream—which whoso sleeps too little or too much may read and grow wise. Mr. Bolton Hall has given us a series of simple studies of the psychology of sleep and wakefulness interspersed with a good deal of rather obvious wayside wisdom. This kind of moralising about the healthy life is chiefly an American product. It has not had much vogue hitherto in this country, and we doubt whether this book is likely to increase it. Mr. Hall does well to warn his readers against the use of opiates and to remind them that insomnia is often "more a moral than a material lapse, and can best be cured by moral means," but it strikes us that he is rather hard on our friends when he recommends letter writing, especially if we dislike it, as a useful device for inducing slumber.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

FROM THE AUTHOR:—Open Air Theology H. Bodell Smith. On sale at Essex Hall. Price 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Vineyard. Review of Theology and Philosophy.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

"THE STORY OF COMUS."

I WANT to tell you the story which is told in "Comus," one of the wonderful poems written by John Milton about whom I wrote last week.

A long time ago there was a wise Ear who was made Governor over the West of England, and he had three children, two sons and a daughter, who was so good and beautiful that ugly and wicked things had no power to hurt her. Well, these two boys and their sister—"The Lady" as she is called—are away from home, and are coming back to see their father made Governor—a very grand ceremony—in the old castle of Ludlow where he lived; and on their way they have to pass through a great, dark wood, when night is coming on. They don't know the way very well, and the Lady gets tired and thirsty with wandering about and looking for the right path, so her brothers leave her sitting on a bench while they go to find some water or berries for her. But instead of coming back, they lose their way in the puzzling, tangled wood, and the Lady, at last, when she sees it is getting dark, thinks she will go and look for them. She hears music and shouts of laughter in the distance, as if the country people were having a dance, but when she gets to the place where the sounds seem to come from there is nothing at all to be seen—only the waving trees and the stars looking down through the branches, and the ferns, and the little wild animals.

Well, at first she feels a little bit frightened, for she is all by herself, and she has often heard stories of fairies, and witches, and ghosts who are supposed to be seen in lonely, dark places like the one she is in; but she soon remembers that there's no need to be afraid of anything when one has not done wrong—and she never had—because God's angels take care of everyone who is good and won't let anything bad do them harm. Then she feels so brave and happy that she thinks she will sing a song, in case her brothers should be anywhere near, so that they could hear her. But in the middle of the wood there lives a wicked sorcerer called Comus, who is always trying to entice people that are tired with wandering about the wood into his enchanted palace, where he offers them a kind of sparkling wine which tastes very nice, but what do you think it does? As soon as they taste it, these poor people turn into all kinds of wild and tame animals—their heads, that is to say; their bodies stay as they were. But the queerest thing about it is that they don't even know that this has happened, but imagine that they look nicer than before, and are quite content to stay in the palace eating and drinking like animals, and spending the night in all kinds of wild dances with Comus looking on and encouraging them.

Now when he hears the Lady singing, he thinks that now he'll be able to entice her, too, into his palace, for there's nothing he likes better than making people drink the wine and turn into animals. So he makes himself look like a shepherd, and speaks to her so cunningly that she believes everything he says. She tells him how she has lost her brothers, and he pretends that he knows where they are, and says that until he finds them he can take her to his cottage, which is quite near, where she will be safe till morning. So she thinks what a good kind shepherd this is, and goes with him joyfully. Then, just as they have gone away, the two brothers come in looking for their sister. They are most dreadfully sorry to have lost her, and wish it were only a little lighter so that they might see their way better. Then, because it's so dark and lonely, the younger one begins imagining all kinds of dreadful things which might have happened to his sister, but the elder is wiser, and tells him he mustn't be afraid, because she is so good, and good people never come to any real harm, because the angels guard them. And though they don't know it, an angel is guarding them, too. God has sent one of His messengers to protect them and the Lady, and lead them safely out of all their dangers. This messenger makes himself look like their father's young shepherd—not, like Comus, so as to carry out his own wicked plans, but so as to help them the better, as they might be afraid if they saw a spirit come to help them. He tells them all about Comus and his palace, and how he has enticed the Lady into it, and says they must all three go there directly and set her free, which they can do if they take with them a little prickly plant which was once given to him, for this little plant makes all kinds of sorcerers and enchanters like Comus powerless to do any harm.

When they come to the palace, they see a splendid banquet set out, and all these curious creatures, half like men and women and half like animals, feasting and making a great noise, and in the middle of them, sitting in a high marble chair, is their dear sister. Comus is trying his best to make her drink his nice, sparkling wine, but she won't even taste it, for she knows now that he is a wicked enchanter. But he tries very hard, and is almost going to force it down her throat when her two brothers rush in with their sharp swords drawn, and drive Comus and all the rest of them away. Oh! how glad the Lady must have been, for now she knew that she had been right, and that God would not let anything really bad happen. But still she cannot get out of that hateful marble seat, for it's an enchanted chair, and nothing that her brothers can do can help her out of it.

Just as they are beginning to despair, the Shepherd—that is the Spirit, you know—tells them that he has thought of a way. He will ask a beautiful fairy called Sabrina—a water-nymph who lives in the river Severn, as if in a cool crystal palace—to come and help them. So he sings her a lovely song, and she hears it and rises up out of the river and touches with her white cool fingers the Lady's hands and lips and the marble chair, and no sooner has she done this than the Lady is free! She comes down from the enchanted chair, and the Shepherd thanks Sabrina in beautiful words for what she has done, and then he leads the three young people out of the wood at last to their father's house. You can think how glad their poor father and mother were to take them in their arms and kiss them, and how glad and happy the brothers and the Lady were as they joined in the dances that the shepherds and the country people were performing to welcome the new Earl. Then, having done his message, the Spirit flies off again to the lovely place he came from, and it all ends happily.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT OXFORD.

For the second time a Summer School of Theology has been held at Oxford. The first took place three years ago. The School just ended began on Monday, July 22, and terminated on Friday, August 2. The opening lecture was given by the Dean of St. Paul's (Dr. Inge), his subject being "The Christian View of the World." The hall of Trinity College was well filled by an appreciative audience when this lecture was given. The course was divided into five sections—Philosophy of Religion, Old Testament, New Testament, the Early Church, and Comparative Religion. It comprised more than 50 lectures and classes, and was attended by students from many different parts of the world. The lectures included the following: Philosophy of Religion—Mr. R. R. Marett (Exeter College, Oxford), Professor J. Oman (Westminster College, Cambridge), Rev. Canon H. Rashdall, Rev. Dr. Selbie (Mansfield College, Oxford), Professor J. A. Smith (Oxford), Professor W. R. Sorley (Cambridge), and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. Old Testament—The Rev. W. E. Addis, the Rev. Professor W. H. Bennett (London). New Testament—Professor W. B. Bacon (Yale), the Rev. Dr. V. Bartlet (Mansfield College, Oxford), the Rev. R. T. Herford, the Rev. Professor Kirsopp Lake (Leiden), the Rev. Professor Milligan (Glasgow), the Rev. Dr. Moffatt (Mansfield College, Oxford), the Rev. B. H. Streeter (Queen's College, Oxford). The Early Church—The Rev. Dr. V. Bartlet, the Rev. Dr. Carlyle (University College, Oxford), Professor P. Gardner (Oxford), the Rev. Dr. Odgers (Manchester College, Oxford). Comparative Religion—The Rev. Dr. Carpenter (Manchester College, Oxford), the Rev. Professor J. H. Moulton (Manchester), Professor N. Söderblom (Upsala).

Those of us who attended were very grateful to the President and Fellows of Trinity College for the use of their fine hall in which to meet for the lectures, and for the glorious gardens in which to spend the intervals between lectures.

Dr. Carpenter (Chairman of Committee) in his welcoming words expressed the purpose of the gathering as follows:—He had to welcome the students of the School in the name of the Committee, and to express the great satisfaction which it gave to them to gather there for common theological study members of different Churches, and, he might add, visitors from different parts of the globe. He had already in the dining room of his own college made acquaintance with distinguished clergy and ministers and professors from both sides of the American seaboard, the Atlantic and the Pacific, from Australia and China, and their guest Professor Söderblom, from Sweden. There was therefore a really cosmopolitan gathering. On a small scale it was an experiment in the possibility of common interdenominational teaching of those united together by a common interest in the great problems of theology, and a common conviction of the methods in which that study was to be pursued quite apart from any identity in the results which might be reached.

At a Soirée, held in the Library of Manchester College on the Saturday evening, thanks were expressed to the Hibbert Trustees for their generous guarantee towards the cost of the School, to the President and Fellows of Trinity College and to the Committee who had made arrangements for the School.

Special sermons were preached on Sunday, July 28, at All Saints' Church by the Rev. Dr. Carlyle, at Manchester College Chapel by the Rev. Professor B. W. Bacon, and at Mansfield College Chapel by the Rev. Professor J. Oman, and the School was concluded by a short service in St. Mary's Church, conducted by the Rev. Professor Kirsopp Lake, now of Leiden, but formerly curate of St. Mary's. All who attended the lectures and services are grateful to the Committee for the excellence of the programme, and for the admirable way in which it was carried out. Manchester College and its Principal rendered most valuable services. The Library was open to members of the School every afternoon, and very enjoyable gatherings took place at the luncheons and dinners provided by Mr. Soundy and his assistants each day.

A. H. D.

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

THE Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society has presented to Sir Edward Grey an important memorandum on the question of Portuguese Slavery and British responsibility. This is signed on behalf of the Society by the President, Sir T. Fowell Buxton; the Treasurer, Mr. E. W. Brooks; by Mr. St. Loe Strachey, Chairman of the Portuguese Slavery Sub-Committee; by the Rev. John H. Harris, organising secretary, and by the secretary, Mr. Travers Buxton.

The Memorandum points out that Great Britain paid Portugal a considerable sum of money upon the treaty stipulation that she would terminate slavery and the slave trade. But the more serious argument put forward is that in the event of a third Power, acting under the responsibilities which devolve upon all the Powers of Europe to abolish slavery, proceeding by "any show of force to insist upon the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in Portuguese Colonies, the maritime and land forces of Great Britain could under this Alliance (Anglo-Portuguese) be forthwith summoned to protect these Portuguese Colonies against the 'aggressors.'"

It will come as a surprise to many that a considerable number of the slaves are now known to be British subjects from Rhodesia and Barotseland and Belgian subjects from the Congo. With an emphasis which implies definite information, the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society states:—

"We have some reason to believe that, providing Portugal liberated these slaves, the Belgian Government would be willing, not only to send ships to the Islands for them, but to guarantee to convey them to centres within easy march of their original homes, and provide them with passages and sustenance free of all cost either to the Portuguese Government or the planters. We also believe that the American Missionaries would be ready, if asked, to act as advisers and guardians of such liberated slaves."

We understand the Society intends organising a vigorous expression of public opinion upon this question during the autumn.

THE NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL.

At a special meeting of the National Peace Council, held on Wednesday, July 31, Mr. A. G. C. Harvey, M.P., presiding, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

(1) "The members of the National Peace Council, having considered the statement made in the House of Commons on July 22, and the speeches of Ministers, express their deep dissatisfaction at the failure of diplomacy to bring about a more rational condition of international relationships. They cannot but attribute this failure in part to the fact that international agreements, originally intended to remove differences, and to be the forerunner of similar agreements with other Powers, have resulted in the antagonistic grouping of the European nations. Whilst hearing with satisfaction that the acute tension which has existed for some time has passed away, they repudiate the idea that a lasting peace can be maintained through the means of the forces of destruction. It has always been their belief that large and increasing armaments can never become the basis of friendship or mutual respect. To the stronger Power their existence is a constant temptation to aggression and interference; for the weaker Power there is always the risk of panic and the feeling of humiliation. They burden the State with vast expense, diverting labour and draining the means available for reform. The members of the Council welcome the Foreign Secretary's desire for the spread of arbitration in international disagreements, and assure him and the Government of their warm approval of any steps that may be taken to extend agreements with this end in view. They regard, however, with grave disquiet the growth, especially in connection with the Committee of Imperial Defence, of the influence of the professional expert on the Cabinet and the House of Commons on questions of foreign policy."

(2) "That this Council expresses the hope that H.M. Government will seize any occasion such as is now suggested in the Austro-Hungarian press, for an agreement for the arrest of naval armaments as between this country and Austria-Hungary."

THE PUTUMAYO ATROCITIES.

WE have received the following correspondence for publication. We understand that a similar appeal has been addressed to the authorities of Brazil and the Argentine:—

July 24, 1912.

SIR,—As you are aware, the Committee of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society has been endeavouring for over two years to awaken the Peruvian Government to a sense of its responsibility for the deplorable conditions which have prevailed for some time in the regions of the Putumayo river. The publication of Sir Roger Casement's report now gives this subject a publicity which it is hoped will do something to ameliorate these conditions and render less frequent such atrocious acts, not only upon the unfortunate Indians, but also upon subjects of your Excellency's Government.

My Committee observes that the Peruvian Government excuses itself from arresting some of the principal criminals on the plea that they have escaped across the border into the territories of other Powers, and I am asked to urge upon you the importance, in the interests not only of your own country but of humanity, of expelling any such criminals who may seek refuge in Colombian territory.

My Committee is deeply sensible of the valuable assistance which has been on previous occasions accorded to the efforts of the Society by the Colombian Minister, and trusts that you may be able to respond to this appeal as readily as has been done on former occasions.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your Excellency's obedient Servant,
(Signed) TRAVERS BUXTON, Secretary.
His Excellency the Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Colombia, Colombian Legation, 45, Avenue-road,
Regent's Park, N.W.

Legacion de Colombia.

TRAVERS BUXTON, Esq.,

The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society, London, S.W.

SIR,—I have the honour to refer to your communication of July 24, and beg leave to state that my Government is keenly alive to the necessity of doing everything in its power so as to establish order and regular administration and justice in the Putumayo district. My Government will also concur in any measure that may be necessary to prevent those responsible for the atrocities that have been perpetrated in the Putumayo district in recent years from finding an asylum on Colombian soil.

I may mention for your information that the Putumayo district belongs to Colombia; that Colombia has indisputable title to that territory; that the claim has been constantly sustained by Colombia; and that it is not going to be abandoned until it is recognised by Peru. Colombia's endeavours in this direction are not based solely on its rights to the territory. A higher sentiment animates my Government, and one of my Government's principal objects is to establish an administration of law and justice upon the region in question, such as a self-respecting nation requires on its territory.

I have forwarded to my Government a copy of your note under reply, and have no doubt that it will receive immediate and efficacious attention.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Yours most obediently,

(Signed) S. RESTREPO,
Secretary in Charge of the Legation.

DR. CROTHERS IN SOUTH WALES.

DR. CROTHERS had expressed a wish some time ago to visit the Unitarian churches of Cardiganshire—a group of fourteen churches which have many unique qualities. He had heard much of them through his friend the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago. Mr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones is a native of the district. At the invitation of the Cardiganshire ministers Dr. and Mrs. Crothers were accompanied by Dr. Tudor Jones. The plan of the tour was arranged by the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, of Llandyssul, secretary of the South Wales Unitarian Association.

On Sunday morning, at Llandyssul, Dr. Tudor Jones preached in Welsh and Dr. Crothers delivered an address at the Communion Service. In spite of the inclement weather the chapel was crowded. At 2 o'clock two sermons (in Welsh and English) were delivered at Chapel-y-groes. Again the weather proved unfavourable, but over 500 people had gathered together in the chapel, and scores failed to get admission. It was much the same at Pantydefaid on Sunday evening, where Dr. Crothers preached in English and Dr. Jones in Welsh. The American visitors were much impressed at what they saw, and expressed great interest in the conversations they had with the people, as well as in the singing they had listened to during the day.

Monday was spent in visiting the churches, and in speaking to the groups of members who had gathered together to show their churches and schoolrooms. A member of Pantydefaid Chapel (Mr. Josiah Jones) placed his motor-car at the disposal of the visitors, and drove them himself. Thus all the churches were visited in the course of one day. On Monday evening a religious service was held at Brondeifi Chapel, and the large church was crowded to the doors. A large number of representatives of other denominations were present, and the Calvinistic Methodist minister (the Rev. S. E. Pryderch) spoke at the close of the meeting. He said that there need be no surprise on the part of anyone at seeing him present at such a religious service as they had just listened to. He himself had preached there and was ready to do so again. He was ready to do anything to break down the artificial barriers which existed between denomination and denomination. Dr. Crothers preached in English, and Dr. Jones in Welsh.

The whole visit proved of great interest to the visitors, and, we hope, helpful to the congregations. Dr. and Mrs. Crothers will be able to state in America that they have witnessed a number of churches in rural Mid-Wales full of strength and enthusiasm, which are as successful today as they have ever been, in spite of the depopulation of country districts, and of the great exodus from the country into the towns.

Both ministers preached on the same lines. Both emphasised the need of religion and of the Church. They expressed their joy at what they had seen and heard, and exhorted the young especially to carry into the future the religious faith of their fathers.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Auckland, New Zealand.—The calendar of the Unitarian Church for July contains the following report of the activities of the Van Mission, under the leadership of the Rev. R. J. Hall:—"Three meetings have been held on successive Thursday evenings, at the Grey Statue, during the past month. Two evenings had to be given up owing to heavy rains. The details are as follows:—Thursday, May 23: Subject, 'After Death'; number present, 95; collection, 1s. 5d. Thursday, May 30: Subject, 'What Jesus was to Contemporaries'; number present, 200; collection, 4s. 2d.

Thursday, June 6: Subject, 'Christianity and Socialism'; number present, 300; collection, 13s. 4d."

Cullompton.—Good progress has been made with the fund for the new chapel and school. It will be remembered that the old building collapsed suddenly on March 24. The congregation owes its origin to the Rev. Wm. Crompton, M.A., vicar of Cullompton, who was ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. A chapel was erected about 1695, and this earlier building was replaced in 1815 by the one that fell down recently. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington writes to us as follows:—

"I shall feel much obliged if you will allow me to inform your readers that the amount received or promised up to this date for the erection of a new chapel and Sunday school at Cullompton is £958. The architect has just been instructed to proceed with the arrangements for building.

"The members of the congregation and their minister are very grateful for the generous support of many friends. The complete collapse of the old chapel on March 24, however, involves much outlay beyond raising the walls of its successor; and an organ seems to be a necessity where a congregation, as at Cullompton, is proficient in music. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the fund will continue to grow."

Contributions may be sent to the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, Chudleigh Cottage, or to the Treasurer to the Building Fund, Mr. Mark W. Woolcott, Pound-square, Cullompton, Devon.

Ilford.—A free-will offering by members of the Unitarian Church on behalf of the starving women and children in Bermondsey realised £5 5s. This sum has been sent by the Rev. A. H. Biggs to Dr. Alfred Salter, who is engaged in medical work among the poor of Bermondsey. Mr. Biggs has received the following letter of thanks from Dr. Salter:—"Your church has done nobly. This is the real 'fellowship of the saints.' Your people inspire us here to yet more strenuous service. Will you please tell them that we value not merely the money but the sacrifice and goodwill behind it all. Will you assure them that the struggling working folk of Bermondsey, while benefitting physically and materially by their assistance, will also be stimulated spiritually by the knowledge of the loving, brotherly sympathy of the Ilford people."

Leeds.—An elaborate History of Mill Hill Chapel has been compiled by Mr. E. Easil Lupton, and will be issued in a limited edition at an early date. The following extract from the prospectus explains its scope:—"The records of a dissenting congregation with a history of 240 years should appeal to all Non-conformists who are proud of their spiritual ancestry: and at Leeds much of the early history is available owing to the industry of our local historian and antiquary, Ralph Thoresby, who flourished 200 years ago. A considerable part of Thoresby's Diary and Correspondence was printed some eighty years since, but the present writer having examined the manuscripts, has found additional entries bearing upon the history of the chapel. Many other original sources of information have been investigated, such as Oliver Heywood's Diary, the Northwram Register, the manuscript diary of Joseph Ryder, and the Mill-hill and Call Lane Chapel Registers. Incidentally the work contains various items of interest to local antiquaries. The book commences with a careful summary of the early history of Non-conformity in England, and advice has been sought from and freely given by some of the recognised authorities on this subject, particularly the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A." The book, which is to be fully illustrated, and will contain about 400 pages, will be issued to subscribers at 15s. net. Particulars may be obtained from Mr. E. Basil Lupton, 147, Hyde Park-road, Leeds.

London, Kilburn: the late Rev. Charles Voysey.—There was a large congregation at the Memorial Service to the Rev. Charles Voysey, held in the Quex-road Unitarian Church last Sunday morning. The service of praise and thanksgiving by Mr. Voysey was used and the lessons were readings from the life of Bishop Ridley the martyr. The service was conducted by Dr. Amherst Tyssen, who said they had assembled to honour the memory of a religious teacher who had resided in Hampstead for many years, one whose kindly nature would be missed in their social life. As a religious teacher Mr. Voysey had enriched the religious literature of the country by many noble examples that would live. In a discourse on Bishop Ridley, Dr. Tyssen said they lived in happier times, for which they were greatly indebted to the brave men who had testified to the truth, even unto death. In following with like steadfastness the truth as they saw it, let them be careful to keep themselves free from the narrowness which formerly prevailed, and show that a sincere attachment to their own religious opinions was compatible with a charitable spirit of sympathy and respect for the convictions of others.

Mansfield.—The Rev. F. H. Vaughan has resigned the pulpit of the Old Meeting House after a ministry of six years, on his appointment to Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross. The resignation has been accepted by the congregation with feelings of deep regret.

Rochdale.—A handsome silver tea and coffee service has been presented to Mrs. Carter by her Rochdale friends, as a mark of their esteem and a permanent memorial of their gratitude. The silver tray which accompanies the service bears a representation of the Rochdale borough arms with the name of the Mayor, and underneath there runs the following inscription:—"Presented with a service of silver to Mrs. Charlotte A. Carter on her removal from Rochdale in high appreciation of great service rendered to the town. Town Hall, Rochdale, July 27, 1912." The presentation was made on Saturday, July 27, at Llandudno by the Mayor of Rochdale (Alderman Cuncliffe, J.P.), who was accompanied by Alderman J. R. Heape, J.P., and others connected with the public life of the borough. In making the presentation the Mayor said that there had been no seeking of subscriptions and no canvassing; the gift they were making was the result of a voluntary desire on the part of many townsfolk, who knew the value of Mrs. Carter's services, to show her that they appreciated all her exertions for the public good. The poor and helpless had found in her a friend, and it must be a lasting consolation to her to know that they were grateful to her and cherished her efforts to alleviate their lot. Her friends at Rochdale regretted that the cause of her severance from the town was ill-health; they earnestly hoped that she would soon be restored to good health, and they wished for her many more years of happy life. In acknowledging the gift Mrs. Carter spoke of her early training in public service in Rochdale as a minister's wife in the days when there were neither sanitary inspectors nor school attendance officers. After referring to her connection with the Board of Guardians, the School Board and the Charity Organisation Society, Mrs. Carter said that there were two departments of work she especially regretted leaving—the Advisory Committee, which she believed was destined to do great work in rescuing young lives from "blind alley" and other undesirable occupations; and the Ladies' Charity, one of the oldest charities in the town, which was likely under new arrangements to render still more valuable service. She regretted the necessity for giving up her activities in Rochdale, but she felt exceedingly grateful for all the help and encouragement she had received, and for all the gratitude shown for such service.

as she had been able to render. She warmly thanked the subscribers for their beautiful gift, which, she said, would be treasured by herself and her family. Alderman Heape also spoke, and emphasised the sense of loss which was universally felt at Mrs. Carter's removal from Rochdale.

Synod of Munster.—We understand that the statement by the Rev. G. V. Crook, which we published last week, is not accepted by the officials of the Synod of Munster; but the matter is not suitable for further discussion in our columns.

Wakefield: the late Rev. Andrew Chalmers.—On Thursday, August 1, the marble casket containing the cremated remains of the Rev. Andrew Chalmers was interred at his native place at Fetterangus, Aberdeenshire, in the presence of a large and representative gathering of friends and residents in the neighbourhood. The service was attended by clergymen of all denominations in the district, the officials of the Buchan Club, and by Mr. Chalmers' many friends throughout Buchan. The service was conducted by the Rev. Alexander Webster, Aberdeen, who gave a most impressive address, standing on the platform of the Chalmers Institute, having immediately in front of him the casket containing the ashes, which took the beautiful form of a sarcophagus of white marble, and was placed on a white covered table surrounded by a decoration of white wild flowers. This simple arrangement seemed to symbolise the character of the late Mr. Chalmers so perfectly that all present were touched by it. The readings during the service were taken from the Old Testament Scriptures, the Apocrypha, the Egyptian Book of the Dead, and Modern Spiritual Teachers. A simple committal service was conducted by Mr. Webster at the graveside.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

ASOLO AND MR. BARRETT BROWNING.

The shadow of death has fallen upon that sunny garden ground at Asolo. Robert Wiedmann Barrett Browning, better known to his friends as "Pen" Browning, after long suffering heroically borne, passed peacefully away on July 8. He was laid to rest on the following Wednesday in one of the most beautiful burial grounds that can be found in Italy, St. Anna, on the western spur of the Asolo hill.

All Asolo is mourning for him. Since his father's death he had made Asolo a second home; and here he set on foot the lace-making school on the spot where stood the silk mill at which Pippa worked of old. His last letter but one was read by Professor Knight at the Centenary Commemoration of his father's birthday on May 9 at Westminster. He was able on the same day to welcome the municipality of Asolo and to receive the welcome of the festival crowd there.

When I saw him last he was in his sick room surrounded by tokens of world-wide admiration for his father's work, and he showed me with pardonable pride a carefully bound volume containing the signatures of no fewer than four hundred and fifty citizens of all classes, who, having the same day dedicated a main street in the city to his father's memory, desired thus to put on record their personal regard for himself as a friend and fellow citizen.—From "At Asolo: A Browning Memory," by the Rev. Canon Rawnsley, in the Cornhill Magazine for August.

A BENEFACTOR OF HUMANITY.

Last Sunday the bi-centenary of the birth of the Abbé de l'Épée, who first enabled deaf mutes to converse, was celebrated at Versailles. The statue of the Abbé was decorated with flowers by representatives of deaf-mute institutes in all parts of the world. The Abbé de l'Épée, we are reminded by the Paris correspondent of The Times, was born at Versailles in 1712, and, after studying law and theology, was ordained by the Bishop of Troyes, and appointed Canon of Troyes Cathedral. On returning to Paris he became interested in the efforts made by an acquaintance to teach two deaf-mute children, and invented certain conventional signs by which he was able to converse with them, and so develop their intelligence. His method met with such remarkable success that he founded a school for deaf-mutes, which soon acquired a European reputation. The Abbé de l'Épée was granted a pension by Louis XVI., and on his death his name was inscribed on the list of Benefactors of Humanity by a decree of the National Assembly.

THE TOILERS' DEATH ROLL.

The deadly perils faced daily by thousands of workers in this country, says the Daily Herald, are shown by some startling statistics contained in a leaflet published by the Labour Party. It is stated that from January 1, 1910, to June 30, 1912, there have been

- 1,040 workers killed on railways.
- 3,528 killed in mines.
- 220 killed in quarries.
- 2,145 killed in factories.
- 722 killed on docks, and
- 3,911 killed at sea.

A total of 11,566 working-class lives lost in thirty months.

In the past seven years 10,073 miners lost their lives. In the three years 1908-9-10 over 458,000 miners were injured. Every working day in the grimy underworld has its complement of misfortunes, for on an average five men are killed and 588 men are injured in the pit.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS AGAINST ALCOHOLISM.

Dr. Herceod, of the International Temperance Bureau, Lausanne, Switzerland, says, with regard to the next Congress against alcoholism: "Our Italian friends are busily at work preparing for the nineteenth International Congress against alcoholism, which is to take place in the first week of October, 1913. It was not possible to have it at Easter, as it was suggested, for during this period Milan is full of travellers, and the hotel accommodation would have been difficult to obtain and more expensive. October is a very convenient time for visiting Northern Italy. The committee at Milan, with the collaboration of the International Federation against the Misuse of Spirits at Berlin, and the International Temperance Bureau at Lausanne, has worked out an advance programme, in which English specialists are well represented. Great stress will be laid at Milan on the social aspects of the liquor question."

DRINK AND THE CHILD.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is one of the most beneficent agencies at work in our land; but, says the Alliance News and Temperance Reformer, its existence in our midst is a disgrace to our humanity and to our Christianity. In the year ending March 30, 1912, the Society investigated 54,118 complaints of cruelty to children in England, Ireland and Wales, and found that 52,371 of these cases, involving the lives of 156,637 children, were well founded. The complaints are classified as follows:—Neglect and starvation, 47,010; ill-treatment and assault, 4,134; offences against morality—indecent and criminal assaults 390, immoral surroundings 417—807; exposure for begging, 673; exposure, 552; abandonment, 300; baby farming, 57; manslaughter, 3; other wrongs, 582. Total, 54,118.

* * *

Of the children affected 154,387 were related to the offenders. There were rather more girls than boys; 22,856 of the children were babies under two years of age, of whom 983 were at nurse. The offenders numbered 38,152 men and 35,627 women. In the last ten years of its history the Society has dealt with cases of proved cruelty affecting 1,276,000 children, resulting in 8,670 deaths, and implicating 595,000 men and women. The director of this great Society says: "It is not an exaggerated estimate that 90 per cent. of the cases of neglect inquired into by the Society's officers are due to the habits of excessive drinking on the part of one or both of the parents."

THE MORAVIAN BRETHREN.

One relic of Czech Lollardy still preserves its identity. The Unitas Fratrum founded in 1457, once overspread Bohemia and Moravia, but the Jesuits and the Counter-reformation destroyed it by sword, fire, and banishment. Its direct ecclesiastical descendant is the Moravian Brotherhood of modern times, which was re-established in 1727 at Herrnhut in Saxony. Remote and secluded valleys in Dauphiné and Piedmont were reached by Bohemian writings; the Waldenses or Vaudois show the influence (not unmixed) of Wycliffe transmitted through Huss. The Methodist Church in England and America is another witness to the same influence. Readers of John Wesley's "Journal" know how he sailed to Georgia with over twenty Moravian brethren, spent a month with the Moravian Spangenberg at Savannah, corresponded with Count Zinzendorf, and visited him at Herrnhut. It was the Moravian Peter Böhler to whom he traced his conversion, and it was not until 1745 that he cut himself loose from the brotherhood.—From "On Moravian Brethren," by L. C. Miall, in the Cornhill Magazine for August.

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had a rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingway, London, W.C.

Suffrage Conference for the HOLIDAYS on Dartmoor.

A SUFFRAGE CONFERENCE will be held on Dartmoor during August and the early part of September. Lectures on the various questions relating to the political emancipation of women will be given by the Rev. HATTIE BAKER, Dr. ROSA BALE, Miss KILGOUR (Women's Local Government Society), Dr. GILBERT SLATER (Principal of Ruskin College, Oxford), Dr. MABEL RAMSAY, Miss ALISON GARLAND, and others.

Dousland Grange is situated in one of the most beautiful parts of Dartmoor. It is only 3 minutes from Dousland Station and 1½ miles from Yelverton.

For terms and all communications address to Miss ALISON GARLAND, Dousland, Yelverton.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. | HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.

A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.

Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.

Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.

The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.

The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching

—II. A. Stephen Noel.

Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.

The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.

Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.

Bertram Lister, M.A.

T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.

F. J. Gould.

H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.

Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]

Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.

By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

PLUMS.—Persnore Egg Plums, 24 lbs. 6/6, 12 lbs. 3/9. Victorias, 24 lbs. 8/6, 12 lbs. 4/9. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c. Bundles of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable; wears for years. Scores of beautiful designs, fascinating shades.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 10, 1912.

Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3660.
NEW SERIES, No. 764.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net.

MAN'S CHIEF END, and other Sermons.

By B. R. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of
ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Modern Handbooks of Religion

Crown 8vo. 2/- each net.

The Jewish Religion in the Time of Jesus. By Dr. G. HOLLMAN, of Halle.
Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 150 pp.

The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 176 pp.

Paul: A Study of his Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.
Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 200 pp.

The Apostolic Age. By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. 144 pp.

Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. Dr. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg. Translated by V. D. DAVIS, B.A. 160 pp.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT

St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 133, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

The Tides of Devotion. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 27.

"Values of the Faith." By W. SCOTT PALMER. July 20.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Professor FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

WEESEN - on - the - WALLENSEE.—

In connection with Mr. LUMMIS' Swiss tour, special tickets are issued for the latter part of August (16 to 27), giving ten days at Weesen, at an inclusive charge of nine guineas. —15, Green-street, Cambridge.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.

HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILLIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—

PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, August 18.

LONDON.

Acton, Cressfield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. A. D. BECKWITH.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11, Mr. A. E. CARLIER; 7, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS; no evening service.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. F. K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. EDWARD CAPLETON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. H. W. KING; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Mr. VICTOR MOODY.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HALL.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Prof. MORRIS OWEN.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W. No morning service until Sept. 15; 6.30, Mr. A. M. STABLES.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11, Mr. A. H. SINGLETON. No evening service during August.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Mr. F. E. ALLEN.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road. Closed during August.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15, Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, LL.B. No evening service.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Rev. H. W. KING.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 15.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Rev. W. H. BURGESS.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Mr. JOHN KINGS-MAN.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. J. CHANNING POLLARD.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel. Closed during first three weeks of August.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street. Closed.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. PEGLER, B.A.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Mr. T. MAYNARD.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Prof. P. MOORE.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TEAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. J. WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WILSON.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, Sandon, Blackness, Jarvis Brook, Sussex.

DEATHS.

HILL.—On Aug. 13, at 196, Marylebone-road, London, Octavia Hill, granddaughter of the late Dr. Southwood Smith.
 RAWSON.—On Aug. 13, very suddenly, Agnes Harriet, youngest daughter of the late Harry Rawson, of Eccles and Manchester.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

WANTED, an Organist and Choir-master for the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Hackney. £25 per annum. Two services and practice weekly.—Apply to Miss WHITEHEAD, 63, Clapton Common, N.E.

SALARY OPTIONAL.—Lady, well connected, requires post Housekeeper, Companion to invalid, etc. Domesticated; nursing; supervise servants.—P., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, for the Argentine, experienced Nursery-Governess. Must be fond of children and quiet country life.—For all particulars apply, 30, Sheepcote-road, Harrow.

POST required as Companion-Nurse to invalid or elderly lady; knowledge of cooking, housekeeping, etc.; nominal or no salary, refined home, aged 36.—M. F., Rosery, Medstead, Hampstead.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.—Young Lady, aged 18, native of Luxemburg, and educated at Lycée in that city, seeks situation in an English home or small school, from October next, where she would give lessons in French or German.—ETTINGER, 45, Highgate-hill, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	E	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	547
THE EJECTED MINISTERS	548
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—
The Story of Gezer	549
The Progress of English Philosophy.	551
Harebells	552
A Little Vanithee	552
QUESTIONS AT ISSUE :—
Blasphemy Laws	558

BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—

A Schoolmaster's Lay Sermons	554
Canon Wilson on Christian Unity	555
The Apprentice	555
The Unity of Faith	555
The Cathedrals of England and Wales	556
An Anglo-Saxon Abbot	556
A Day with Ralph Waldo Emerson	556

Publications Received	556
FOR THE CHILDREN	556
MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
London Boys on Holiday	557
Yorkshire Ministers' Union	558
Portuguese Slavery	558
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	558
NOTES AND JOTTINGS	559

 * All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual report of the Home Office on the administration of the licensing laws, which was issued on Tuesday, is a social document of first-class importance. It illustrates the growth in Government publications of a tendency, of which we strongly approve, to interpret the significance of statistics and make them the basis of comparative study. For instance, it is pointed out that it is not easy to draw definite conclusions of any connection between the closing of licensed premises and the amount of drunkenness from the fluctuating figures of arrests and convictions. "The figures are primarily a reflection of police activity, which itself is largely affected by public opinion and other circumstances in each locality. Any stimulus to the campaign against drunkenness results in an increase (possibly sustained and progressive for a time) in the convictions. On the other hand, indifference will be reflected in a drop in convictions."

* * *

THE most disturbing feature of the report is the increase of convictions for drunkenness in 1911, 172,130 in 1911 compared with 161,922 in 1910, a rise of 6.26 per cent. Part of this increase may be due to police vigilance in certain localities, but there is apparently no reason to attribute it to that cause alone. There was, unfortunately, an increase in the case of women as well as men. The figures dealing with the extinction of licences are also unsatisfactory. The report suggests that in many cases compensation has been awarded on too high a scale, and one glaring instance is given in which the Secretary of State felt it his duty to interfere. The consequence of high compensation is that the funds available for the purpose are soon exhausted, and a vigorous administration of the Act becomes very difficult in face of the organised opposition of the Trade. We are glad to find that the Home Office is alive to the existence of this danger, and is keeping a watchful eye upon it.

* * *

THE problem of rural life lies behind many of our social difficulties. England has never tackled seriously the question of a healthy and progressive village life, or realized as France has done the national value of an intelligent and thriving peasantry. A report of a Social Service Committee in the diocese of Ely has again laid bare some of the facts, especially in connection with rural housing. The cottages are too few in number for the people who require them, and too small for the elementary decencies of family life. The following statement based upon personal investigation speaks for itself :—

"The insufficient number of cottages causes trouble of several kinds. In 18 parishes it has recently prevented young couples from marrying. In others it obliges men to live at a long distance from their work. We hear of many who have to walk four miles each way, and one nine miles. That is a cruel addition to the labours of the day. Another effect is over-crowding. The young men and women who cannot marry remain in their parents' houses. The old people in receipt of pensions live with their sons and daughters because they cannot find a lodging. And each case of overcrowding tends to lower the standard of comfort and of decency in the whole neighbourhood."

* * *

THE success of the projected Roman Catholic Mission into the Putumayo district will be greatly helped by the Encyclical letter which the Pope has addressed to the Archbishops and Bishops of Latin America. As was to be expected in the case of a man so good and so simple-hearted in his devotion to religion as Pius X., the letter is couched in terms of grave sorrow and indignation, and is full of a strong and urgent pity for the natives who have been the victims of outrage and crime. "We particularly urge you," he writes to his Venerable Brethren, the Bishops, "to foster and promote all the good works instituted in your dioceses for the benefit of the Indians, and to see that other works likely to contribute to this end may be instituted. In the next place you will diligently admonish your flocks on their most sacred duty of helping religious missions to the natives who first inhabited the American soil. Let them know that they ought to help this work especially in two ways—to wit, by their gifts and by their prayers; and that it is not only their religion, but their country also, that asks this of them. Do you, moreover, take care that wheresoever moral instruction is given, in seminaries, in colleges, in convent schools, and more especially in the churches, Christian charity, which holds all men, without distinction of nation or colour, as true brethren, shall be continually preached and commended. And this charity must be made manifest not so much by words as by deeds. Moreover, every opportunity must be taken to show what a great dishonour is done to the Christian name by these base deeds which we are here denouncing."

* * *

BUT the Pope is not content with urging succour for the Indians; he pronounces the anathemas of the Church against any who "shall dare or presume to reduce the said Indians to slavery, to sell them, to buy them, to exchange or give them, to separate them from their wives and children, to deprive them of goods and chattels, to transport or send them to other places, or in any way whatsoever to rob them of freedom and hold them in slavery; or to give counsel, help, favour, and work on any pretext of colour to them that do these things, or to preach or teach that it is lawful, or to co-operate therewith in any way whatever." He further deprives the ordinary priest of the power of absolving any who have been guilty of these crimes, and decrees that all such cases must be reserved to the bishop.

* * *

In a letter to the Times Mrs. Humphry Ward is able to make the pleasant announcement that the movement for providing organised play for London school children during the holidays is in a healthy and progressive state. This year there are 80 organised playgrounds as against 50 last year, half of them being controlled by the London County Council and half by the Evening Play Centres Committee. They are all under proper supervision, with a full equipment of toys and games material. Mrs. Ward estimates that the total attendances in the 40 playgrounds with which she is immediately concerned are likely to reach 450,000 during the holiday month. "The increase already visible," she writes, "shows how the children delight in the playgrounds, where they find games, active and quiet, pencils to draw with and paints to colour with, cots for the tiny babies to sleep in, portable swings for those a little older, mending and knitting corners for the bigger girls, singing games and picture-books—all under the control of a happy and gentle discipline, maintained by trained teachers and young student-assistants, fresh from college, to whom the playgrounds are a new and, to judge from their enthusiasm, a very pleasant experience."

* * *

MRS. WARD has the highest opinion of the social value of this kind of work. The following delightful description of a playground interior speaks for itself:—"It is interesting to see how the grounds work, how children of the first week who arrive dirty, unkempt, and listless after much unshepherded loafing in the streets, owing in many cases to the fact that their mothers are all out at work, become by the second week clean, vigorous, and alert, ready for cricket and football, or singing games, ready, too, for drawing or needlework; how the big boys of last year who have now left school come back to help the superintendents in the grounds; how the bigger girls form groups round the visiting nurse, who talks to them about their 'bibys,' while the 'biby' itself lies asleep on one of the stretcher cots provided for the first time this year, and the superintendent as she goes by gently takes the horrid 'comforter' from its mouth; how the mothers come in shyly, look round, and thank the superintendents."

* * *

THE death of Sir Alfred Wills will revive many interesting legal and personal memories. During the 21 years in which he was a Judge of the High Court he was associated with many celebrated cases, notably Sharp v. Wakefield and Cockerton v. the London School Board. He had the reputation of being a sound and conscientious lawyer, and his gifts, both of mind and character, qualified him for the office of an eminently fair administrator. At all times he cared more for the justice than the brilliancy of his decisions. In private life he was entirely free from the airs of superiority which are often the penalty of great position, and his charity and generosity have been described as almost beyond the verge of prudence. In many respects Sir Alfred Wills was a typical product of the fine Nonconformist stock from which he sprung, and with which he was so closely linked by his marriage first to a daughter of Mr. George Martineau, and secondly to a daughter of Mr. T. L. Taylor, of Starston, Norfolk.

* * *

THERE will be deep and widespread sorrow at the announcement of the death of Miss Octavia Hill, though it will be mingled with heartfelt gratitude for a life rich in beneficence and devotion to the common good. In most of her work Miss Hill was a pioneer, and the very success of her efforts in preaching the gospel of wholesome surroundings, of cleanliness and beauty, has helped to conceal from the present generation the greatness of our debt to her strong initiative and unflagging enthusiasm. Everything she did was singularly consistent, and had its root in a few strong principles to which she clung very tenaciously. The foundation of the Kyrle Society, and her later devotion to the work of the National Trust, sprang from the same motives as her early experiments in housing reform. The spiritual lessons which she learned from Frederick Denison Maurice, and a passionate reverence for human nature with its undeveloped possibilities of good, guided her through life and were with her to the end.

THE EJECTED MINISTERS.

August 24, 1662.

NEXT Saturday will be the 250th anniversary of the great Nonconformist exodus from the Church of England in consequence of the Act of Uniformity. No description of the event by a modern pen could equal the contemporary account which we transcribe from RICHARD BAXTER'S *Memorial of his Life and Times:—

"When the Act of Uniformity was passed, it gave all the Ministers that could not conform, no longer time than till Bartholomew-day, August 24, 1662, and then they must be all cast out: (This fatal day called to remembrance the French Massacre, when on the same day 30,000 or 40,000 Protestants perished by religious Roman zeal and charity). I had no place, but only that I preached twice a week by request in other men's congregations (at Milk-street and Blackfriars), and the last sermon that ever I preached in public was on May 25. The reasons why I gave over sooner than most others was, 1. Because lawyers did interpret a doubtful clause in the Act as ending the liberty of Lecturers at that time. 2. Because I would let Authority soon know, that I intended to obey them in all that was lawful. 3. Because I would let all Ministers in England understand in time, whether I intended to conform or not; for had I stayed to the last day, some would have conformed the sooner, upon a supposition that I intended it. These, with other reasons, moved me to cease three months before Bartholomew-day, which many censured me for a while, but after, better saw the reasons of it.

"When Bartholomew-day came, about One thousand eight hundred or Two thousand Ministers were silenced and cast out: and the affections of most men thereupon were such as made me fear it was a prognostick of our further sufferings: for when pastors and people should have been humbled for their sins, and lamented their former negligence and unfruitfulness, most of them were filled with disdain and indignation against the Prelates, and were ready with confidence to say, 'God will not long suffer so wicked and cruel a generation of men: it will be but a little while till God will pull them down.' And thus men were puffed up by other men's sinfulness, and kept from a kindly humbling of themselves.

"And now came in the great inundation of calamities, which in many streams overwhelmed thousands of godly Christians, together with their pastors. As for example, 1. Hundreds of able Ministers, with their wives and children, had neither house nor bread; for their former maintenance served them but for the time, and few of them laid up anything for the future ; for many of them had not past £30 or £40 per annum apiece, and most but about £60 or £80 per annum, and very few above £100, and few had any considerable estates of their own. 2. The people's poverty was so great, that they were not able much to relieve their Ministers. 3. The jealousy of the State, and the malice of their enemies were so great, that people that were willing durst not be known to give to their ejected Pastors, lest it should be said that they maintained schism, or were making collections for some plot or insurrection. 4. The hearts of the people were grieved for the loss of their Pastors. 5. Many places had such set over them in their steads, as they could not with conscience or comfort commit the conduct of their souls to. And they were forced to own all these, and all others that were thrust upon them against their wills, and to own also the undisciplined churches, by receiving the Sacrament in their several parishes whether they would or not. 6. Those that did not this were to be excommunicated, and then to have a writ sued out against them de excommunicatio capiendo, to lay them in the jail, and seize on their estates. 7. The people were hereupon unavoidably divided among themselves ; for some would have nothing to do with these imposed Pastors, but would in private attend their former Pastors only. Others would do both, and take all that they thought good of both. Some would only hear the public sermons, others would also go to Common Prayer where the Minister was tolerable. Some would join in the Sacrament with them, where the Minister was honest, and others would not. And this division they long foresaw, but could not possibly prevent. 8. And the Ministers themselves were thus also divided, who before seemed all one ; for some would go to Church, to Common Prayer, to Sacraments, and others would not. Some of them thought that it was their duty to preach publicly in the streets or fields while the people desired it, and not to cease their work through fear of man, till they lay in jails, or were all banished. Others thought that a continued endeavour to benefit their people privately, would be more serviceable to the Church, than one or two sermons and a jail, at such a time, when the multitudes of sufferers, and the odious titles put upon them, obscured and clogged the benefit of sufferings. And some thought that the Covenant bound all to separate from Common Prayer, and Prelates, and Parish Communion ; and others thought that it rather bound them to this Communion and Worship in case they could have no better, and that to teach from house to house in private and bring the people to attend in public, was the most righteous and edifying way, where the imposed Minister was tolerable. 9. Hereupon those Ministers that would not cease from preaching were thrust into prisons, and censured (some of them) the rest that did not do as they. 10. The rest that preached only secretly to a few were looked on as discontented and disaffected to the Government, and on every rumour of a new plot or conspiracy, taken up, and many of them laid in prison. 11. The Prelatists and they were hereby set at a further distance, and charity more destroyed, and reconciliation made more hopeless, and almost anything believed that was said against a Non-conformist. 12. The conforming part of the Old Ministry was also divided from the rest, and censures set them further at a distance ; (but yet where serious godliness appeared, it kept up some charity and respect, and united them in the main). All these calamities brought another. 13. That the people were tempted to murmur at their superiors, and call them cruel persecutors, and secretly rejoice if any hurt befel them, and many forgot that they are to honour their governors, even when they suffer by them, and not only to forbear evil thoughts and words against them, but to endeavour to keep up their honour with their subjects. 14. By all these sins, these murmurings, and these violations of the interest of the Church and the Cause of Christ, the land was prepared for that further inundation of calamities (by war and plague and scarcity) which hath since brought it near to desolation.

* See Reliquiae Baxterianae, London, 1696, pp. 384-386.

"It fell out one day in Mr. CALAMY's church at Aldermanbury, that the preacher failed, and the people desired Mr. CALAMY to preach ; which he did upon confidence that the Act did not extend to such an occasional sermon (some lawyers had told him so). But for this he was sent to Newgate jail, where he continued in the keeper's lodgings, many daily flocking to visit him, till the Lord BRIDGMAN (as is said) had given it as his judgment, that his sermon was not within the penalty of the Act. And O what insulting there was by that party in the Newsbook and in their discourses, that CALAMY that would not be a bishop was in jail ! And when his sermon was printed, an invective against him came out, in language like an inquisitor, that shewed a vehement thirst for blood. But precious in the sight of the Lord is the blood of his holy ones.

"Abundance more were laid in jails in many counties for preaching, and the vexation of the people's souls was increased. At St. Albans, Mr. PARTRIDGE, the ejected Minister, being desired to preach a funeral sermon, a captain or lieutenant came in with his pistol charged, and shot one of the hearers dead, and the preacher was sent to prison.

"There were many citizens of London, who had then a great compassion on the Ministers, whose families were utterly destitute of maintenance, and fain they would have relieved them, and had such a method, that the citizens of each county should help the Ministers of that county ; but they durst not do it, lest it were judged a conspiracy. Wherefore I went for them to the Lord Chancellor, and told him plainly of it, that compassion moved them, but the suspicions of these distempered times deterred them, and I desired to have his Lordship's judgment, Whether they might venture to be so charitable without misinterpretation or danger ? And he answered, 'Aye, God forbid but men should give their own according as their charity leads them.' And so having his pre-consent, I gave it them for encouragement. But they would not believe that it was cordial, and would be any security to them, and so they never durst venture upon such a method which might have made their charity effectual ; but a few that were most willing, did much more than all the rest, and solicited some of their own acquaintance, for their counties relief."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE STORY OF GEZER.

AT Er-Ramleh, about twelve miles south-east from Jaffa, the road to Jerusalem is crossed by the railway which, a fairly close companion thus far, now diverges due south. The road keeps on south-east for another dozen miles or so, and then turns east (at Emmaus, as supposed) and climbs up to the city by gradients rising 2,000 ft. in the 28 miles from Er-Ramleh. The rail finds an easier but longer ascent by the Wady Sarâr, which is entered some ten miles south of the crossing of the routes. In the angle made by their divergence is a projection from the highlands which stretch from north to south like a wall as the traveller approaches Judæa from the sea. On this tongue of land, one of the many foot-hills of the Shephelah district, stands Tell Jezar, a long mound rising 300 ft. above the plain, conspicuous to road and rail.

If we climb the Tell an interesting picture is seen. Looking back westward towards the Mediterranean coast, the sand dunes of which are thirteen miles away, we see an intervening belt of green and fertile country. Despite an occasional hillock and many undulations it is fairly describable as a plain—of Philistia here and southward, of Sharon to the north. The summit of our Tell being 756 ft. above sea-level we can trace the coastline well each way, and note the long leagues of wheat and grass-land to the right and to the left, with here and there a palm or two, a greyish orchard of olives, or a group of darker and loftier terebinths. Through the blue mists of seventy miles the ridge of Carmel can be seen far away to the north. Eastward the massive highland intervenes, but from slightly higher tops than ours, to the south, within easy walk from the Tell, we can see many a mile "as thou goest to Gaza."

Along this belt of coast-land caravans and armies have passed and re-passed between Egypt and Mesopotamia, full in sight of our mound, certainly since four thousand years ago. The natural pass from Jaffa (Joppa) to Jerusalem goes up directly under observation from this point; the alternative Wady Sarâr (Vale of Sorek) begins, as we have seen, but a few miles to the south. For purposes strategic or commercial, therefore, the position is obviously important; add that there is a perennial supply of water, plentiful as things go in Palestine, and the attractions of the site for wanderers seeking a settlement are clear. How continuously attractive it was during more than thirty centuries recent discoveries have proved.

Within the past twenty-five years the spade has been busy in Palestine. In earlier years, thanks to the invaluable labours of Wilson, Warren, Conder, Kitchenner and others, the topography of Palestine had been detailed with a clearness and precision unrealised in the case of any other land of antiquity; and if some of their identifications of site were hazardous many were thoroughly well-established, and the gain to Biblical study was invaluable. Some very useful underground work had also been done, especially at Jerusalem; but the ample and striking revelations of the ancient life of the Mesopotamian and Nile valleys had not been paralleled in the case of the Israelites at home. When the Egyptian explorers came upon the famous hoard of tablets at Tell el Amarna in 1887, containing correspondence between the Egyptian court and vassals in Syria, including Palestine, it was natural that hopes should run high of similar discoveries in Palestine itself. Accordingly, in 1890, Mr. Flinders Petrie began extensive excavations at Tell el Hesi, the ancient Lachish. In 1898 Mr. F. J. Bliss and Mr. R. A. Stewart Macalister attacked a group of hills in the Shephelah, some twelve miles north of Tell el Hesi. Four years later Mr. Macalister went further north still, and set about the exploration of Tell Jezar (Gezer). Elsewhere at this date similar industry testified to the zeal of brethren in science though of different nationality. Dr. Sellin, of Vienna, opened up the ruins of Taanach, and a little later Dr. Schumacher, on behalf of Germany, investigated Tell el Mutassellim, now confidently identified with Megiddo, both sites being on the north-east flank of Carmel above the plain of the Kishon. Other notable work has been done by Sellin at Jericho, and more recently at Sebastiyeh (Samaria) by Americans. So far as we know, the work at Tell Jezar, thanks to the support of the Palestine Exploration Fund, has been carried on with exceptional thoroughness; certainly the results are embodied in three volumes (just published) which truly deserve the epithet monumental.*

Seven arduous years have been spent by Mr. Macalister and his assistants upon this heap of debris. If they have not had the fortune to light upon much script, they have certainly laid bare much other evidence that is of the greatest interest and value to the students of religion among the Semites in Palestine. The site investigated aptly illustrates the Biblical term "city." Following the natural contours of the hill the enclosing walls were found to measure roughly half-a-mile in length with a breadth ranging between 450 ft. and 600 ft. We may remind ourselves that the natural boundaries of the original Jerusalem site result in a rude quadrangle about half-a-mile each way. Trenching in orderly fashion across the greater part of the long oval indicated on the Tell—a portion of the site being reserved from exploration as containing modern graves and a Wely—the excavators have successively unearthed the relics of different periods back to the earliest signs of human habitation. The hill is composed of limestone, easily worked; natural caves, artificially shaped and enlarged, were clearly the first dwellings here. Who the troglodytes were by race is not determined; their remains show them to have been small of stature and non-Semitic. The date of their settlement upon the hill is quite vague; but at least they were neolithic. Upon their primitive beginnings, including probably religious markings ("cups," &c.) on the rocks, various Semitic invaders built up their systems in turn. Four Semitic periods are distinguished; after they close there is only one stage that is of great interest to us.

The earliest Semitic immigration would appear to have taken place about the middle of the third century B.C. It seems to have been an off-shoot from that "Canaanite" diffusion from nomadic Arabia which ranks as the second Semitic stage in Babylonian history. Here, then, at Gezer, are relics of those kinsmen of the Hebrews who preceded them in the occupation of the Palestinian strip and, settling into fixed communities, prepared a nest of civilisation, and to a large extent of religious practice, for later comers, including both Hebrews and Philistines. Two outstanding monuments of these early Semites remain—a great subterranean water-passage which testifies to considerable engineering ability and to the efficiency of flints well-wielded, and a great "High Place," no doubt considerably developed in successive ages, but in greatest likelihood begun by these Canaanite fore-runners.

Somewhere about 1800 B.C. the second Semitic period begins. A marked rise occurs in the quality of the work in tools, pottery, &c., and now external evidence begins to come in. A Pharaoh of the close of the 16th century, Thothmes III., has bequeathed to us the record of his conquests in Syria, including Gezer, if the decipherment holds good. Another century or so brings us to the period which has been so strangely illuminated by the Tell el Amarna correspondence, in the course of which we can trace Gezer's varying fortunes and estimate its political and social conditions at this time. A further Egyptian invasion, by Merneptah, preceded the accepted date of that third Semitic immigration which we associate with the name of Joshua and the Hebrew tribesmen; whether certain "Hebrews" had not already come across Jordan in the Tell el Amarna period is an interesting point not conclusively settled as yet. Be that as it may, it is highly important to notice that so far as artistic remains go, and they are copious, the pre-Israelite centuries, from 1800-1400 B.C., were decidedly the time of highest culture. Here it is, according to Macalister, that the pottery shows the most direct influences of Egypt, Crete, the Aegean, and especially Cyprus; the ware is on the whole well-refined and good, the shapes best and most graceful, and the painting elaborate. Thenceforward the declension is unmistakable, general, and continuous, till the Hellenistic influence comes in after the fall of the Hebrew monarchy.

But we are glancing too far and must return, were it only to note the incoming of a very famous but little understood non-Semitic element in this third period, 1400-1000 B.C. Of course, the reference is to the Philistines. Viewed through the eyes of ancient Hebrew aversion, then quite excusable, these coast-land settlers appear in no enviable character; but Mr. Macalister is not a whit too severe in denouncing in this connection the ignorance and prejudice typical of a popular religious writer, whose name, however, he mercifully withholds. If the Philistines had told the story how different it would have been! To mention but one point in their favour, it seems clear that it was they who introduced iron to Palestine. And by way of illustration of the irony of fate we find (says the author) that "stupidity of mind and heart" are politely called "Philistinism," whereas, if his careful science is right in the identification, "the most artistic objects in all the excavation" came from Philistine tombs!

The closing Semitic period dates from David, whose exploits saved his race from a foe so formidable in various ways, and extends to the sixth century. Bible readers will recall the present to Solomon of Gezer as marriage dower by the Pharaoh of the day. A more illustrious connection is that with the Maccabees in the second century, B.C., the Hellenistic period. Modin, where their revolt broke out in defence of race and religion, is not far away, and many a fight took place in the valleys hereby. At Emmaus one Syrian general was defeated, another at Bethhoron a little farther north. In defeat the fugitives fled to the stronghold at Gezer. By and by Judas Maccabæus himself was slain, and Bacchides the Syrian fortifying the stronghold afresh planted a new garrison there. Once more the tide turned, and Simon, one of the Maccabean brethren, drove out the Syrians, abolished the idolatry, and built a house—the walls of which were found—in which John Hyrcanus lived. Very soon the power of Rome loomed large upon the scene, but before Pompey's invasion B.C. 63, the hill-top was abandoned for village sites hard by, and the dust of ages began to settle down upon the deserted walls.

The three very handsome volumes now before us acquire a high value from the evident moderation of the author. He not infrequently has to warn the reader against exaggerations and hasty conclusions formed by injudicious persons in connection with parts of the evidence already published. His skill in the different branches of archæology is of a very high order, and this, together with the moderation we refer to, inclines one the more to accept his suggestions when he ventures to offer them.

* The Excavation of Gezer, 1902-1905, and 1907-1909. By R. A. Stewart Macalister. 3 vols. Murray (for the P.E.F.), 1912.

Perhaps the most romantic of these is as to the provenance of "the seventh stone" in a line of standing pillars (masseboth) found, still in position for the most part, in that great "High Place" in the heart of the city, the discovery of which is among the most striking results of the work at Gezer. This stone besides other peculiarities is of a quality not found in the neighbourhood, but is like material at Jerusalem and elsewhere. Now the Tell el Amarna correspondence shows that there was bad blood between the Jebusites (of "Urusalim") and the men of Gezer. The author's self-restraint in a tempting situation will be discerned in the following passage where the italics are his own:— "This stone certainly was dragged from elsewhere, probably as a war trophy, and possibly came from Jerusalem. It probably was previously a standing stone in the High Place of the city from which it was dragged; and it might be a monument of the hostilities complained of in Abdi-Hiba's letters to the King of Egypt" from "Urusalim" (Jerusalem).

The Palestine Exploration Fund, as well as the author, should be warmly thanked for this fine record of a great piece of work. Many thousands of articles are pictured and described, ranging from stones and graffiti, to jewels, pottery, tools, toys—everything that was gleaned from the soil that could throw a light on the life and ideas of the people and their implications are fully discussed. If the bearing of much is but remote or indirect upon Biblical interests it is surely of the highest possible consequence to be able to picture more truly and vividly the manners and conditions of the men among whom the noble ideals of Hebrew religion slowly and painfully struggled upward. That the Canaanitish stock, with whom it is evident here the Israelitish stock was closely fused, was not greatly inferior if at all to the latter in general culture is certain; indeed, as we have seen, the evidence tends distinctly the other way. And yet here is but too palpable evidence of the gross and cruel temper that stirred Hebrew prophecy into wrath. The High Place is a vast cemetery of new-born babes, sacrificed, we must suppose, to appease divinities that claimed the fruit of the body for the sin of the soul. And the besotting glorification of sensuality is as unmistakable here as throughout Syria generally. Prophetism may have been "narrow," but at least it strove against the ape and tiger, and ultimately not in vain.

W. G. T.

THE PROGRESS OF ENGLISH PHILOSOPHY.

THE English are perhaps not generally regarded as a philosophical nation; they are not viewed as, by temperament and habit, given to deep speculation on the things of life and destiny. The English mind is said to be practical rather than theoretical, not given to probing deeply into questions of which the practical interest is not immediately obvious. Yet it is a fact, and in some ways a very remarkable fact, that English, or at any rate British, thinkers have been responsible for some of the best and most original labour that the history of philosophical thinking can show. There is a distinctly English movement in philosophy, a definitely original British addition to the general total. In the history of philosophy generally it is probably true that the contributions of English thinkers have not received the attention they deserved, the prejudice against the notion of England as a home of philosophical thought having always been extraordinarily strong and powerful against any true estimate of the actual facts of the case. It is, therefore, interesting and in a measure satisfying to have the opportunity of welcoming such a book as that which Professor Seth has contributed to the series arranged under the general head of "Channels of English Literature." Professor Seth writes on "English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy" (London: J. M. Dent. 5s. net), and the mere contemplation of the outside of such a book is sufficient to disprove the assertion that the English are not a philosophical people. A study of the contents of the book leaves one rather amazed at the extent of fine, original speculation which English thinkers have at various times given to the world. A nation which has produced such thinkers as Bacon, Hobbes, Berkeley, Hume, J. S. Mill, Herbert Spencer, and F. H. Bradley, can hardly be described as lacking in the philosophical sense. Hume certainly takes a front place in the history of thought, whilst Bacon, J. S. Mill, and Spencer are not so far behind. In any case, whatever may be the state of affairs with regard to metaphysical speculation, it is undeniable that the contributions of English thinkers to the study of ethical problems are second in importance to none, excepting possibly the invaluable gifts of Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoic philosophers.

This fact that, in English thought, the problems and question of the moral life have always been of paramount interest is of great importance. It points back to what, after all, is probably an essentially English characteristic, noticeable even in those thinkers who have abandoned themselves to more purely metaphysical speculation. English philosophy, even in its most transcendental flights, has always been ruled and guided by the ethical impulse: the ethical need has always been more in evidence than the metaphysical. "The end of knowledge," wrote Bacon, "is the relief of man's estate"; for the founder of modern scientific method, the sole object of speculation was the possibility of better equipment for dealing with man's moral and political condition. Even so detached a thinker as Hobbes was conscious all through of an underlying political motive: the end of knowledge, he declared, is power, power, that is, in the ordered community of men, social power, practical political power. Herbert Spencer, the most consciously and conspicuously systematic of all English philosophers, says of his great work that "the whole system was at the outset and has ever continued to be a basis for a right rule of life, individual and social." There is a subtle difference in all this attitude from the attitude which inspired, let us say, Hegel in the "Phaenomenologie": the English is nearer the Greek than the German here. It is, of course, this characteristic interest in ordinary, practical, everyday life that has led English thinkers so far into the realm of ethics; they have always been on the look out for the right rule of conduct, and from the definite search for this they have never been tempted, as the thinkers of Germany have been, by the delights of the "high priori" road. The dominant interest in English philosophy, as Professor Seth says, has always been the practical. It is interesting to observe how this practical interest has influenced, not only the content of English philosophy, but also its method. There is in English philosophy next to nothing of that amazing power of speculation in the realm of pure thought which characterises the great period of German philosophical thinking. English philosophy has always kept very close to ordinary experience, being content to test all its conclusions by reference to immediate fact, and prone to distrust every seeming advance beyond the obvious warrant of fact. English philosophers have pursued, or at least tried to pursue, a strictly scientific method in their dealings with reality, and in so far they have been loyal to the Baconian tradition. The English mind loves induction rather than deduction, and gives but a slow welcome to generalisations and comprehensive, system producing ideas. This fact, by the way, probably explains why so many English thinkers have shown themselves utterly unable to comprehend even the rudiments of such a systematic piece of thinking as, say, Hegel's Logic. We English are not naturally "made that way"; our genuine home-bred philosophy has always been experimental, content to follow the line of the particular rather than the general. Locke's famous attack on "innate ideas," which has since been so roughly criticised, was really an expression of the natural English dislike of the effort to compel experience into a ready-made system; the quarrel with what is called "intellectualism" to-day expresses the same dislike.

That English philosophy has been always experimental does not mean that it has always been empirical or materialistic. It is true that nearly all the greatest names of English philosophy are to be found on the side of empiricism or empirical realism—that would seem almost to be the natural English philosophy; but against all can be set the name of Berkeley, in intention and method a purely English philosopher, and yet the exponent of an almost pure idealism. Further, the rationalistic method of speculation, which, in the European tradition from Descartes on, produced idealism, has never been really absent from English thinking. Bacon himself never escaped it, though he professed to have done so. Hobbes is, in method, preponderatingly rationalistic, preferring deduction to induction always: the Cambridge Platonists were consistent exponents of rationalistic methods, with a strong idealistic bias. The strain was preserved in a modified form by Reid and Price and the "Common Sense" school, and was strongly marked in the Intuitionist moralists. In a thinker like J. S. Mill the two tendencies, empirical and rationalistic, were present together, and most of Mill's so-called inconsistencies are due to their continual conflict. Mill, with all his inconsistencies, perhaps because of them, is the best representative of thoroughly English philosophy. It is perhaps important to insist on this non-empirical aspect of English philosophy because it is so often supposed that Idealism is, in most if not all respects, a foreign growth. The fact, of course, is that when German idealism burst like a flood into English thought, it was not in any sense coming to an alien place, but to a place in which there was much even in the strictly native philosophy already sympathetic to it. In a narrower sense, of course, German idealism coming to England was actually returning home; without Locke there had been no Hume, without Hume no Kant, and without Kant no absolute idealism. But, on the whole, the main trend of sympathy in English philosophy has been always with realism and not with idealism; the English mind, even in its metaphysical flights, has always kept fairly close to the ordinary, practical, every-day view of Reality. England is the true home of empirical philosophy, inspired by a predominating ethical and practical interest.

If we ask for the ultimate value of English philosophy, it should not be difficult to discover. The importance of the persistent appeal to common, ordinary experience cannot be overlooked, and this appeal is characteristically English; the effort to pursue in philosophy a strictly scientific method, a method, that is, of induction, of observation and experiment, is altogether valuable, and here again English philosophy takes the lead; above all, perhaps, the steady refusal to give the ethical interest any save the first place must be counted to the credit of English thinking. English philosophy has never lost sight of the fact that man is essentially and primarily a practical animal, and that consequently the practical, ethical or moral, life must occupy the first place in his regard. English philosophy has, at any rate, helped to teach the lesson that no metaphysical speculation, no theory of life and reality, is worth while unless it satisfies the demands of the moral impulse and the moral need. This is admitted at the moment by idealists and realists alike, and, no matter how far they may carry the systematic procedure of knowledge in and for itself, they are always ready to allow the appeal to faith and a possibly deeper insight or intuition; whilst those who call themselves pragmatists actually reverse the position and subordinate the intellectual and even the scientific life to the practical. In any case, the ethical note, which is peculiarly characteristic of English philosophy, is triumphant and correspondingly valuable.

The story of the more detailed development of English philosophy should be read for itself, as it may be, on the whole, satisfactorily under the guidance of Professor Seth; it will serve, at any rate, to destroy the notion that we are not a philosophical people.

S. A. M.

HAREBELLS.

THEY grew in every rift that scarred the crag of slate, and wherever a little damp soil clung to its bare brow. No plant of such regal bounty as the Campanula rotundifolia has learnt the secret of economy and frugality so well. Where the moss holds but a precarious existence and the Polypodium fern sits tight to withstand the rude salutes of the storm, the harebell's stem in sinuous lengths hangs out from thread-like supports its large distended bells, which swing debonair and free to the passing breeze and lightly shake off the drops of the (for August) too frequent showers. The feature which won the plant its ancient name, hairbell, remains the source of a perennial wonder. The slender stem, the gracile stalks of the flowers, the pointed prolongations of the calyx, the linear leaves—all suggest an airy, fairy lightness which compares with the other bluebell, the wild hyacinth, as Madame Pavlova would compare with Falstaff.

How all the satin-skinned loveliness of the scalloped corolla finds room to travel up the delicate hanger; how the careful engineering is compassed which converts the five webbed claws into one beautiful bell, and slits the clapper into three recurved arms of a pearl-embossed chandelier; how the chemistry of nectar distillation and the provisioning of hundreds of purple ovules are transmitted along so narrow a way—this awakes admiration freshly renewed with every summer.

And the blooms seem to bewitch those who gaze long upon them, like the moon-flowers. Perhaps that accounts for the diversity of reports regarding their colour. "Bright blue," quoth one; "delicate sky-blue," remarks another; while a third designates them "purple," and a fourth "mauve," and a fifth "slate." Perhaps they are all correct, seeing that colour resides in the eye of the observer and not in the object. If one looks long enough, one will see more than colour. One sees faces peering out of the bells. And then one begins to hear them. First the crisp patter of the flowers striking against each other as they sway to and fro with the sighing wind, and then a faint tinkle, and then a melodious voice such as all lonely and wistful things may give out. It is one with the message of the song of the yellow bunting and that of the cry of the curlew. And all in keeping with the scene. On the Hermit's Crag (Craig-y-Meudwy) has lived for many years, alone, a man with whom life has dealt harshly and inequitably. He was deprived of his inheritance in favour of a younger brother. He spent a large portion of his manhood in paying another's debt for which he was not even remotely under legal obligation; a friend's treachery lost him the woman he would have wed; and the most critical events of his life have been hopelessly misunderstood. So he retired to the small croft with his dog and a few choice books to see if, haply, loving man a good deal less he might learn to love nature a good deal more. Twenty years he has so dwelt. And he has learnt more than he set out, perhaps, to do. He has learnt that hard labour is a boon. That to face the wind and the rain has its balm. That simplicity makes for sanity. That the lonely are least alone when most alone. That fellowship is still a supreme reality, fellowship of heart and mind with kindred souls, which no physical separation may annul. That time will vindicate every sacrifice. That the spirit can propitiate every foe. That it is better to be betrayed than to betray. That none can rob the soul of truth, of beauty; of the beatitude of its own love. That life is to be measured by the wine poured out, not by the wine drunk. That humble acceptance of misunderstanding brings sweet compensations. That chains cannot fetter the free spirit. That God understands. That whatever is, is best.

All around his croft, with the patch of barley and of oats and of wheat, grow the flowers that ask so little, receive so little, and give so much. And the hermit's heart is like the harebells.

J. T. D.

A LITTLE VANITHEE.

I TAKE leave to use this word, the Irish equivalent for what in Germany is called the "Haus-mutter," and in English, well, perhaps, "Housewife" is the nearest approach. But I think the Gaelic is prettier to hear, and of wider meaning. "Bean-an-Tighe" (observe the spelling), to give it in full, means "Woman" or, as Synge has it, "Lady of the House." The reason I want to describe this little Vanithee is, because she illustrates pretty forcibly the truth of a theory lately evolved in connection with the big question of Labour Unrest, and the condition of the workers and so forth; to the effect that many of the "lower orders," to employ a somewhat hateful term, could teach their so-called betters some of the important things of life.

This little Vanithee is the eldest girl in a family of eight. They live in the country in a sufficiently good house. The children are healthy, the father sober and kind and hard-working, the mother, well, just a real mother, loving above all things. Very contented and happy they were, till, some time ago, the devoted little mother was stricken down by serious illness.

Consternation hung like a dark cloud over the house of Halligan. It was so unexpected! The mother, the centre of all things, to have to go away, to hospital! What a scene it was, the morning she left! She lay ready on the bed, the younger children hanging about in awe-struck excitement; while Mollie, the little Vanithee, went to and fro, ministering to the poor sufferer with "sups" of cold water and cheery, loving words; and the two next biggest girls were gratified by being allowed a shoe each to warm at the hearth, before being put upon the helpless feet by Mollie.

Up dashed the motor, to take Mother away! In a flash she was gone. Father had carried her out, and been whirled away with her. . . .

It was all over; no more stir or necessity for effort. There was nothing more to do. Young Mollie began to cry, very quietly; and who could blame her? The trouble was, that the rest of the family felt bound to follow suit, down to the baby, who naturally didn't want to be out of the fashion . . . and such weeping and wailing as arose!

Unexpected help appeared. Nora Flynn, that lives a piece off down the boreen, came in. We have no great opinion of Noreen, with her love of flowery hats and Sunday dances at the cross-roads. But she's a pleasant creature withal, with a knack of organising little "faists" (feasts). A pot of jam is an event in the Halligan household. The tears ceased. One felt that the Noras have their efficiencies; they produce a sense of contentment. Their duties take on the guise of pleasures.

Then began a long probation of lonely responsibility for Mollie. She had to be Vanithee pro tem. And what a little, little one she was! Mollie must be every day of sixteen, but, as a countryman of hers once remarked, "Whatever age y'are, Mam, you don't look it!" Mollie doesn't look more than a ripe twelve. She is small and slender, with the darkest eyes and clouds of hair, the clearest olive skin imaginable; a probable throw-back to remote Spanish ancestry. On her small shoulders was now to devolve the making of a home for nine persons; and strict economy imperative.

How was it done? I don't know! The day's work includes early breakfast for Father, boys, and school-children. The last-named must then be "started," with books and lunch; and it's the pride of the little Vanithee's heart to lag no whit behind Mother's management, productive of neat hair and white pinafores.

The food for these hungry young birds! Mollie bakes three huge "griddle" cakes of wholesome home-grown wheat, every day. Often she digs the "dinner," as we still call potatoes, reminiscent of the day when they were the main food of the country. But clever Mollie fabricates toothsome stews, of "mait," i.e., bacon in slices, and onions; or perhaps a rabbit. . . . This in the intervals of scouring, churning, butter-making, feeding poultry, above all, washing for the household. The boys carry water for her, for it is at a distance; such is the indifference of the powers that be to the needs of a Vanithee. The children gather "sprigs" for the fire. But Mollie tackles the washing proper single-handed. She'll tell you exactly how she does it, having been "l'arned by the La'ndhry lady at school."

Father has made a garden for Mollie. She grows sweet peas, nasturtiums, and so forth there. But the best part of her work remains to be told. Indeed, can it be told? How is that grand result, Happiness, reached? And you may pass that cottage ten times a day, and never hear an angry or fretted word. Go in and accept the proffered stool by the fire, and watch Mollie as she gets the younger girls to sing for you; how proud she is of them! Better, see the baby sidling over to the little Vanithee, to be taken up and cuddled on those small knees! You lend a story-book, and Mollie reads aloud of an evening to the others, about Black Dog and Silver.

It is pleasant to be able to record the fact that Mollie's efforts to keep things going till Mother comes home have met their reward. That tender presence is back among her "care"; pale and fragile, but smiling and very thankful, as she looks around and sees all that Mollie has accomplished. What more could daughter have done, who had had the best of "schooling," and domestic economy and household hygiene, and high-class cookery all thrown in, than has been done here by my little Vanithee?

K. F. PURDON.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

BLASPHEMY LAWS.

THE publication of Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner's book entitled "Penalties upon Opinion," should be of interest to all readers of THE INQUIRER.* Mrs. Bonner presents in a concise form an epitome of all the recorded blasphemy prosecutions from the earliest times; and in view of the fact that there have recently been several prosecutions under the blasphemy laws and that an attempt is shortly to be made to have them repealed, the subject is one which may justly claim our attention.

In the first place, it must be clear to the readers of this book that, quite apart from the question of its expediency, legislation on a matter like religion is very difficult, and, indeed, well nigh impossible, because of the definitions which are placed at the portal of all Acts of Parliament, ostensibly with the view of smoothing the path of the would-be follower of its provisions, but often in effect barring his further progress. Definitions of religion are notoriously unsatisfactory. Like some bird of fairest plumage, a particularly happy one is found, only to be regarded by another ardent hunter not as a prize but as a bird of ill omen. Religion touches the infinite, and will not be imprisoned in finite words. It baffles accurate analysis, like love, which one might as well try to define. If this is true of religion, how much more is it true of Christianity. "Every splintered fraction of a sect" has its own interpretation, and yet most of the judgments delivered by learned justices, as recorded in Mrs. Bonner's book, were based upon the alleged fact that the Christian religion is the law of England! When it is added, and it surely will not be denied, that upon no subject is it more difficult for a man to speak impartially than upon religion, it is not surprising that such disgraceful verdicts were delivered.

Of course, there are still many people who think that religion, above all other subjects, should be shielded from attack; like the Hebrews' ark of the covenant, it must not be laid hands on, with whatever intent. It is necessary to remind these people that such an opinion is futile unless it expresses the feeling of the large majority, and it certainly does not. There are many men to whom religion is a matter too puerile to be concerned with; to them the political arena is a much more worthy field for their activities. To such men Carlyle, speaking of Parliament as 600 talking asses, and endeavouring to prove the existence of the devil to his friend Emerson by taking him to the House of Commons, might seem as much a blasphemer as Foote or Blatchford to a Christian, for blasphemy is a relative term, dependent for its sting solely on the feelings we happen to entertain towards a particular subject. No doubt to Buddhists and Mohammedans Christian missionaries are occasionally blasphemers; probably to many of my readers some Salvation Army orators are as odious as the most aggressive free-thinkers. The God of our conception is matched against the God of another's worship. We are often saying, like the man in Tennyson's poem of "Despair,"

If there be such a God, may the great God

Curse him and bring him to nought.

Jesus himself was accused of blasphemy, a fact which should deprive the word of much of its taint; and those who would destroy the temples of Dagon, must be prepared to endure the taunt that they are blasphemers against the Most High God. It is obvious, then, that if laws against blasphemy are to continue in operation, two, if not three, practically undefinable words, such as "God," "religion," and "Christianity," have to be defined. Where are the members of Parliament equipped for the task? Methinks the most drastic of Pride's purges would not put the House truly in order for that!

The blasphemer is often stigmatised as uttering libels against God; but it is forgotten that, logically, such an accusation is untenable. You cannot blaspheme against a person whose existence you deny, any more than Betsy Prig could be legally guilty of a libel against Mrs. Harris, the imaginary creation of Mrs. Gamp's brain! To charge a man with blasphemy, then, is to take it for granted that there is sin against the light when the existence of that light is not admitted by the alleged offender.

Coming to details, there is something very sinister in the fact that the majority of the victims of these prosecutions have been poverty-stricken not only in body but in mind. Whether or not justice has been purchased by the rich, it seems evident that occasionally it is the peculiar perquisite of the intellectual. Several of the utterances for which heavy sentences have been given are no more offensive than those of Mr. Bernard Shaw or Robert Blatchford, and there is certainly nothing more objectionable than Matthew Arnold's remark about the average person's idea of the Trinity being three Lord Shaftesburys. True, Arnold afterwards suppressed the passage, but legal proceedings were never so much as thought of. A chaste style and an ability to manufacture epigrams ought not to gain immunity from legal penalties. It is not very often these laws are put into operation, and we have ourselves heard Mr. G. W. Foote express himself about the Deity in terms quite analogous to those for which punishment has been inflicted, without any action being taken; but the fact remains that they have been and may be again used as instruments of religious oppression, especially against people who can ill afford to make a proper defence, and they should be once and for all repealed. There are, of course, prosecutions properly to be made in connection with some open-air orators, but the charge should be one of indecency, not of offence against religion.

* Penalties upon Opinion; or, some Records of the Laws of Heresy and Blasphemy. Compiled by Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner. Watts & Co. 6d. net.

We would, however, without soliciting legal aid, plead with those who have come under censure for vehement and flippant attacks on religion, for a more reverent spirit and a little more serious treatment of the problems of life. We are not kill-joys; we know the temptations of the humourist too much ourselves to be harsh, but we do deprecate sneering at people's cherished beliefs. We emphasise the adjective, for, needless to say, we need not trouble about ideas that are as dead as the Dodo; we need not treat seriously, for instance, the old Oriental theory that the world rested upon an elephant which was supported by a tortoise, and question what weight in foot-pounds the elephant would have to bear, and whether the tortoise would stand the strain! We cannot perhaps help smiling, but a sneer is a different thing, betokening a Pharisaical pride which will certainly not open a channel for the truth which it is desired to impart. We were present some eighteen months ago at a debate between Dr. Warschauer and Mr. G. W. Foote on the subject of Theism v. Atheism, and the most pitiable aspect of the affair was, not that some hundreds of men should manifest by their applause their disbelief in a Deity, but that among many of them there were signs of great joy at the denial; they appeared to boast that there was no touch of anything mystical in their being. Many of such men call themselves humanists, and we are sure that they have a real zeal for progress, and that some of the animus with which they regard the churches is due to their feeling that they are a barrier to, rather than a driving power in, the onward march of mankind; but they seem to forget that the men who fill these churches are as human as themselves, that they have the joys and sorrows common to humanity which religion quickens and assuages, however strange it may appear to such as have no yearning for such consolation. The authors of the Bible, whoever they may have been, it seems too often to be forgotten, were of the same human family; and when the sins of the patriarchs are being sternly censured, we must not forget that they had no part in the deification which orthodox Christianity would fain have given; they, too, were simply men who strove and occasionally succeeded and oft-trove failed. As Emerson so finely wrote:

Out from the heart of nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old;
The litanies of nature came,
Like the volcano's tongue of flame,
Up from the burning core below,
The canticles of love and woe.

Our emotions are one; our interpretations differ. We do not regard with anger a mother who adores a child which to us is neither gifted nor prepossessing; we may say respectfully that their creed is untrue, but we need not get angry and scornful because others find consolation where for us it can never be found. There is a fine passage in Mark Rutherford where, speaking of the great religions, he says:—"It is nothing less than a wicked waste of accumulated human strivings to sneer them out of existence. They will be found, every one of them, to have incarnated certain vital doctrines which it had cost centuries of toil and devotion properly to appreciate. Especially is this true of the Catholic faith, and if it were worth while it might be shown how it is nothing less than a divine casket of precious remedies." It is strange that while many rationalists have the greatest veneration for relics of primitive art and of man's animal ancestry, they seem to have nothing but contempt for the relics of old ideas. Surely they justify a little careful handling as products of the human intellect. We can repudiate Calvinism without doing violence to the merits of Calvin, as we can appreciate Milton without assenting to the scheme of salvation contained in "Paradise Lost." Contempt is a poor weapon in this religious warfare, and surely endeavours to kill superstition need not be made by the process of kicking. Let it be a duel of which neither party may be ashamed.

"We seek without," said Sir Thomas Browne, "the wonders that are within us; there is all Africa and her prodigies in us"; and George Eliot speaks of the "unmapped country" in the human heart. The rationalist is too ready to believe that he has trodden and found barren the path whereon his religious brother treads; it never seems to occur to him that maybe he has not yet arrived. Surely the contemplation of the mysteries of our own being must inspire a certain reverence towards the man who feels, with whatever crudeness of expression, that he is connected with some order which is infinite and divine.

W. KENT.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A SCHOOLMASTER'S LAY SERMONS.

Clifton School Addresses. By the late Sidney T. Irwin. With an Introduction by W. Warde Fowler. London: Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

THE lay-sermons in this volume are not only the best lay-sermons which we have come across for a long time, they are also a choice page out of the book of the wisdom of life, which it is granted to many men to enjoy but to singularly few to write. Mr. Irwin's is not a name to conjure with in the fashionable world of letters. He lived the uneventful life of an assistant master at Clifton College, almost unknown outside his school and a small circle of friends who were deeply attached to him. This book, like Mr. Bryce's essay on Edward Ernest Bowen, is a revelation of the vastness of the debt which England owes for some of its finest elements of character to its assistant masters, and it is worth remarking that two of the most remarkable of them, Bowen and Irwin, were Irishmen, while T. E. Brown was also a Celt. The real revelation of Irwin and of the essential quality of his life is contained in what he wrote, but we are none the less deeply grateful to Mr. Warde Fowler for the few pages of reminiscence, wise, discriminating and affectionate, which form the introduction to this volume.

We have called these seven addresses lay-sermons because we hardly know what other word to use of direct personal speech, which ranges in the loftiest spirit and yet with playful irony over the whole field of manners and morals. But they are not like ordinary sermons either in tone or substance, and certainly some of the subjects—"Why we learn Latin," "Why we learn Greek," "Conscious Ignorance," "Virgil"—do not suggest the pulpit. Perhaps the first quality in them which arrests our attention is their pleasant discursiveness. They are the product of a full mind, which has pondered deeply and read widely, and knows the secret of the apt quotation and the delicate allusion. Without being an intellectual hermit their author was sufficiently detached from literary fashions to cultivate lasting friendships, and his pages glow with his own quiet delight in stately English prose, in the generous humour of Goldsmith, and the inexhaustible humanity of the "Pilgrim's Progress." But all this was only the vehicle of his thought and of a few simple and ardent moral convictions. The parched ground of apparently difficult or unlikely subjects became a pool of living water at the touch of his magic wand, and most school-boys will agree that he must be a wizard indeed if he can teach us how "a grammatical conscience is acquired without resentment, and the four conjugations become so many links of natural piety." Thus we learn Latin for no pedantic reasons of professional scholarship, but because it keeps before us "a model of four things—of simplicity, brevity, dignity, and fine taste—qualities which with all our obvious advantages are every day becoming less cultivated, and less easy to attain." An essay on "Conscious Ignorance" brings the timely reminder that "really learned men are, as Bacon says, full of 'the dignity of their soul and vocation' but not of themselves," and an encouragement to us to cultivate the temper of "a modest and learned ignorance." And the delightful essay on Virgil—how Mr. Warde Fowler must have revelled in the passage on Virgil's birds—closes with an invitation to explore the treasures of the Domus Virgiliana. "It will unlock treasures of sympathy from friends and open a door of escape from enemies—those 'cares' which even the gay Sir Toby found were 'enemies to life.' Virgil himself tells you where he is taking you—

Linquentem terras et sidera voce sequentem.

But what will take you from the earth and lift you to the stars is not your own voice but another's—the voice of him for whom the Middle Ages found the only true name—the voice of Virgilius the Enchanter.”

In an appendix there is a collection of one hundred maxims drawn from the great literature of the world, which Irwin called “Ballast,” and was in the habit of giving to the boys in the sixth form. No one who lingers in this fragrant grove will deny that it is rich in medicinal virtue and in an unusual degree provocative of thought. Under the heading “A Life Ill-provided” there are the lines of Cowper :

Dipping buckets into empty wells
And growing old with drawing nothing up.

“The Great Man without the Great Mind” is described in the words of Seneca :

Notus nimis omnibus
Ignotus moritur sibi.

And here is “The Message of Learning” as John Selden has bequeathed it to us :—
“A man that strives to make himself a different thing from other men by much reading, gains this chiefest good, that in all fortunes he hath something to entertain and comfort himself withal.”

But we have only set the gate ajar into this pleasant place of entertainment and comfort. We hope that many of our readers will explore it for themselves.

CANON WILSON ON CHRISTIAN UNITY.

The Origin and Aim of the Acts of the Apostles. By the Rev. J. M. Wilson, D.D. London : Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

EXPOSITORY preaching, which mingles the studious pursuits of the scholar with the religious needs of ordinary men, is not much in vogue at the present time. Canon Wilson's new volume, which consists of six sermons preached in Worcester Cathedral, is a welcome proof that reverent critical study of the Bible can be used to enhance its spiritual appeal, and that in the hands of wise men it is still our best vehicle of religious teaching. He has an admirable and attractive subject. The story of the expansion of Christianity must always be one of the most extraordinary interest. It is a story of religious syncretism, of intellectual adventure, of spiritual victories and passionate heroism ; and for all these things the Book of the Acts of the Apostles is the cardinal document. Canon Wilson has published as an appendix to these helpful studies in the Acts a sermon preached before the University of Cambridge on “Christian Unity.” Its analysis of the forces which are making a more vital co-operation possible, the plain acceptance of the definition of Christ's Holy Catholic Church in the Bidding Prayer, “that is the whole body of Christian people dispersed throughout the world,” and the earnest plea that the Universities by “their comprehensive learning, their sound judgment, and their sincere piety,” and the influence of studies carried on in “an atmosphere of mutual respect for diversities of religious upbringing and sentiment,” should promote the things which make for peace—all this is of the highest importance at the present moment, and we hope that it will win the attention it deserves. “Occasional Conformity” is, in Canon Wilson's judgment, a historic principle too valuable to be lost sight of. “Surely it is possible for us all,” he says, “to make our Holy Communion a Sacrament of the one Catholic Church of which we are all members, and not the Sacrament of our own branch of it. It is the Lord's Supper, not our supper. There is nothing in the origin of this Sacrament, nothing in our liturgy, that forbids such intercommunion. This would efface schism, while it retains varied forms of organisation and worship ; for there is no schism among those who share in the Communion of the Body and Blood, the visible Body and the invisible Life, of Christ. Could this be wrong ? Can we ignore the voice of God Himself speaking to us in facts which tell us that Christ-likeness and graces and gifts of every kind are not unequally distributed among our divided communions ? Surely we are in the eyes of God except in name only, one Church.”

THE APPRENTICE.

English Apprenticeship and Child Labour. By Jocelyn Dunlop and R. D. Denman, M.P. London : T. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.

At a time when attempts are being made to revive apprenticeship a connected history of the system in its heyday and in its decline comes at an appropriate moment. Such a history Miss Dunlop has provided in a thesis for which she has been awarded a Doctorate of Science and the Hutchison Research Medal by the London School of Economics. Gradually adopted during the period from 1250 to 1450 the system had many vicissitudes until its collapse under the industrial revolution and the rise of capitalism. At its best it was, as Miss Dunlop says, “not merely a system of technical instruction, it was also a method of education . . . (it) gave little opportunity for the sweating master, great or small : and though there were individual cases of ill-treatment, the juvenile worker received a fair return for his labour, while the nation was not burdened with the human wastage of workshop and mill.” Perhaps the most striking feature of the system was the human relationship which public opinion required to subsist between master and apprentice—according to Defoe's Family Instructor as close as that between father and son. As even between parent and child difficulties have been known to arise, so it was between master and apprentice. The wardens of the Merchant Tailors “comytted Thomas Palmer to pryson for that he hath broke Henry Bourefelde his apprentice's hedd without any just cause,” and moreover made him pay the money “owing to a surgion for healing the ap'ntices heede of the said Henry.”

Sometimes violence was on the side of the apprentice. One master complained to the Gild Court that his ward “did threaten him in an unusuall manner, and often swore he would be his death, and would crush his head against the table, with many such like provoking expressions !”

Chapters XVII., XVIII., and the supplementary section (the last written in collaboration with Mr. R. D. Denman, M.P.) show how the modern problem of child labour has arisen, and recommend as remedies the raising of the school age, the creation of compulsory continuation classes, the further regulation of employment out of school hours, and the appointment of Juvenile Advisory Committees.

Though many will be inclined to question the possibility of a revival of the apprenticeship system which flourished amid and possibly because of other conditions, it is well to have this full and accurate study of the system. The bibliography, which is otherwise useful, is not free from slips, two proper names, for example, being misspelt on p. 363.

THE UNITY OF FAITH. Edited by Geoffrey Rhodes. London : Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co., Ltd. 3s. 6d. net.

THIS is a book which wins our admiration more for its intention than for its execution. It consists for the most part of seven essays on Judaism, the Catholic and Roman Church, the Anglican Church, the Free Churches, the Society of Friends, and Unitarianism ; but they are not constructed on any similarity of plan and the names of the writers are by no means all of equal weight. In the latter respect the smaller churches have been the more fortunate. Mr. Edward Grubb writes on the Society of Friends, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on Unitarianism, and Mr. C. G. Montefiore on Judaism. Mr. Montefiore's contribution is, however, only a reprint of one chapter from his recent book on “Liberal Judaism.” In a closing section, the editor recapitulates and sums up. He makes the rather doubtful claim that his book has escaped the limitations and the subjectivity of mere private opinion because in these pages “each church is her own witness in the person of an accredited representative.” The attempt to produce a picture of harmony by passing lightly over far-reaching and radical differences of historical tradition and spiritual temperament, strikes us as ineffective and, on the whole, as the reverse of helpful. Perhaps for this the vagueness of treatment in some of the essays is partly responsible. Mr. Tarrant, for instance, hardly deals at all with Unitarianism as a concrete movement with distinct historical affiliations of its own, and deeply rooted group-memories both in thought and worship. And yet, if the different churches are to be drawn together, it is not likely to be by any distillation of common elements of abstract teaching, but by a frank recognition of their distinct corporate existence—a distinctness which depends at least as much upon a separate historical consciousness as upon differences in theological belief. The real difficulty in the way of a coalition of the liberal forces which exist in nearly all the churches at the present time is not to be found on the intellectual side of religion. For large numbers of men intellectual differences are far less acute than they were formerly, and they are held with a tolerance which almost annuls any hindrance to spiritual sympathy. But we are still bound into separate groups by the forces of history and the inherited loyalties which they impose upon us. In our moments of proud independence we may not like to acknowledge it, but it is these subtle and persistent elements of ancestral habit and group-memory which hold us apart, and they have a quite incalculable power.

THE CATHEDRALS OF ENGLAND AND WALES. By Francis Bond. London: B. T. Batsford. 7s. 6d. net.

CATHEDRAL hunting is one of the most innocent of holiday occupations. For the amateur, some knowledge of the elements of architecture, a working acquaintance with the chief events of English history, and a reliable guide-book form the essential equipment. As for the last item in our list, there are many competitors in the field, but it would not be easy to find one at once so scholarly and so compact as Mr. Bond's very attractive volume. It is described as a fourth edition of "English Cathedrals, Illustrated," but the revision has been so extensive as almost to entitle it to the description of a new work. Most of the illustrations appear for the first time, and the ground plans, reproduced on a uniform scale, are a very welcome feature. For those who make some studious preparation before they start on a ramble, we may recommend the use of Mr. Bond's great book on English Gothic architecture as a commentary. It will take the enthusiast into many of the parish churches which cluster round our cathedrals—there is no country in the world which possesses such a wealth of beauty in its ancient parochial buildings; and in this way the mind will be set to work on the delightful task of tracing variations, and the influence of local schools on structure and design. Mr. Bond's book is almost entirely architectural, and necessarily so for considerations of space alone; but it is not the least attraction of architecture for the amateur that it is the lordly gateway by which he enters into the pleasure of the minor arts, sculpture, carving, glass painting, ivories, metal work, embroidery, which now with gorgeous colour and now with cunning device, enhanced the splendour of the mediæval shrine.

AN ANGLO-SAXON ABBOT: ÆLFRIC OF EYNHAM. By S. Harvey Gem, M.A. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 4s. net.

THIS short historical study is a curious mixture of pamphleteering and history written for edification. It is dedicated to "all readers who desire the promotion of Christian education, temperance reform, and general military training for home defence." The "home-defence" motive and the suggestion that we are in danger of invasion similar to that of the Danes in the days of Æthelred the Unready are not lost sight of, but if this rather ridiculous aspect of the book is brushed aside there remains a goodly kernel of narrative and translation, which even members of the Peace Society may read without undue irritation. The hero, Ælfric, who was born about 955 and died about 1025, was famous in his day as a writer of books and an enthusiastic promoter of education. The highest dignity to which he attained was that of abbot of the Benedictine monastery at Eynsham, for the suggestion that he was ever Archbishop of either Canterbury or York has nothing but an accidental identity of name in its favour. Mr. Gem gives a short sketch of the rise of monasticism, and emphasises the importance of the influence of the early Benedictine settlements upon Christian civilisation, but we do not think that the statement, "the Monks of the early ages were the true Salvation Army of their day and the monasteries were their barracks," is either accurate or illuminating. One interesting feature of Mr. Gem's book is the number of translations he has given from Ælfric's Homilies and other writings. In the last chapter he has translated into English for the first time "A Colloquy for exercising Boys in speaking Latin." Like most of these moral dialogues of the Middle Ages it has no dramatic qualities, but there is a touch of human nature when the "good boys and pleasant scholars" are exhorted to go out of the church, without playing the fool, into the cloister or the schoolroom.

A DAY WITH RALPH WALDO EMERSON. By Maurice Clare. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1s. net.

To those who have spent fruitful years mining in the quartz rifts of the treasures of wisdom of the sage of Concord, this effort to exploit a great man in order to satisfy the prevalent rage for impressionism may make a dubious appeal. But the effort is happily and artistically made. The subject itself, the get-up of the book, with its large type and five dainty symbolic coloured sketches by Gwynedd Hudson, combine to make a pleasing gift to Emerson lovers. In a brief sketch of less than fifty pages the attempt is made to set forth a typical day's existence of the great American, a June day in the year 1841, amplified by copious quotations. The idea is pretty, and has been attractively applied in the remaining members of the series to Thackeray, Dickens, Shelley, and others.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MR. A. C. FIFIELD:—Verses: Teresa Hooley. 1s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—The Gospel of Freedom: D. H. Major, M.A. 2s. 6d. net.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE CITY OF BELLS.

IN the far north region of the land of Fancy, there is situated in a valley surrounded by hills a little town which has been rightly named by the people who live there—the City of Bells. For if you stood in the large market-place in the middle of this city, and looked up at the hills all round you, you would see a perfect circle of bells outlined against the sky. Of course you want to know how these bells came there, and for what reason. No one really knows. There is a story told, though, by a wise old man, which the citizens believe to be true. It is this: The Queen of the Fairies, as she passed in her snow-white chariot over the valley one day heard, it is said, a loud tumult of strife and anger below. Reaching her Court she consulted her wise magicians as to what could be done to subdue the discord which prevailed among the people in the far north region of the land of Fancy. After much thought and meditation it was decided to place bells all round the hills to form a circle. These bells were to be made with magic power, so that they would be able to hold and keep the sounds that reached them. When it was the Queen's pleasure, she would touch them with her fairy wand, and they would begin to ring and send forth the vast volume of sound that was stored up in them. They would continue to ring until the Queen calmed them again with her fairy wand. Such was the story of the wise old man.

But the people had forgotten long ago about the supposed meaning of the bells, and their quarrellings and disturbances went on much the same as in the past. The proceedings, however, were becoming very serious, and it was feared that there would be a war among the inhabitants, so great was their hatred of each other.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

The people stood paralysed with fright! Men who were enemies looked into each other's faces with speechless terror as the booming became louder and louder. The sound was like the hatred and passion of a terrible monster coming to devour them!

Boom! Boom! Boom!

It was coming nearer! And with one accord the people turned and fled in haste to their homes, where they hid themselves trying to deafen their ears to the Thunder of Anger. It was no use! Thousands of wicked sprites pierced the walls with fiery arrows to let the sound through.

Day after day, night after night, the bells continued to ring. Something must be done! But how?

Then the people remembered the story of the wise old man, and with one repentant voice the whole city cried to the Fairy Queen that they would let Peace reign over them in the future if she would only stop the bells ringing.

Immediately the bells ceased to ring, and there was a great calm. With trembling limbs and aching heads the people crept forth from their houses once more, too stunned to quarrel, too fearful to be angry, lest the bells should start ringing again. Twenty years went by in moderate quietness. When a hasty word rose to the lips of the citizens the wind would whisper warningly of the dreadful ringing, and the hasty word would never be spoken. Mothers in their homes, when the little ones became tired, often felt irritable and would have dearly liked to give vent to their feelings in a good scolding, but they dared not because of the whispered warning of the wind. Children in their play, too, would think twice before they said unkind insulting things about their little playmates because of the story Father and Mother had told them.

Thus it happened one day, fifty years after the eventful ringing, that the people were gathered together in the market-place to erect a memorial to the Peace and Harmony which reigned among them. Suddenly on the ears of the assembly there was borne a soft, faint note of delicious music. Sweeter than the song of the nightingale, and purer than the song of the lark, it seemed to be soaring heavenwards on the wings of triumphant exultation, gathering volume and grandeur as it soared.

The hard toil-worn faces of the men softened, while the women wept quietly, and comforted, with newly-learned tenderness, the little ones clinging to their skirts. "It is worth working for," said one man in a hushed voice. "It cannot be true," whispered another, as the music rose on the breeze which swept round and round the circle of ringing bells.

Kind words, gentle words, tender forbearing words, all the words of love that had been spoken during the last fifty years were heard again in the lovely swelling melody! The people listened entranced, their faces alight with the beauty and wonder of it all. Surely this was not their own lives living again in song? Yes, it really was! This was the Chorus of Peace, the Anthem of Love!

But would the Fairy Queen charm the bells into silence? "It must not be," said the chief citizen; "we have won the bells: let us keep them ever ringing to remind us of the beauty of loving and the sacredness of peace."

So the people cried again to the Fairy Queen, and as they cried it was found that every man, woman and child held in his or her hand a shining wand. And the Queen answered and said, "Whoever disturbs the pure air with foul speech or harsh unloving words, or utterances of any kind which mar the harmony of the ringing bells, shall be drawn by the power of the wand he or she possesses up the hill to the bells, which, when touched by the wand, will no longer ring the song of love, but will change into tumultuous tones of discord and wailing. The power to keep Peace and Harmony, the Anthem of Love, ringing among you is now yours. Beware lest you forget and bring the curse upon yourselves."

* * * *

To this day if you put your ear to the gateway of Fancyland, and listen quietly for a little while, you will hear coming from the far north region faint echoes of the love-song which the people are singing there. And if you can hear that lovely haunting music, and love it as do the citizens in that little town, and then look in your own hand, you will see that you, too, have one of those shining wands of warning to remind you that there are bells on the hills of your life, the ringing of which you have power to control, and, although you cannot see them, they are still none the less real.

I read somewhere in a "grown-up's" book that our speech affects Nature in a very wonderful way. Now I don't expect you to understand how it does—I don't understand properly myself, but God put this story into my mind one night, so I wrote it down; and I think that it is meant to teach us a lesson which we very seldom have taught to us, and which we all need very much to learn. And, too, I think seriously that it does show us how our speech affects Nature in a way that we children can plainly understand.

G. M. S.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

LONDON BOYS ON HOLIDAY.

THERE lie before the writer some well-worn and thumb-marked copies of a daily newspaper, no longer to be obtained at the bookstalls. A short-lived journal it must have been, for the total issue covers a period of ten days only—July 27 to August 6 of this present summer. Published at Walnut Tree Farm, near Deal, in Kent, and known as the Camp Walnut, the enterprise appears to have been of purely local interest, dealing with the life of a small community—to wit, the members of the London Battalion, Boys' Own Brigade, encamped upon a small tract of pasture land not far from the sea. From various references in the Walnut it seems that this was not the first occasion on which this canvas village had stood on the same spot, with its conical white homes, its wooden huts for storage, and its fluttering flags above the whole, and that the recollections of those former camping times are memories of joy.

It appears that 76 "privates" and "non-coms.," including "staff-sergeants," shared the gladness of the camp this year, accompanying whom were the Commanding Officer (Mr. Ronald Bartram); one who is variously described as the "President," the "Quartermaster," "our Host," and "Mr. Ronald Jones"; eight Officers of companies; Mrs. J. C. Ballantyne, Mr. van Wijk, of Holland; Mr. Albrow, and the Cook. And adding the names of five gentlemen who visited the camp for longer or shorter periods (Chaplain, the Rev. F. Summers, Vice-Presidents, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, Mr. W. J. Clark and Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Captain Hall from Liverpool), we reach a total of 95 as the entire reading public of the Walnut newspaper, who, to quote from its pages, permitted their eyes

To gaze in rapturous surprise
Upon this scene of revelry
The encampment of the B.O.B.

The pages referred to are blotted as though with tears, and from this fact, coupled with references in the text, we gather that rain fell often and heavily upon the campers; but it did not succeed in damping their enthusiasm or pleasure—only constrained them to devise many and curious indoor occupations, resulting occasionally, as in the case of certain flute, bugle and piano practices, in strange and moving sounds. Nor do the seniors appear to have found the time hang heavy on their hands, as witness the following, from the "Lay of the Camp":—

Out spake the sporting Adjutant—

Fond of the cards was he—

"Who'll come and sit within my tent,

And play at Bridge with me?"

"The challenge we accept," replied

The Chaplains two with glee,

"And I," exclaimed the President,

"Will be your vis-à-vis!"

Poetry was the strong point of the Walnut, and many and stirring were the limericks published in its pages, full of local, apt and personal suggestiveness; a prize, indeed, was offered for the best effort in this direction, and was awarded to Sergt. Isted, of the 2nd Company, who also gained the honour for the best short story. To Private Newton, of the 1st, went the prize for the best drawing, and to Serg. Johnson, of the 1st, the award for bugle playing.

But the journal records, in addition, many fair-weather happenings, and it is very clear from its pages that glad occupations engrossed the campers each day from "Reveille" to "Lights Out." With parades for marching and for ambulance drill, with bathing parades that made the days true holidays, with the happy meals together in the large marquee; with long walks in the afternoons, or games of cricket and football in the surrounding fields; with the official inspection of the Battalion by the Officer of the Jewish Lads' Brigade (encamped, eleven hundred strong, in a neighbouring field); with "Sports Day" on Bank Holiday and special cricket matches on the smooth grass of the Winchester House Playing Field, the time must have glided by all too quickly. Walnut readers were keen on results, it appears, and we find full details of all the matches and competitions in its columns. The officers, with boastful pride, chuckle over their triumphant win when they met the staff-sergeants at the wicket; and small print in an obscure corner records that the match against the Jewish Lads' Brigade was lost by the B.O.B. The 4th Company made the highest total of marks in the sports competition, and easily won the prize; the tent competition (for the neatest and tidiest tent) was evidently a keen contest every day, and was won by the boys of the 2nd Company, with one of the tents of the 1st Company as a close second; and the "guard-mounting" prize went to the 1st Company.

Two Sundays appear to have been spent in camp, and two "drum-head" services held on each; and at the first of these (when the new "Boys' Own Book of Hymns and Songs" was first used), the Camp Chaplain (the Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A.) delivered an address, which quite evidently won its way home to the hearts of the congregation and will not soon be forgotten.

In the last issue of the magazine, a "lump in the throat" is very evident, and the halting swan-song, failing to rise to the usual poetic level, takes refuge in limerick once more, in a farewell ode of gratitude to the President-Quartermaster, ending—

And when on drill nights we're arrayed,
With unfrayed yellow braid, on parade,
We'll think often of you
And the good things you do
For us all in the Boys' Own Brigade.

But the sentiment was true; and we have it on reliable authority, apart from the Walnut, that it was no mere custom or formality that prompted the camp members, ere they bade farewell to Deal on Tuesday, August 6, to give three hearty and prolonged cheers for their host, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, and the 1912 camp.

YORKSHIRE MINISTERS' UNION.

PRESENTATION TO THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

A MEETING of the Yorkshire Ministers' Union was held at Mill Hill, Leeds, on Tuesday morning, August 13. The Rev. Charles Hargrove presided. Twelve ministers were present. Mr. Hargrove kindly presented the members with some theological books of his own, and from the Mill Hill Chapel library, for which he was warmly thanked. He then gave an address on his memories of his thirty-six years' ministry in Leeds. He was in a reminiscent mood, and his remarks revealed a happy blending of the grave and the gay—of pathos and humour. A brief summary would only give a faint idea of the impression which he made upon all who were privileged to hear him. The trials of a minister, he said, were great, but the rewards were great, and the office the highest a man could fulfil. Mr. and Mrs. Verity again kindly entertained the ministers at High Bank, Roundhay, and on the motion of Mr. Hargrove, seconded by Mr. Dale, the host and hostess were cordially thanked for their generous hospitality, and Mrs. Verity returned thanks. The Rev. W. L. Schroeder, on behalf of the ministers of Leeds and District, spoke in warm and appreciative terms of Mr. Hargrove, and of his support and defence of liberal religion in Yorkshire and beyond. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin spoke in a similar strain on behalf of the ministers of Sheffield and District. Both speakers referred to Mr. Hargrove's retirement from active duty as a personal loss to his brother ministers and to the causes of freedom and progress which he had served well and faithfully for so many years, and concluded by wishing him a long life of further usefulness and happiness. The Rev. W. H. Eastlake, one of the senior ministers, then read and presented to Mr. Hargrove an address in the form of a testimonial from his brother-ministers in Yorkshire. The address, in album form, handsomely bound in blue morocco, and beautifully inscribed, reads as follows:—

To the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A.,
from his brother-ministers in Yorkshire.

DEAR MR. HARGROVE,—We cannot allow you to leave us without expressing our deep sense of regret, and of the great loss we shall sustain by your departure.

We desire to assure you of our admiration of your character as a man, and as a minister of religion, and to record our sincere appreciation of your long, honourable, and faithful ministry in the city of Leeds.

We recognise your ability as a cultured exponent and forcible preacher of liberal religion, and thoroughly appreciate the intellectual and scholarly gifts with which you have enriched your message from pulpit and platform—at home and abroad—making it ever a powerful and effective influence for good among the people.

Your powers of heart and mind have been unselfishly devoted in many and various ways to the welfare of your fellow-citizens, and have earned their respect and gratitude.

Your tour round the world, and your special missionary efforts in Australia, caused a revival of religious thought and life among the liberal churches which you visited. The letters you sent home were of great interest, and are a pleasing record of your journey.

We remember with pleasure your able address of welcome and congratulation on behalf of the Unitarians of Leeds to Dr. Lang when he visited the city for the first time after his elevation to the See of York.

We recall with satisfaction how as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association you represented our churches at the Coronation of King George.

The Yorkshire Ministers' Union, whose formation was due to your initiative, has been the means of drawing us together from all parts of the county in helpful and friendly intercourse.

We shall remember you with gratitude for your counsel and help, and you will take with you our hearty goodwill and best wishes for a long life of further usefulness, health, and happiness.

May the blessing of God rest upon you and the members of your family.—We are and remain yours faithfully—

Here follow the signatures of the ministers.

Mr. Hargrove, who was deeply moved, made touching acknowledgment of the gift, which he said he would treasure as long as he lived, and hand on to his son, who would treasure it for the sake of his father's memory. Mr. Hargrove is fortunately remaining in Yorkshire, although he will be relieved of some of his more important and heavy duties.

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

We have received from the Portuguese Legation the following comment on the communication from the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, which we published last week:—

"The Portuguese Legation in London, referring to the notice that your esteemed journal inserted on the 10th inst. under this title, has the pleasure to notify you that all the arguments presented by the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society at the meeting which took place at the Westminster Palace Hotel on June 25, were there, and afterwards in the British Press, victoriously and absolutely refuted by the Representatives of the Centre Colonial of Lisbon, Señors Alberto Machado, Dr. José d'Almada, First Secretary of the Colonial Office in Lisbon, and Lieut.-Col. J. A. Wyllie, 38, Hope-terrace, Edinburgh, who are ready to give any elucidation they may be asked for on the subject.

"It would be flagrant injustice not to recognise that Portugal after the revolution of October 5, 1910, did more in favour of the natives of its Colonies than any other civilised country in the last 25 years, and for the tranquillity of the philanthropic spirit of the well-intentioned British public, the Portuguese Legation in London assures you that if the workers of the whole world, white or negroes, could only have one half of the liberty, treatment, and care which the negro workers enjoy in the Portuguese islands of S. Thomé and Príncipe, the whole of humanity would have attained a degree of happiness from which it unfortunately is still far away.

"The Portuguese Legation in London confesses its recognition to you in advance for the publication of this note in the same place where your notice on the subject appeared."

London, August 10, 1912.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bury: Bank-street Chapel.—Members and friends of the congregation learnt with deep sorrow of the serious indisposition of their Chapel Warden, Mr. Robert Kay, J.P., which has ended in the amputation of his right leg. His general health was quite good, but his foot, which had troubled him for a few weeks, became lifeless and a danger to himself. He bore the severe ordeal in a calm and philosophic spirit, without the least perturbation; and in spite of his advanced age of practically 77 years, and also a weak heart, he has come through his exceptional trial in a most successful and courageous manner. Mr. Kay has the deepest sympathy of all his friends, as well as their hearty congratulations on his successful recovery.

Glenarm.—The congregation of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church in Glenarm made a presentation to Miss Miskimmin, sister of the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, on the occasion of her recent marriage to Mr. Robert Leith, master of the National schools, Glenarm. Miss Miskimmin had for some years acted as honorary organist.

Hull.—The Unitarian Van Mission has had a busy and successful fortnight in Hull. The Rev. Lawrence Clare has been responsible for most of the speaking. During the first week he was assisted by the Rev. E. H. Reeman (Congregationalist), of Hull, and subsequently the Rev. F. Hall, of Blackburn, gave very effective help. The members of the Park-street Church threw themselves heartily into the work.

Ilkeston.—High-street Chapel reports a successful Sunday school anniversary, when the preacher was Miss Helen Phillips, who has been appointed recently to the joint pastorate of Christ Church, Nottingham, and Ilkeston.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: The late Mr. J. T. Southern.—An irreparable loss has befallen the Church of the Divine Unity through the death of Mr. J. T. Southern. Mr. Southern was returning from his holidays in the Lake District on Wednesday, July 31. He cycled from Patterdale a short distance to see whether the roads were in a fit condition for his nieces to accompany him later. On returning, he was overtaken by a motor car near the Glenridding Post Office, and unfortunately, while moving closer to the side of the road, his machine skidded and the motor passed over him. He lingered until the following Sunday, August 4. For over thirty years he acted as treasurer of Unity Church. The Church was his deepest interest, and he always showed as great a generosity towards it as he asked. He was well known among his friends for his interest in horticulture, and he had a garden with which few in the district could compare. One of the last things he did was to collect some rare plants. The funeral, which was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, was largely attended, most of the leading citizens being present. After the funeral a special meeting of the congregation was held, when a resolution of sympathy with Mr. Southern's family was passed. The resolution also recorded the sense of loss and high appreciation of the members of his long service. It was proposed by Sir J. Baxter Ellis, who, in a moving address, spoke of Mr. Southern's devotion to the Church and the many sacrifices he had made for it. It was seconded by Mr. G. G. Laidler, and supported by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle on behalf of the churches of the district. The chair was occupied by the minister. Deceased was sixty years of age, unmarried, and a member of the firm of Wm. Southern & Sons, timber merchants.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—The flower services were held on Sunday last. In the afternoon the annual united service of the High Pavement and Christ Church Sunday schools was held. The minister (Miss H. Phillips) conducted the services.

Oxford.—Dr. Estlin Carpenter has accepted the office of President of the Oxford Branch of the Free Church League for Woman Suffrage. This branch held its inaugural meetings in Manchester College.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A NONCONFORMIST INTERIOR.

The stately Meeting Houses of English Nonconformity are succumbing rapidly to the modern perverted taste for cheap gothic. The noblest forms of gothic belong essentially to Catholic ritual, and it may be doubted whether they can ever be made suitable for an austere Puritan worship. Be this as it may, many meeting-house interiors have a grave beauty and noble dignity of their own. Among them we may mention Friar's-street Chapel, Ipswich, built in 1700, a delightful photograph of which has reached us. Collectors of the antiquities of Nonconformity will be glad to possess it. We understand that copies can be obtained from Mrs. W. E. Watkins, The Cottage, Willoughby-road, Ipswich, price 1s., 6d. and 3d., postage extra.

THE LONDON SCHOOL OF ECONOMICS.

The School of Sociology and Social Economics, which has for nine years carried on the work of training those who wish to take part in the various forms of social and philanthropic effort, is about to be merged in the London School of Economics and Political Science, one of the schools of the University of London. The new course will begin at the commencement of October. Intending students should apply for particulars to the Secretary of the London School of Economics and Political Science, Clare-market, Kingsway, London, W.C. A committee to give advice as to the best methods of training has been appointed, constituted as follows:—Professor Hobhouse, Mr. C. S. Loch, Mr. Frank Morris, Miss Eleanor Powell, Mrs. Reeves, Mr. Lees Smith, Professor Urwick, Professor Sidney Webb, and the Director of the London School of Economics and Political Science.

OUR CHILDREN'S HEALTH.

The National Food Reform Association, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, has just published "Our Children's Health at Home and at School," a book for parents, teachers, and the medical profession. This volume, besides giving a full account of the proceedings at the recent Guildhall conference on Diet and Hygiene in Public Secondary and Private Schools, including papers by eminent school and medical authorities, contains a number of specimen dietaries from well-known public and private schools (boarding and day), with tuck and tuck-shop regulations, letters from parents and heads of schools, press references, &c. The book, which is artistically bound and printed and contains close upon 500 pages, is published by the association at 5s. net.

BRITAIN AND ESPERANTO.

According to the Daily Herald, the Esperanto Congress which is now being held at Cracow, Russia, is being attended by 50 British delegates, representing 130 branches in Great Britain and the Colonies. The Secretary of the British Esperanto Association states that the language is progressing commercially in a manner of which the public have no conception. "In Austria the State railways use it for all kinds of business, and it is spoken on all the International Sleeping Car Company's stock. In England the North-Eastern Railway has been the pioneer among railways to take Esperanto up, but a whole host of private firms use it for their business transactions. The Congress programme includes Catholic, Protestant and Jewish services in Esperanto, while all topics brought up at the various meetings will be spoken in the world-language. The municipality of Cracow has contributed £250 towards the expense, and the Ministry of Public Works and other public bodies are acknowledging it by contributions of financial support."

THE BLAKE SOCIETY.

The body of admirers of William Blake who constitute the Blake Society met for their first annual meeting this week at Wyldes, North-End, Hampstead, the farmhouse where the poet used to stay with his friend, John Linnell. Wyldes was well known to Morland and Constable, and Dickens also visited it. Mr. Raymond Unwin occupies this delightful old place, which has changed little in appearance, although it now overlooks the Garden Suburb instead of a stretch of open country. At the meeting, which took place on the 85th anniversary of Blake's death, papers were read by Dr. Greville Macdonald, Mr. Herbert Jenkins, Dr. H. J. Norman, Professor G. H. Leonard, and others. Mr. J. Foster Howe, who presided, said that Blake was only just beginning to come into his own. To some his poetry appealed, and to others his drawing, but what appealed most to him personally was the spiritual illumination of the man. His was one of the greatest and most illuminative minds they had ever had in this country.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF THE MIKADO.

A correspondent of the Manchester Guardian in Tokio gives an interesting account of the daily life of the late Mikado from the pen of a lady-in-waiting, published by the Tokio Nichi-Nichi Shimbun. The Emperor, who was so hedged about with etiquette, and regarded with such reverence as a divinity that the troops were not supposed to look upon his face when he was reviewing them, seems to have led the life of a recluse, giving a great deal of his time, like all modern Sovereigns, to affairs of State. He rose at six, and breakfasted at seven. At nine he was examined by one of the corps of Court physicians, who number sixteen. From ten until twelve, when he usually took lunch, he held receptions in the Throne-room, and from two o'clock until six dealt with the business of the nation. Supper came at seven, after which the evening would be spent in conversation, games, or the composition of poetry until nine, when the Court physicians were again in attendance. The Mikado, as is well known by this time, had a passion for poetry, and had been in the habit of composing since the age of eight. It is a remarkable fact that in spite of the retired life he led and the lack of exercise, the Emperor had never been very seriously ill until lately. He was a man of serious temperament who rarely laughed, and, among other things, a great collector of swords and clocks.

"MONTESSORI METHODS."

Miss Mary Dendy has sent to the Manchester Guardian the interesting information that the Montessori method of teaching children, about which so much has been said lately, has actually been employed in the special schools for the feeble-minded at Sandlebridge for three years. The method has been used by Dr. Fernald, of Waverley, Mass., for a much longer time, and his schemes have been somewhat elaborated at Sandlebridge, a very perfect set of models and form-boards having been made by the manual instructor. "We have not attempted to christen our method," says Miss Dendy, "but a description of it was printed in Dr. Lapage's book on feeble-minded children, together with a photograph of the models and form-boards used. I believe that the credit for this common-sense way of reaching children's perceptions is due to Dr. Fernald. He believes in the special education of the senses. We certainly find the training of smell, sight, touch, hearing, and taste a valuable addition to our lessons, and one which our children very much enjoy."

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had a rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]

A Bygone Village. Emma O. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.
Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill, [M.A.]
Training. Alma Attwell.
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:
THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.
of every description accurately typed.
1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,
EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

WESTBOROUGH UNITARIAN CHURCH,
SCARBOROUGH.

SALE OF WORK

for the extinction of the Church Debt.

Tuesday and Wednesday, September 3 & 4, 1912.

Subscriptions and Donations gratefully received by Miss AMY LAYCOCK, 20, Trinity-road, Scarborough.

IPSWICH UNITARIAN CHAPEL.

SALE OF WORK

In aid of the Restoration Debt, will be held held in grounds of

The Cottage, Willoughby-road, Ipswich,

on Wednesday, August 21.

Proceedings to be opened at 3 p.m. by R. PEARCE, Esq., M.P. Excellent photographs of the interior of this fine old Chapel can be obtained by application to the Hon. Secretary, Mrs. W. E. WATKINS, The Cottage, Willoughby-road, Ipswich, at 1s., 6d., and 3d. each. Postage extra.

Contributions to the Sale of Work will be gratefully received by the Secretary at the above address.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WAREHAM.—Rooms to Let in nice modern house; high situation, with a fine view.—Mrs. WOOD, The Gables, Worrett-road, Wareham. Recommended by Rev. H. S. and Mrs. Solly.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

PLUMS.—Perschore Egg Plums, 24 lbs. 6/6, 12 lbs. 3/9. Victorias, 24 lbs. 8/6, 12 lbs. 4/9. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c. Bundles of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable; wears for years. Scores of beautiful designs, fascinating shades.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale) JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 17, 1912.

. Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN, 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3661.
NEW SERIES, No. 765.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net.

MAN'S CHIEF END, and other Sermons.

By R. B. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of
ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Modern Handbooks of Religion

Crown 8vo. 2/- each net.

The Jewish Religion in the Time of Jesus. By Dr. G. HOLLMAN, of Halle.
Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 150 pp.

The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 176 pp.

Paul: A Study of his Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.
Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 200 pp.

The Apostolic Age. By Prof. E. VON DORSCHÜTZ, of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POSSON, M.A. 144 pp.

Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. Dr. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg. Translated by V. D. DAVIS, B.A. 160 pp.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.

NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.
BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

The Ejected Ministers. August 17.

Values of the Faith. By W. SCOTT PALMER.
(Four Articles.) July 20, 27, August 3, 10.

The Eugenics Congress and After. By Dr.
LIONEL TAYLER. August 3.

The Christian Minister. By Rev. JOSEPH
WOOD. August 3.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD
THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor
G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau.
By Professor FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand,
W.C. Post free 1½d.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT

St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees
House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy
access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House,
Food Reform Boarding Establishment,
Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

WESTBOROUGH UNITARIAN CHURCH, SCARBOROUGH.

SALE OF WORK

for the extinction of the Church Debt.

Tuesday and Wednesday, September 3 & 4, 1912.

Subscriptions and Donations gratefully received by Miss AMY LAYCOCK, 20, Trinity-road, Scarborough.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to THE MASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors,
Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade,
Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.
HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR
BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT,
M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss
LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated
Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey,
Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to
the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN-Y-BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions,
&c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected.
Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff.
Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic
and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation.
North German Head Mistresses. Highest
references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals,
T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, König-strasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs.
BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton,
Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale,"
Letchworth-road, Leicester.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, August 25.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. W. R. HOLLOWAY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS; and 7.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11, Rev. E. E. COLEMAN, M.A. No evening service.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. F. K. FREESTON. 11, "The Pious Memory of the Ejected Clergy"; 7, Lantern Service in Lindsey Hall, "The Heroes of St. Bartholomew's Day."
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. KING.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. E. CAPLETON.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Mr. W. HARRIS CROOK, of Manchester College, Oxford.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. R. TRAVERS HERFORD.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11, Mr. F. COLEBROOK. No evening service.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Mr. E. CAPLETON; 7, Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Mr. F. COTTIER.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W. No morning service until Sept. 15; 6.30, Mr. A. S. COOPER.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11, Mr. STEPHEN NOEL. No evening service during August.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Mr. W. G. CLARK.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. Dr. CHAS. GARNETT.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road. Closed during August.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15, Mr. ION PRITCHARD. No evening service.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. A. M. STABLES; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 15.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Rev. GEO. PEGLER, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. D. DELTA EVANS; and 7.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Mrs. BROADBICK.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Dr. S. M. CROTHERS.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street. Closed.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. C. NICKERSON, of U.S.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Churchgate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.

CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.

CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.

CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.

{ DEAN Row, 10.45, and
 STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS. Farewell Sermons.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.

EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.

GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Dr. EVANS DARBY.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE.

LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.

LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. DAWTERY.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS.

MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Mr. T. MAYNARD.

MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.

MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A. 250th Anniversary of the Ejection of the Two Thousand Ministers. Commemoration Sermons Morning and Evening.

NEW BRIGHTON and LISCAID, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. MORLEY MILLS.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Prof. P. MOORE.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.

PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. OTTWEIL BINNS.

SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. M. ROWE, B.A.

SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.

WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Mrs. HENRY RAWLINGS "Tilisuna," 4, Norton-road, Letchworth, Herts.

BIRTHS.

NOEL.—On August 18, to Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Noel, 42, Woodcote-road, Wanstead, Essex, a daughter.

SCOTT.—On August 19, at Thorn Lea, Bolton, the wife of Francis C. Scott, of a daughter.

DEATH.

HAWKINS.—On August 20, at 147, Fawn-brake-avenue, Herne-hill, William John Hawkins, in his 70th year.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.—Young Lady, aged 18, native of Luxemburg, and educated at the Lycée in that city, seeks situation in an English home or small school, from October next, where she would give lessons in French or German.—ETTINGER, 45, Highgate-hill, N.

CAN ANY LADY recommend a nice girl as Nurse or Nursery-Governess to five children? Ages two to eight years. No teaching required, as three eldest attend day school.—Address, Mrs. HOWARD MARTINEAU, Roughdown End, Boxmoor.

NURSERYMAN in Yorkshire wishes to place daughter, aged about 16, with a Unitarian family as Assistant Nurse. Fond of children. Healthy, willing to do any similar duties.—H. L., c/o INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	563	A Travelling Tinker	570	MEMORIAL NOTICE :—
ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, 1662	564	CORRESPONDENCE :—		Miss Octavia Hill	57
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Portuguese Slavery	570	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
Man and Metaphysic	566	Bed-Time Prayers for Children	571	Holidays in the London Playgrounds	57
Phebe and Phineas	567	FOR THE CHILDREN :—		NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	574
The New Spirit in Education	569	Among the Birds in August.—I.	571	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	575

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

“THE people who mob you would doubtless have mobbed the Apostles. Your patience and faith will prevail.” These words sent by John Bright to General Booth at the height of the public opposition to the methods of the Salvation Army have been amply verified in the noble life which came to its earthly close last Tuesday. We stand too close to General Booth and his achievements, and are swayed too much by the strong revulsion of public sympathy in his favour, to form any impartial estimate of his achievement. Whether his movement will continue on its world-wide career like that of the Franciscans and the Jesuits, or reveal reserves of strength like Methodism, when its first enthusiasm has passed away, it is impossible to say. It is the part which it has played in the religion of our own time which is clear, and the startling success achieved by one indomitable will which wins our gratitude and admiration.

THOUGH General Booth may be truly described as a man with a consuming love of souls, it was not his peculiarly spiritual gifts which impressed the public mind so much as his personal force and his far-reaching vision. The mysticism and the religious tenderness of the movement, without which it could never have taken root in the hearts of the people in the early days, came chiefly from Mrs. Booth, a woman of fine and penetrating gifts and deep simplicity of nature. The tributes to the beauty and power of her religious influence, which appeared at the time of her death in 1890, had a marked effect in changing the public attitude of hostile criticism into one of sympathy and respect. The growth of feeling in favour of the Salvation Army has been so great during the last twenty years that it has perhaps now most to fear from the danger zone of popular applause.

GENERAL BOOTH was supreme as an organiser. With restless energy and an apostolic faithfulness to his religious ideals he combined the business capacity for controlling vast enterprises. He was a shrewd judge of men and opportunities. It was not only the occupants of the penitent form and the lost children of the slums whom he could command to listen and obey. His singular power of impressing himself and getting his own way was seen again and again in the addresses, packed with figures and cogent reasoning, which he delivered to meetings of business men on behalf of his social schemes. On these occasions he seldom struck a false note, and he usually left the impression that he knew what he wanted, and the right methods to be followed, and that nothing could stop him. Against a personality like this the criticism of superior people dashed itself in vain. He threw it off like spray from the face of some giant cliff.

THERE has always been this element of personal authority in successful religious movements. In religion personality counts for far more than ideas. It is the crippling weakness of intellectualist movements that they perceive this so imperfectly, and try to substitute quiet appeals to reason for these high fervours of the spirit. With complete sincerity and directness, General Booth carried this principle of personal authority to extreme lengths. The system that he set up was a complete autocracy. The justification of it was that it worked, and did the thing which he set out to do. But the danger of autocracy of this kind is that it tends to degenerate into a mechanical despotism, when the personal influence of the founder is withdrawn and obedience is no longer inspired by reverence and affection. In this respect it may be doubted whether he has taken wise thought for the future. At the present moment, however, we do not wish to dwell on these misgivings. We desire only to accept with wonder and gratitude the gift of this strong, brave-hearted servant of Christ. More than any other, he has revealed to our age the meaning of the words, “The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.”

THE Act of Uniformity came into force on St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24, 1662. The celebration of the 250th anniversary of the ejection of the 2,000 Puritan clergy from the Church of England for refusal to comply with its requirements will serve a very useful purpose, if it revives our memory of a stirring chapter of history, and deepens our sense of spiritual obligation to these martyrs of conscience. The Act of Uniformity has had a decisive and far-reaching influence upon the religious life of England, but it is, we think, a mistake to speak of it as having in any sense created Nonconformity, or to indulge the dream that its repeal would destroy the Nonconformist protest. Independency, for instance, does not rest primarily upon any quarrel with the Established Church about doctrines or ceremonies. It draws its life from a mystical doctrine of the Church of Christ, which permits of no compromise with any system of regulation by the State. If some scheme of Comprehension had been adopted instead of the Act of Uniformity, the Church of England would undoubtedly have gained in breadth and tolerance, but some of the best elements in the Puritan movement would still have been left outside.

* * *

Nor is it correct to describe the exodus of the Nonconformist clergy as a protest on behalf of religious freedom. There were some among them, like Dr. William Bates, who had "a Catholic spirit, and . . . was not for further impositions than the nature of things required, nor for having the Church less free than Christ had left it." But there is no reason to believe that the majority of them would have objected to the most stringent regulations of doctrine and ceremonies, if it had been in accord with their own wishes, or would have stood out for the liberty of others to dissent. They had to learn the priceless lessons of religious freedom by the things which they suffered. They came out, martyrs to conscience, refusing to compromise in any way with the Episcopacy which they disliked, and believed to be contrary to the divine pattern of the Church; and through the hard discipline of martyrdom they entered into an inheritance of liberty of which, at first, they had not dreamed, and learned to refuse to impose on others conditions of religious communion which they abhorred for themselves. In some ways the Act of Uniformity has thus been a blessing in disguise, so true is it that all sufferings endured for the sake of Christ are stepping-stones to higher things.

* * *

THE service which was held in Southwark Cathedral on Wednesday in memory of Miss Octavia Hill drew together a large congregation of men and women who have been her partners in work or her disciples in spirit. It was not so much an occasion of mourning as of gratitude for noble tasks accomplished, and self-dedication to the unending service of human need. Canon Rawnsley, who gave the address, struck exactly the right note. He spoke specially of her deep respect for human character and her desire to help people to help themselves, of her self-effacement in her work, of the abounding affection which lay behind the strictness of her methods, of the radiant happiness of her life, in spite of sorrows and disappointments, and, finally, of the joy she took in dwelling on the pleasure which was being provided for generations yet unborn.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, 1662.

LAST week we gave part of RICHARD BAXTER's vivid narrative of the sufferings of the Ejected Ministers. His account of those who conformed on St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662, is hardly less interesting. It is as follows:—

"The Conformists were of three sorts. (1) Some of the old Ministers called Presbyterians formerly, that Conformed at Bartholomew Tide, or after, who had been in possession before the King came in. These were also of several sorts: some of them were very worthy able Men, who Conformed and Subscribed upon this Inducement, that the Bishop bid them (Do it in their own sence), and so they subscribed to the Parliament's words, and put their own sence upon them only by word of mouth, or in some by paper. Some of them read Mr. FULLWOOD's and STILEMAN's Books, and could not answer them, and therefore Conformed: for no Man ventured to put forth a full and satisfactory Answer to them for fear of ruine. (Though somewhat was written before by Mr. CROFTON, and after by Mr. CAWDRY and others.) Some were young raw Men that were never versed in such kind of Controversies: some were persuaded of the sinfulness of the Parliaments War, and thence gathered that the Covenant, being in order to it, was a Rebellious Covenant, and therefore not obligatory: And other things they thought were small. Some had Wives and Children and Poverty, which were great Temptations to them: And most that I knew, when once they inclined to Conformity, did avoid the Company of their Brethren, and never ask them what their reasons were against Conformity. (2) A second sort of Conformists were those called Latitudinarians, who were mostly Cambridge men, Platonists or Cartesians, and many of them Arminians with some additions, having more charitable Thoughts than others of the Salvation of Heathens and Infidels, and some of them holding the opinions of ORIGEN, about the Pre-existence of Souls, &c. These were ingenious Men and Scholars, and of Universal Principles, and free; abhorring at first the Imposition of these little things, but thinking them not great enough to stick at when Imposed. Of these, some (with Dr. MOORE, their Leader) lived privately in Colledges, and sought not any Preferment in the world: and others set themselves to rise. These two forementioned Parties were laudable Preachers, and were the honour of the Conformists, though not heartily theirs, and their profitable Preaching is used by God's Providence, to keep up the Public Interest of Religion, and refresh the discerning sort of Auditors. (3) The third sort of Conformists, was of those that were heartily such throughout. And these were also of three sorts; 1. Those that were zealous for the Diocesan Party and the Cause, and desirous to extirpate or destroy the Nonconformists: and these were supposed to be the high and swaying Party. 2. Those that were zealous for the Party and the Cause materially; but yet were more moderate (in their private wishes) to the Nonconformists, and did profess themselves that they could not Subscribe and Declare, if they did not put a more favourable sence on the words than that which the Nonconformists supposed to be the plain sence. 3. Those that were raw, or ignorant Readers, or unlearned Men, or sensual, scandalous Ones, who would be hot for anything by which they might rise or be maintained. This Composition made up the Body of the Conformists in this Land, and all this Difference there was among them."

Among the 2,000 Ejected Ministers there were men of varying character and disposition. Our chief source of information concerning them is EDMUND CALAMY's "Account of the Ministers, Lecturers, Masters and Fellows of Colleges and Schoolmasters who were ejected or subscribed after the Restoration in 1660, by, or before, the Act for Uniformity." The general impression conveyed by this book to even the cursory reader is that on the whole they were earnest, well-educated men, whose Nonconformity was "the fruit of close and deliberate thought" and must have left the Church of England sadly impoverished in learning and piety. We transcribe CALAMY's account of three of them, who, if they excelled in gifts, were typical in their faithfulness to conscience.

DR. WILLIAM BATES.

"From St. Dunstan's in the West, Dr. WILLIAM BATES. He was generally reputed one of the best Orators of the Age. Was well vers'd in the Politer Parts of Learning, which so season'd his conversation, as to render it highly entertaining to the more sensible Part of Mankind. His Apprehension was quick and clear; his Reasoning Faculty acute, prompt and expert; so as readily and aptly to produce, and urge closely, the stronger and more pregnant Arguments when he was to use them; and soon to discern the Strength of Arguments, if he was to Answer them. His Judgment penetrating and solid, stable and firm. His Wit never vain or light, but most facetious and pleasant, by the Ministry of a Fancy, both very vigorous and lively; and most obedient to his Reason; always remote both from Meanness and Enormity. His Memory was admirable, and never fail'd that anyone could observe, nor was im-pair'd to the Last at the Age of 74. His Language was always neat and fine, but unaffected; free from Starch, Lusciousness, or Intricacy. His method in all his Discourses might be exposed to the most critical Censurer, His Stile was inimitably Polite, and yet Easie, and his very Voice was Charming. His Conversation was much coveted by Persons of all Qualities, and that even when those of his Character were prosecuted with the utmost Rigours. The Lord Chancellour FINCH, and his Son the Right Honourable the Earl of NOTTINGHAM, had a Particular Respect for Him. The Late Arch-Bishop TILLOTSON highly valu'd him, and would often even after his Advancement to that High Station, converse Privately with him, with great Freedom and Openness. Our Late Blessed Queen often entertain'd Herself in her Closet with his Writings. And tho' one King made shew of a great Respect to him to serve his own Purposes, yet he liv'd to see the Nation Happy under another King, who knew how to value Men according to their real Worth; to whom he was highly acceptable. If Interest would have induc'd him to Conformity, he would not have wanted a Temptation; for there was none, no, not the highest Preferment in the Church, but he might have expected it, either if Merits were regarded, or thro' the Strength of his Interest. He might have been a Dean at King CHARLES' his Return, but refus'd. And might afterwards have had any Bishoprick in the Kingdom, would he have deserted his Cause and Principles. And yet he was not engag'd in the Interest of any Party as such: for He had a Catholick Spirit, and was for an entire Union of all visible Christians, upon moderate Principles and Practices. He was not for further Impositions than the Nature of Things requir'd; nor for having the Church less free than CHRIST had left it. And yet for Peace and Unison's sake, he would have yielded to any Thing but Sin. He was for free Communion of all visible Christians, of whatsoever Persuasion in Extra-Essential Matters if they pleas'd. He vigorously pursu'd the Design of Peace and Union, and an hearty Comprehension, as long as there was any Hope: But at last saw there was no Hope, till God should give a more suitable Spirit to all concern'd: For that when Principles on all Hands were so easily accomodable, and yet there was found in too many a remaining insuperable Reluctancy to the Thing itself, GOD must work the cure and not Man. But his moderation was great to the last; being exceedingly cherish'd by this Apprehension, which had been deeply inwrought into the Temper of his Mind; that the Things wherein only it could be possible for truly good men to differ, must be but Trifles, in comparison of the much greater Things, wherein it was impossible for them not to agree. His Piety was very conspicuous, and his private Conversation was so instructive, so quickening, in reference to what lay within the Confines of Religion and Godliness, that no Man of ordinary Capacity could hear his usual, and most familiar Discourses, but either with great Negligence, or great Advantage. In his common Discourse with his Friends, tho' he was far from excluding things of common Human Concernment, he yet still discover'd a temper of Mind most intent upon Divine Things. He did not look with a slight or careless Eye upon the Affairs of the Publick, but did consider and speak of them as a Man of Prospect and large Thought, with much Prudence and Temper, both as lying under the Conduct of Divine Providence, and as relating to the Interest of Religion. For the latter Part of his Life his Residence was at Hackney, where also he exercis'd his Ministry with great Success. And he there left this for a better Life, Anno 1699."

MR. HENRY NEWCOME.

"MR. HENRY NEWCOME, M.A., of St. Johns College in Cambridge. An hard Student, and of great Proficiency there, in Philosophy and Theology. He was first Rector of Gausworth in Cheshire, from whence, in 1656, he remov'd to Manchester, upon an unanimous Invitation to succeed MR. RICHARD HOLLINGWORTH. This Removal was not without its Difficulty, because he had at the same Time a like Invitation from the Town of Shrewsbury. He had not been here long before Sir GEORGE BOOTH rais'd the Country for CHARLES II., in which Affair MR. NEWCOME was heartily engag'd, and thence forward continu'd in Great Esteem and Friendship with that honourable Person. He remain'd in his publick Work till '62, joyning with MR. HEYRICK in Classical Meetings with the rest of the neighbouring Ministers, and dispensing all Ordinances in that Numerous Congregation; and afterwards preaching privately at Home and Abroad. And when he could not preach, he wrote many excellent Papers upon several practical Subjects, and dispers'd them among his Hearers, who contributed freely towards his Maintenance, and took great Care of him and his. The Oxford Act forc'd him to remove into Ellenbrook Chappelry; but he return'd as soon as he could with any Safety, to his Family and Flock. He preached privately till the year '72, and afterwards in a licens'd Place. And at length the People built him a large stately Chapel on the South side of the Town called Ackers, which he had not us'd long before it pleas'd GOD to remove him by Death: And he was himself one of the first that was bury'd in his New Chappel, September 20, 1695; Aged about Sixty-eight. His Funeral Sermon (in which his Character may be seen at large) was preach'd by MR. CHORLTON, who also succeeded him. He was a Person of good natural Parts, cultivated by an extraordinary Industry, which began very early, and continu'd all his Life: Witness the many Volumes left behind him, written with his own Hand. He was Master of a large Stock of solid Learning and Knowledge, always ready for Use, but never for Ostentation. His Parts and Learning were admirably set off by a singular Fitness for Friendship and Conyersation, in which he was amiable above many. His Temper was sincere, candid, and generous. His Discourse ingenious, innocent, facetious, and instructive. His Deportment grave, yet sweet and obliging. A most sincere and inartificial Humility at once hid, and adorn'd his other Excellencies. His moderation was known unto all Men, that ever knew or heard of him. He had both a large Charity, and a great Veneration for those that differ'd from him, if they were Men of Worth, and unblameable in their Lives. They can testify this, that knew what a fair and amicable Correspondence he maintain'd with many of the conforming Clergy, to several of whom this good Man's Name was perhaps as precious, and his Society as grateful, as if he had been one of their own Stamp. But his peculiar Excellency was in Preaching. His Sermons were practical, plain, and discursive, full of holy Zeal and Fervour, and an Eloquence without any Labour of his own, not imitable by the greatest Labour of another. He had a strange way of insinuating, and winding himself into his Hearers Bosoms, whose only regret hath been that the Sermon must soon be at an end. An eminent Divine once hearing him said, If I had this Man's Tongue, I could not Scape being proud of it."

MR. OLIVER HEYWOOD.

OLIVER HEYWOOD was born in 1629 and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1652 he became minister of Coley Chapel in the parish of Halifax, where he continued to preach until he was suspended in 1661 for not using the Book of Common Prayer, and finally silenced in 1662 by the Act of Uniformity. In November, 1662, he was publicly excommunicated in Halifax Parish Church, and thenceforward was a special object of official persecution. CALAMY gives the following account of his frequent conflicts with the officers of the law:—

"Going afterwards to Hear at Coley Chappel, the Church-Warden ordered him to leave the Place, because he was an Excommunicate Person; but he made bold to continue there till the Worship of GOD was over. In 1664, came out the Writ de Excommunicato Capiendo: But he was not taken. He kept himself private, and held on preaching to a few at his own House; now and then only, preaching in some publick Church, where there was a vacancy, with the leave of the Church-Wardens; in which Course, he met with no molestation. Upon the coming out of the Five Mile Act, he left his Family, and went into Lancashire, and Cheshire, and other Parts; and for some time kept mostly Abroad; returning Home but now and then; and that very privately. But when the Edge of the Act was a little worn off, he took more liberty; and preach'd often publicly in Idle Chappel, Bramhup Chappel, Bramly Chappel, Farnly Chappel, Morley Chappel, Pudzey Chappel, and Hunslet Chappel; and did much good. An. 1669; preaching Occasionally in a private House near Leeds, he was disturb'd and carry'd before the Mayor, who treated him like a Fury. He ask'd, Whether he had not been once in their Hands already? Mr. HEYWOOD answer'd he was never in Prison, but once for the King in Sir GEORGE BOOTH's Rising. He was at length carry'd away with Lanthorns to the Gaol call'd Capon Hall, and there put into a Room like a Swinestye, having nothing in it but heaps of Straw. But the next Day he was releas'd again, and treated by the Mayor with a great deal of Civility, upon the Interposition of some of the honest People of Leeds on his behalf. In July the same Year, he preach'd to his Old People in Coley Chappel, upon the absence of Mr. HOOLE, who was then Minister, and at the desire of many of the People. For this, a Warrant was issu'd out to distrain upon Ten Pounds worth of his Goods, and Warrants were also granted against others, as Hearers at a Conventicle. Mr. HEYWOOD's Goods were seiz'd, but could not be sold, for nobody would buy them, and they prov'd very troublesome to those that receiv'd them. But King CHARLES his Indulgence, soon after, gave him and his Brethren respite from such Severities. May 8, 1672, he had a Licence for preaching sent him without seeking for it. After which, he preach'd often at Alverthorp, near Wakefield, at Lasset Hall, at Sowerby, at Watley, and many other places, on the Week-days, as well as to those of his own People near Coley, that were still for adhering to him: on the Lord's Days, upon the calling in the Licences, he was oft disturb'd. And upon Aug. 15, 1680, he was again cited into the Consistory Court at York, together with his Wife, and several of his Neighbours, for not going to the Sacrament at the Parish Church at Halifax. For Contempt in not appearing, they were all Excommunicated; and the Excommunications were read in Halifax Church on Oct. 24 following; but keeping private, the Storm soon blew over. It was customary in those Parts, about this time, for Warrants to be issu'd out by the Justices at every Sessions, and sent to the Constables in their several Parishes and smaller districts, that they might take along with them Three or Four sufficient Townsmen, and search suspicious Places for Conventicles; and if they found any, to carry the Preacher and chief of the Hearers before the next Justice; by which, many had a Sword put into their Hands to disturb their quiet Neighbours. But the generality of the Officers gave notice of their coming beforehand, and so made no discoveries; by which means the Success of this Design was effectually prevented. Whereupon the Justices order'd certain Bailiffs and Catches to execute the Warrants. They were more forward and more successful. By their means Mr. HEYWOOD receiv'd much trouble: He was indicted for a riotous Assembly in his own House, at the Sessions at Wakefield; and had a fine of £50 impos'd upon him; for refusing the Payment of which, and for not finding Sureties for his good Behaviour (i.e., his forbearing further preaching) he was sent prisoner to York Castle; where he had both an expensive and troublesome Confinement; from which he was not freed without much difficulty. After a fatiguing troublesome Life, at length he Died, May 4, 1702, in great peace, and full assurance, and without any sensible Pain or Sickness, in the 73rd year of his Age."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

MAN AND METAPHYSIC.

BEFORE magic, before religion, before morality, came that which seemed the last—namely, metaphysic. The first child in time, and the child of the present day, were born with the speculative spirit—the innate passionate hunger for knowledge about origins and ultimates. Humanity has been so constituted that from the very beginning it proceeds to inquire, to ask questions, to seek clues, to pursue suggestions, to get behind things, to reach the bed-rock somewhere of some final foundation. Difficult, unanswerable, problems occur to the youngest as well as to the oldest of us every day. We find ourselves at birth in a universe of infinite paradox. Life presents itself as a problem to be solved as best we can. We commence our attempts at explanations by searching for causes or ends, antecedents and consequences. We establish relations definite or indefinite, necessary or hypothetical, between persons and things—though at first these two, in the early Animism which we inherit through the racial memory, these two appear hardly distinct and more or less one. What is the meaning of the world? How did it all arise? Why do we all suffer so much, even the innocent—and the weak perhaps more than the wicked? The small philosopher, not yet in his teens, must philosophise, or get to the bottom of things, if they possess any bottom.

Possessed with a devouring curiosity, an insatiable appetite for information, he originates experiments with callous unconcern alike on the animate and inanimate. It is not cruelty, but pure and simple thirst for knowledge, an elemental inquisitiveness at once his principle of progress and danger. His inexorable inquisitiveness consumes him, conditions his life, controls his actions. He destroys, he breaks heads and hearts, in the cheeriest and most irresponsible way. His pathway to the light is a road of ruin, fractures and fragments. He must realise, discover, individualise himself, although at a bitter price and the expense of his dearest relations and friends. Practically he hopes, however unconsciously, to find the First Cause, somehow and somewhere and sometime to knock against God. Already the eternal quest of man for the permanent amid the impermanent has begun. Is the Maker kind or cruel, reasonable or unreasonable, when pain and sorrow and sickness abound and superabound? "My friends, you must understand that the Almighty in His public and judicial capacity must be compelled to do many things, which in a personal and private capacity He would be ashamed to do." The intelligent boy with the love of excuses and explanations may meet the Scots minister here on common ground. Wishing to believe that God is a good Father and a God of Love, he is very jealous for His honour, and would almost lie at first to save appearances. Just as in primitive times, the wrong act of any individual involved the whole tribe and made that morally responsible, so the young philosopher feels at first to disparage the Creator is to disparage him and everyone else—an insult and injury to the race. If there be a God at all He cannot possibly behave in a petty, partial, revengeful or arbitrary way. Not for vengeance, but for vindication of His Divine government, does He order things.

Now here we have a rudimentary metaphysic, in the desire and endeavour to ascertain fixed rules in the cosmic flux or guiding principles. The religion of the rudest savage contains at the back of it a blind philosophy attempting to reduce chaos to harmony and darkness to light. The ultimate rationality of things was ever an invincible belief of man. To confusion exists a key, above the wildest licence rules a law, behind the veil of competing and contradictory phenomena, resides a strong and stable reality which in the end holds the reins and disposes aright. Caprice does not reign. Evil, the disturbing and intrusive factor, may be confronted and will be overcome in the end. Things are not always or entirely at sixes and sevens. Whether we decide to settle our difficulties by the Chemistry of the Proteids or some mechanical system, or by what Drews calls a "Semitised Theism," or by the Blessed Trinity, we must rationalise the universe and give it unity and a real content. Schelling, according to S. T. Coleridge's account of the former's self-differentiated Absolute, had his explanation, and S. T. Coleridge his own equally absurd, with his Paternal Ipseity and his Filial Alterity. The trained metaphysician employs his particular method, and the man in the street his method. But both philosophise, inductively or deductively, logically or illogically. In the markets and open spaces of Byzantium, or in shady recesses, the common people or workmen were not seldom accustomed of old to discuss difficult theological questions about the Trinity or the Second Person. And, though the labourer or mechanic of to-day does not dispute about such points, he has his own class of problems to which he applies a rough and ready metaphysic. He digs below the surface and the cant or catchwords or party-cries of the period, and endeavours to touch bottom. He wants to systematise in his rude, crude way, and escape from the poisonous atmosphere of falsehood and intrigue and mystification. He may not be acquainted with Huxley's Epiphenomenalism or By-Product, or Herbert Spencer's Unknowable, but still he contrives to frame a working theory, and if it does not cover all the facts of his case he proceeds to find another. His philosophy might not pass the academic judgment of the schools, but it suits his needs and answers his purposes. He does not worry himself about the irremissibility of post-baptismal sin, or even try to believe doctrines incapable of proof because they are alleged to be good for him. He only demands more light, and endeavours to reduce the seeming disharmony to something like law. He possesses a keen eye for points, whether for or against him, and gets a workman-like grip of great principles immediately. Quick to detect a non-sequitur in a party speech, he carries a strenuous logic with him into his labouring life and the relations between the employer and the employed. Show him good cause for a certain measure, and he will embrace it. But as soon as he perceives a particular clause or remedy so-called goes without the least justification of right or reason, offending both morality and common sense, his metaphysic comes into play, he probes and probes through the crust of misrepresentation till at last he sets his foot firmly down on some ultimate fact.

We want some standing ground from which to jump off. The mind, considered psychologically, appears to start on its earliest course with a metaphysical mould or framework, or with the dower of certain metaphysical assumptions. It has been often said and said truly, that we bring to all our studies, whether philosophical or scientific, particular preconceptions which inevitably bias all our inquiries. Does not this confirm our statement? Ritschl began by denying metaphysic, but ended by building upon it as a foundation. It may even be alleged that he made too much of it and too little of morality. At least he affords a conspicuous example, witnessing to the triumph of ultimate principles. The persons, Pragmatists and others, who object to the "Infinite" and the "Absolute," and minimise God thereby, make their limited experiences the measure of Final Reality. Raw consciousness and its testimony must be held not as merely subjective, but trans-subjective, or open to Divine or elemental impressions from the super-consciousness. Thought, in the savage and the child alike, falls into the forms that speculation requires. The spirit at once proceeds to try its wings. These grand forms, nevertheless, may be and usually are associated with the wildest crudities and absurdities, because logic (a later growth) has not yet been able to define and restrain, and quantify all its predicates. We do not mean to allege that the infant at the breast babbles metaphysic, as some nurses suppose it babbles Hebrew. But the child of tender age finds himself obliged to think his way along, and feels it (if groping in the dark, timidly and tentatively) by a kind of simple philosophy. Increasing knowledge only proceeds along the metaphysical lines mapped out by the baby's inarticulate speech. Those who detest the name, such as business men and men of affairs, cannot except themselves here, and cultivate the thing. The more practical they are, the more metaphysical. They are unable to get away from their nature, or to outleap their shadow. The successful merchant is the man who looks farthest and deepest into trade, and takes the farthest forecast. Nothing to him appears a trifle, and a straw may tell him something of the main stream as well as the commercial bearings. He penetrates below the surface, he throws his thoughts ahead, weighing the probabilities of this and of that conjecture, and really appeals, if unawares, to the philosophy or final principles of exchange or demand and supply. He may be entirely ignorant of the academic political economy, but he must construct one for himself. That is to say, when he speculates, he speculates not merely in goods but in commodities of thought, or in the known and proved metaphysic of his life and business. And all the time he may be denouncing philosophers as the most impractical of men, when they positively show themselves to be the most practical and merely trust the natural and irresistible trend of the human mind—which insists on looking before it leaps. And what shall we call this but metaphysic? It means a direct adaptation, or a spiritual response to a spiritual world. Confronted and impinged upon at all points by a transcendental universe, the mind reacts in the same manner. Deep calls unto deep, height to height, metaphysic to metaphysic. There exists no escape from this appeal—action and reaction.

"And thought leaps out to wed with thought, Ere thought can wed itself with speech."

F. W. ORDE WARD.

PEBE AND PHINEAS.

MANCHESTER in the days of that "Sacred Majesty" Charles II. was a very different place from the famous world-city of to-day. Its main thoroughfare, Market-Stead-lane, was a narrow street of quaint black and white houses. The stocks and the whipping-post stood in the market-place. In what is now the fashionable shopping district there were cornfields in which, once a year, a great fair was held. The moated mansion of the ancient family of the Radcliffes of the Pool was nearly opposite the site of the present Exchange. The only public place of worship in the town was the Collegiate Church, and every form of religion but Anglicanism was prohibited by law. Yet there were Nonconformists who defied the danger of fine and imprisonment. Some of the best spirits of the Church of England had been driven forth from its Communion by the Act of Uniformity of 1662, and were harassed by the Five Mile Act and similar exhibitions of the evil temper of the authorities in Church and State.

Amongst all the sects the stoutest and extremest were the Society of Friends. These followers of George Fox dissented from the most cherished conventions, social and religious, of the Established Church. When they met the Lord of the Manor of Manchester they would not uncover to him, as "hat-worship" was an abomination in their eyes. If a Quaker had to speak to the Warden of the Collegiate Church he used "thee" and "thou" as freely as if he were speaking to the bellman of the town. He sometimes called the Anglican Church building a "Mass-house," and regarded the Anglican ministers as "hiring priests." When the magistrate wanted the Friend to take the oath as a witness or to swear allegiance to the "Sacred Majesty" of Charles II. he refused. He would not pay tithes. He would not be married at the "steeple-house," nor would he let his children be "baptized" there. He suffered the spoiling of his goods with resignation and imprisonment with a cheerful mind. And withal he prospered. He was steadfast, honest, punctual, and no man was deceived as to the quality of his goods. However much his "orthodox" neighbours might dislike his religious views, there was no heresy in the wares sold over his counter.

Thus it came about that the shop of John Abraham, a "valuable Friend," was thronged with customers on a certain day in 1669, when there came into it a pretty little girl of nine with some cherries in her apron. Phineas Pemberton, a determined young man of twenty, was at the moment speaking to a fellow-apprentice. Phebe Harrison said to her mother, "I have a mind to give one of these young men some cherries." "Then give to both," was the wise advice of the matron. But the child had a wilful fancy and replied, "No, I will give but to one." She made her way through the group of customers, and before Phineas was well aware, put some cherries into his hand. The young man was naturally surprised by the action of the unknown child, but asked her name and "retaliated her kindness" with a paper of brown candy.

Such was the first meeting of Phebe Harrison and Phineas Pemberton.

Phineas Pemberton was young, but he had a strength and firmness of character beyond his age. He was born in that year of trouble 1649-50, and before his apprenticeship was ended had occasion to show of what metal he was made. His master, John Abraham, was a Friend, and Phineas had deeply imbibed the spirit of George Fox. John Abraham, before going to Yorkshire, was to attend a Meeting at Blackley, at the house of Edward Dawson. He went early, and told Phineas to follow and bring with him a coat he needed for the longer journey. As Phineas went on his way he was stopped by the "constables, overseers and such like" whose duty it was to make the people of Manchester go to the parish church whether they wanted or not. They demanded to know where he was going, and received only for reply, "Thither as I was going I do intend to go." They hindered his farther progress, but said he might return home if he would promise to keep in all day. "I will make no such promise," was the unflinching reply of Phineas. Upon which they took him prisoner and told him that after the church service was over they must take him before the Justices of the Peace. But when these officers of law and order had finished at what the Quaker youth styled "the Mass-house" they intimated their willingness to let him go his way for a payment of three shillings.

"I have none to give on that account," was the reply.

"If you will borrow one shilling of your mistress we will get you off if we can."

"I have none to give nor will I borrow; nor are you likely to have any of me."

A kindly bystander proffered to lay down a shilling for him.

"I shall not take thee as my friend nor restore anything again if thee lays down anything for me," said Phineas.

Seeing him in this spirit the constables said they would not take him before the magistrates then but would send for him the next day. Thus liberated, Phineas proceeded to the Meeting at Blackley. But the next day, when the constables called, Phineas was in Cheshire on his master's business. On the Tuesday they found him at home and took him before a certain "Justice" Haworth, a Justice of the Peace. Phineas came into this august presence with his hat on. The constable was ordered to take it off his head.

"Why may I not keep on my hat as well as my shoes?" asked Phineas, but to his question there came no reply, so he took the hat from the table and put it on his head again.

"Whither were you going on the Sabbath day?" Haworth next asked.

"My master was some miles out of town, and was to go forward on his journey the next day following, and I was ordered to take his coat after him."

Then the wily justices wanted to know where John Abraham was gone, but Phineas refused to say.

"I will make thee."

"Thou canst not compel me to reveal my master's secrets."

"Were you at any church?"

"I was."

"What did you do there?"

"To worship God."

"It is enough; he shall either pay his five shillings or go to jail."

"Hard sentence," said Phineas, "that I must go to jail for worshipping God."

"Who was with you?" asked Haworth.

"I refuse to tell," was the young Quaker's reply.

"If you will come to the parish church I will pass this by for this time," then said the magistrate.

"I shall do as I have done."

The magistrate then produced a Bible and required Phineas to be sworn and to give the name of those who were at the Conventicle.

"We were at no Conventicle," returned Phineas, "we were there truly and really to worship God and not under any colour or pretence. I will not swear at all."

"Constable, take notice he refuses to swear for the King."

They locked Phineas up for half an hour and then the constable came and said he would be let out for two or three days, but gave him a last warning in the ominous words:

"This is the second offence, and if you offend again you will be hanged."

Let us hope that the magistrate upon whom the law had placed the odious task of suppressing Nonconformity did not intend to proceed to extremities. The steadfastness of Phineas was his safeguard.

Phineas did not see the damsel of the cherries for four years. Once she came to John Abraham's shop door, but from shyness or some other motive did not come in.

In 1674, at the age of 24, Phineas went to Bolton and opened a shop on his own account, and there he again saw Phebe, who then appeared lovely in his eyes. Perhaps the vision of the child with the cherries had remained with him. Who shall discover the affinities of love? For a time nothing was said as to an engagement, for she was still a child. Phebe was of a delicate constitution, and was sometimes away from home and under medical treatment. She even made a journey to London, a great undertaking in the seventeenth century. The affections of Phebe and Phineas were now fully declared. The parents approved, and in Phebe's absences they had the consolation of corresponding with each other. Here is a fragment from one of Phineas's love-letters:—

"In the renewings of living love thou art very dear unto me; and by the cords of the same am I drawn very near unto thee, so that thou art become exceedingly estimable unto me. I have this day received the tender salutation of thy love, which is the third time I have heard from thee since thou went; whereby I do understand that thou art well every way, of which I am very glad not only in hearing thereof, which is very pleasant and much refreshment, but by an inward sense that I have of thy growth and prosperity in the Truth which is more than all."

The course of true love ran smoothly, and Phebe and Phineas were married November 1, 1676, at the house of John Haydock, in Coppull, near Standish. The bride was only 16; the bridegroom 27. Early marriages were commoner then than now. Their first child was a girl, who died at the age of four—a lovely spirit in too frail a tenement of clay.

Phebe's father was James Harrison, of Bolton. On November 9, 1679, he was preaching in his own house when the constable came "and pluckt him away." He was fined, and his goods to the value of £10 19s. were seized in satisfaction. Phineas and Phebe were both at this Meeting, and their fines resulted in the seizure of goods to the value of £4 15s. 4d.

In order to secure the conviction there was a meeting of justices, informers, and witnesses, whose eating and drinking on that particular afternoon cost fifty shillings. One of the under-bailiffs was so drunk that he fell down in the street and died shortly after.

In the summer of 1682, about a week after the coming of William Penn in Pennsylvania, a number of Quakers landed at Choptank, in Maryland, and amongst these pioneers was Ralph Pemberton, of Radcliffe Bridge, Lancashire, a man of 72, his son Phineas, and his daughter-in-law Phebe and their two small children. The site of Philadelphia was still a wilderness of wood and water. Phineas purchased land on the Delaware, near the present town of Bristol, but sixteen years later he removed to the place which received the name of Pemberton Farm. A son was born to him in 1684. Phineas was clerk to the Yearly Meeting of Pennsylvania, and in 1697 was Speaker of the Assembly. Perhaps the rough life and hardships inevitable to the settlers in a strange land may have undermined his constitution; he did not reach old age, but died on New Year's Day, 1702, aged 52 years. And the well-beloved Phebe predeceased him. Her father, her husband, her father-in-law, her son, and her three grandsons were all active and useful members and ministers of the Society of Friends.

In his last years the thoughts of Phineas Pemberton turned back to the days of his youth, and he wrote an account of his life, of the little damsel's gift of cherries, of the persecutions to which the Quakers were subjected, and of the winning of his young bride and the happiness of their married union. In that manuscript to show their "innocency and love" he transcribed some of the letters that passed between them before marriage. Here is Phebe's first message to her future husband:—

Chester, 19th of Third Month, 1675.

My dear, well-beloved friend Phineas Pemberton, whom I most dearly salute and embrace in the arms of dear love—Even that love which is undefiled and without end do I salute thee, my dearly beloved, who art as near to me as my life, and as pleasant unto me as sweet-smelling odours. My dear friend, by this thou may know that I am pretty well recovered, blessed be the Lord for it. I was very glad to hear from thee, dear Phineas, I have little more at present, but that I am thy very loving Friend

PHEBE HARRISON.

A pleasant but also a pathetic picture is that of Phineas Pemberton, old before his time—from useful labour and honest hardship—turning over the faded leaves of those letters written long ago by the maiden of his choice—the true wife who had been his helpmeet in many difficulties and trials. He looked back to the past and forward to the future with equal peace and constancy. For Love is the Light of Earth and of Heaven, the Morning Star of Time and the Sun of the hoped-for Eternity.

W. E. A. Axon.

THE NEW SPIRIT IN EDUCATION.

THERE is an idea abroad that much of the money spent on education in this country is wasted. The case of every illiterate urchin who figures in the police court reports is eagerly seized upon to support this view, and the taxpayer shrugs his shoulders in confession that he knows things are bad, but that he is powerless to effect an improvement. When an attempt is made to form an opinion on the subject by consulting those who have an inside knowledge of the people's schools, there is little unanimity in the testimony. The truth is, that the struggle between the old and the new is reaching an acute stage in education, as in other departments of our national life. At such a time, the pessimists are generally to be found in two opposing camps. There are the idealists, who condemn the prevailing system root and branch, and the upholders of tradition, who cast longing glances towards a past which is rapidly disappearing. In the camp of the idealists are to be found men like Mr. Holmes and Sir John Gorst, the pioneers of the new order. Their complaint is that the changes which are being inaugurated do not meet the needs of the case. They can only discern the dawn where others acclaim the full blaze of day. Opposed to these are to be found a vast crowd whose outlook has been restricted to the narrow avenues, hedged and circumscribed, in which they have been permitted to walk. They have become so accustomed to this limited vision, that they view with alarm the attempts that are being made to allure them into an unknown country. In the days of the Revised Code, the ground to be covered was mapped out with an exactitude that left no room for uncertainty. The ukase "Do this" was in most cases obeyed with almost slave-like submission. Indeed, it was not safe to question the suitability of the syllabus which had been laid down, as many a teacher discovered when he dared to suggest that "my lords" were not always infallible. The fiat had gone forth, and the business of the teacher was to mould the human minds upon which he worked according to the regulation pattern. The period of payment by results has gone, but the teachers who have survived are still haunted by the hideous nightmare, and are in many cases afraid to avail themselves of the comparative freedom now granted to them. They are far too ready to interpret advice as a command, and to subordinate their own opinions to those of their numerous guides, who too often leave out of account the special circumstances in which every teacher is placed.

Any attempt to outline the new movement in education would be incomplete which omitted to mention the increasing importance attached to physical culture. A single incident will serve to show the strong tendency in this direction. At a recent conference of London teachers, a subject which occupied an important place was "Deep breathing and chest expansion." The system of medical inspection by which, in the course of a few years, a complete record of the physical condition of every child who passes through our national schools will be available, is not the least revolutionary step in this age of innovation. The new methods demand, however, a change in the mental outlook of the child which is no less radical. The so-called education, the main object of which is the mechanical acquisition of unrelated facts, is fast becoming discredited, although it still survives in some quarters. In its place there is an endeavour to enable the child to discover the relation in which he stands to the world into which he has been born. His education is no longer conceived as a thing apart from his everyday life. The success of the teacher is to be measured, if, indeed, such a thing can be measured, rather by the habit of mind which he has fostered than by the amount of information he has imparted. In short, the main function of the teacher is held to be, to direct the pupil on his path of discovery, rather than to lead him over the beaten track of tradition. Herein the new spirit is at least as old as Rousseau, as the readers of "Emile" will remember. But, whereas Rousseau confessedly sketched an ideal education for a specially favoured pupil, the aim of our present day reformers is to reduce the ideal to practice in classes of at least forty children, drawn from the homes of clerks and labourers, well paid artisans, and ne'er-do-wells. Truly a task to be undertaken in no light-hearted manner.

It is hardly necessary to point out that such an ideal demands of the teacher a mental equipment far beyond that which was deemed sufficient under the old régime. The teacher, whose main qualifications consist in his ability to reproduce a miscellaneous mass of useful knowledge which he has taken considerable pains to acquire, naturally finds himself somewhat bewildered by the new demands made upon him. Such a parade of learning, however extensive in its scope, is no longer regarded as the chief end of education, or even as the means to an end. Indeed, it has been suggested that no fact should be presented to the child unless its significance can be made clear. At first sight the proposition seems reasonable, but a little consideration will show the impossibility of a mere mortal living up to such a standard. Which of us is capable of explaining the full significance of the French Revolution, or even of the Civil Wars in our own country? In cases such as these, as, indeed, in most of our strivings after truth, we have to be content with approximations. The principle is, however, on the whole, a sound one, and should be ever borne in mind by all who are engaged in educational work. It is certainly one of the root-ideas of the new movement.

The apostles of the new order are not without their shibboleths. It is impossible to travel far on the road with them without being reminded of the importance which they attach to "correlation in studies." In this respect they agree with Emerson that Nothing is fair or good alone.

The partitions which were formerly supposed to separate one subject from another are being broken down, nay, their existence is being stoutly denied. The particular compartment in which the teacher is engaged may be labelled history, but there are many doors which must be opened before the inner meaning of history can be laid bare. Problems of race, climate, ethics, religion, social and political economy, must be encountered. Art and literature assist in creating the historical sense which is indispensable. It is perhaps immaterial from which side the subject is approached; it is soon found to be all-embracing, and full of vital human interest. The object, then, of the new education is to approximate towards a unity of aim in educational methods, to unfold to the child as much as he is able to grasp of the significance and inter-dependence of the many aspects of life which are presented to him. Occasionally the passion for the co-ordination of studies assumes a somewhat grotesque form. An instance occurs in a recent report on the teaching of arithmetic, in which the suggestion is made that English composition might be linked on to mathematics, by requiring the child to explain in good English the processes by which he has arrived at his results. This example shows the danger of over-emphasis. Such teaching is apt to degenerate into a vague, pointless dissertation which can only encourage the scrappiness which is so characteristic of the information of the average man. The moral of it is, that it is possible to deal with our principles in too tender a fashion. Even when principles are concerned, we need to remember that "nothing is fair or good alone." We must be master of our principles, or they will master us.

And the modernists recognise this, for side by side with their advocacy of co-ordination is to be found a strong plea for specialisation. Truth is one, but it is many-sided, and every side is to be studied exhaustively. The specialists already at work in certain elementary schools of the best type are engaged in teaching such subjects as science, drawing, and domestic economy, but such teachers are relatively few in number. There is, however, a strong feeling among those who champion the forward movement in favour of extending the system so as to make every member of the school staff a specialist in one of the "ordinary" subjects. The system has its dangers, but we are not at present concerned with them, we only chronicle the fact. As we have already intimated, the function of the modern teacher is rather to direct than to lecture. Mere book knowledge is not sufficient. The teacher's ipse dixit must be used more sparingly than heretofore. Outdoor work is to be indulged in as far as possible. Observation and experiment are to be the chief guides. It is seriously contended that a rain gauge and a weather vane should be supplied to every school, that a special room should be set apart for the teaching of geography, replete with everything which may serve to illustrate the subject. The teaching of number is to be co-ordinated with geometry, and reinforced by contact with actual measurements made by the child. Confronted by similar requirements in all the varied subjects of the time table, it is evident that the average teacher is not sufficient for these things. Granted that he has the ability, he has not the necessary time. The only way out is by specialisation.

Little need be added by way of criticism. Enough has been said to show the direction in which the modern pedagogy is proceeding. There is much running to and fro, and much diversity of aim, but all are agreed on one point. The first step to any real improvement is the reduction in the size of the classes. This is necessarily a slow process, on account of the additional expense to the overburdened ratepayer. After all, the chief question for the nation is the effect which the new methods will have on the formation of character. Whatever this may be, it will be none the less lasting because of its indirectness. The intentions of the new theorists are to assist in rearing a generation that shall be strong and self-reliant, and capable of taking an intelligent interest in the world around them. About the direct teaching of morality and religion our theorists have not much to say. Their lips are to a great extent sealed. No special training would appear to be needful for what is generally admitted to be the greatest of all tasks. In this department the dilemma of the teacher becomes still more perplexing with the advance of the new methods. How can he reconcile the rationalism of treatment of the secular subjects with the dogmatism and bibliolatry which are demanded of him in the religious sphere?

A TRAVELLING TINKER.

THERE is gipsy blood in his veins. His skin is swart, his eyes sloe-black and furtive. He is only of some twenty summers, but is master of his simple craft. The Prince of Wales' Feathers, splashed in white on a green background with the appropriate motto—Ich Dien—in red uneven lettering beneath them, emblazon the signboard of the five-wheeled hand-cart which also records that grinding, china-rivetting, umbrella-mending and soldering are "done here." Of the grinding this is necessarily true, but of the rivetting, umbrella-mending, soldering, and occasional rush-bottoming of chairs, somewhere would have been a more accurate description.

It did not cost more than a few shillings to set him up. The complete outfit of the profession is represented by the light, easy-going hand-cart aforesaid ornamented with shining brass knobs to give it a smart and spick-and-span appearance. The knobs are polished to their highest capacity of splendour; no housewife keeps her hearth more burnished and bright. The tinker wears an apron spotlessly white; he is his own laundryman, and dries on the handiest hedgerow. The three inner wheels of the hand-cart, the fly-wheel, the stone-wheel, and the glaze-wheel, together with spindle and pulley, work smoothly at the firm regular pressure of the treadle, and sparks fly off in "copious golden showers," as he delicately yet firmly turns the blade-edge to the music of "the low hoarse purr" of the stone.

In the lower regions of the vehicle hangs in a smoke-blackened tin a "penn'orth" of coal to heat the iron for soldering. In winter he can usually discover a hospitable cottage fire—no good dame will refuse him—but in the summer, when housewives' grates are empty, he needs to stock his own coal. A few small pieces suffice which he picks up en route "without money and without price."

The cart is fitted with the various indispensable conveniences, a rude workbench, a rough-and-ready wooden vice, a diminutive watering-can with spout bending over the stone, and, chief of all, the tool-box with file, and nippers, and drill, and solder-iron, and wire, and gum, and spirit of salts, and the various other requisites of the grinder, tin-man, rivetter, rush-bottomer and umbrella-mender. The gum, together with certain ingredients, is for application to the leather band of the glazing-wheel to prepare it for the polishing and finishing off of the work. The spirit of salts (with zinc infusion) is for fixing the soldering.

He had made the hand-cart and all its fittings himself and takes a natural and honest pride in his handiwork. He loves it as an engine-driver his engine or a coster his barrow—this inseparable companion of his toil. He is not gifted with expedition, being of that dolce far niente temperament which lets time wag merrily by. He has a knowledge and love of the country through which he passes such as only the most careful and leisurely and intimate observation could have acquired. He knows the call and flight and plumage of every bird, the texture of the bark and the leaf-tracery of every tree. He knows where the brambles of the wild raspberry hide in the wood and the winding courses of the streams. Nevertheless, the lad applies himself steadily to his calling after his fashion and earns with the veriest ease an average of 30s. a week in quietness and in confidence. His price is 3d. a rivet, and you can't get it done for less! Of the skilled trade of china-rivetting he is the sole representative afoot in these parts, and fears no rival on the road. His itinerary is fixed, and he means, if he can, through life to abide by it. In this he differs from others of his calling who tend to be vagrant and shift and unreliable. But he is a good workman, and this is a large asset toward permanence. So, for fifty years if luck will have it, he will tramp the same roads with his five wheels, a familiar figure in the hamlets and country towns through which he passes at fairly regular intervals, a trusted servant sure of jobs. His wages will not increase with age, nor are they likely appreciably to diminish. There are no prospects in his profession, but security and contentment are his portion.

He is a happy man, this sworn brother of the pedlar. He has the open-air life that befits his gipsy nature. He is master of an ancient craft. Sparks flew when the first savage scraped iron against a stone. The tinkling (from which he derives his name) of the tin can he solders was heard by the children of the Age that succeeded the Age of Stone. He can accomplish his allotted task and solicit a further order with a smile of competence. He is sure of a living while pans need mending, knives and scissors need grinding, rush-seated chairs need bottoming, umbrellas let in the light of heaven, and china slips through the fingers.

There are many who fare further and fare worse than the travelling tinker. Was it not this way that good tinker John Bunyan journeyed on his pilgrimage from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City?

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

SIR,—The statement issued by the Portuguese Legation, which appeared in your last issue, is interesting as giving us their opinion that all the arguments presented at the meeting of protest against Portuguese slavery in West Africa in June last were "victoriously and absolutely refuted by the Representatives of the Centre Colonial of Lisbon." I am quite sure, however, that their opinion was shared by none who were present at the meeting, outside a small Portuguese group and their British ally, Colonel J. A. Wyllie, and I cannot think that this complacent official assertion will impress anybody who knows anything at all of the subject.

The best answer to the self-satisfied assurance of the Portuguese Legation is to be found in the White Book just issued on "Contract Labour in Portuguese West Africa" (Cd. 6322), which contains official correspondence and papers extending over 117 pages, and a period of the last three years. Many instances might be taken from these important despatches to prove the serious view taken by the British Government of the abuses which the Portuguese Legation dismisses so lightly, but two quotations from the despatches of Sir Arthur Hardinge, the British Minister in Lisbon, may suffice. In one of them, dated October last, Sir A. Hardinge reports having taken an opportunity of urging upon the Portuguese Foreign Minister "the extreme importance of putting an end to the Angola scandals, which had for so long called forth protests from humanitarians throughout the civilised world, and which the Ministers of the Provisional Government, shortly after the revolution of last year, had themselves so unsparingly denounced." He added that he had "heard serious complaints in official circles at Brussels of the way in which slaves were kidnapped by Angola caravans from the Kasai district of the Congo, which showed that the charges made did not emanate solely from missionaries or philanthropic sentimentalists." In a later despatch of March last, Sir A. Hardinge reports to Sir Edward Grey another interview with the Portuguese Foreign Minister, when the latter assured him of his Government's desire to terminate all these abuses, but, he said "that the governors whom he had sent out to give effect to his instructions had been to a great extent paralysed by the power of the vested interests, European and native, which, in effecting the necessary reforms, they found arrayed against them."

These extracts would appear to be sufficient to shatter the self-satisfaction on this subject to which the Portuguese Legation has given expression.—Yours, &c.,

TRAVERS BUXTON,
Secretary, Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society.
London, Aug. 19, 1912.

BED-TIME PRAYERS FOR CHILDREN.

SIR,—I am just in receipt of a letter from a mother, asking if I can tell her where she can find "bed-time verses"—in the form of sweet and simple prayers—for young children. Similar inquiries have come to me repeatedly in the past.

Most earnest and intelligent mothers, of whatever religious name, even if not formally connected with any Church, are anxious to instill into the tender minds of their little ones proper ideas of God and their relations to him. As a means to this end they feel, and feel rightly, that nothing is of more value than bed-time prayers, if the prayers can be of the right kind, free from outgrown and objectionable words and thoughts, simple, brief, adapted to the child's understanding, and breathing a spirit of sincere reverence, gratitude, love and trust.

Thousands of mothers in the past have used with their children the old familiar:

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
And if I die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take.

But to many thoughtful mothers these words are growing to be no longer quite satisfactory; they do not express the thought which they care most to leave in the minds of their little ones as they lie down to sleep at night. What seem to them most fitting for the bed-time hour are not gloomy thoughts about death, and having their souls taken by the Lord in case they die before waking, but something much sweeter and better—thoughts of joy and hope, of thankfulness to God for life and for home and parents and friends, and of trust in the Heavenly Father's care always over them and over all whom they love. Can mothers be helped to find such prayers?

Those that follow have been written at various times in the past with a view to meeting this need.

I.

In my work and in my play,
Kindly through another day
God has led me on my way.
All the good the day has brought me,
Every lesson it has taught me,
I would for it thankful be:
It is all God's gift to me.
All the night-time, while I sleep,
God a kindly watch will keep.

II.

Thanks I give thee, Heavenly Father,
For this day so glad and bright;
Now that evening shadows gather,
Guard me safely through the night;
When the morning wakes in beauty,
Waken me to love and duty.

III.

God gives the shining sun its light,
And lights the stars in the sky at night;
God covers the earth with grass and flowers,
And waters the thirsty land with showers;
God gives me home and friends and food,
And fills my days and years with good.
I thank you, God, for your loving care
Above and around me everywhere.

IV.

Safe in loving, unseen arms,
Now I lay me down to sleep,
Free from fear and all alarms:
God a loving watch will keep.

Grateful for the happy day,
Thankful for the silent night,
Guard me while I sleep, I pray,
Wake me with the morning light.

V.

God made the sky and the sea and the land,
And all things great and small;
He holds the great round world in his hand,
And never lets it fall.
Each night, when I lay me down to sleep,
The world and me he will kindly keep.

VI.

For each new morning with its light,
For rest and shelter of each night,
For food and health, for love and friends,
For everything thy goodness sends,
I thank thee, Heavenly Father.

I venture to submit these verses with the hope that among their number possibly some mother may find something of service to her.—Yours, &c.,

J. T. SUNDERLAND.
Detroit, Michigan, U.S.A.,
August 8, 1912.

[Mr. Sunderland has introduced a subject of vital importance to the religion of the home, in which many people feel the need of help. We shall be glad if some of our readers are prompted by his letter to write to us on the subject and to share their experiences with others.—ED. OF INQ.]

FOR THE CHILDREN.

AMONG THE BIRDS IN AUGUST.

I.

If you were asked, "What are the birds doing in August?" you might safely answer that they were enjoying a well-earned rest. Should any girls or boys who read this page chance to be close observers of birds, they may have noticed that towards the close of the nesting season a great many of them show signs of hard work, nay, even of overwork. "Nothing to do," says somebody, "but sit cosily on a clutch of eggs if they are hens, or sing a while if they are cocks; then, when the eggs are hatched, fly about in the sunshine, carrying food to the young; is that hard work?" It is hard work, and it undoubtedly tells on the birds. People who have been accustomed to observe the domestic hen very closely can go into a strange farmyard and point, with little hesitation, to certain hens as having very lately brought up a brood. They are thinner than the others, their eyes have a tired, worn expression, and there is a pinched, strained look about their faces; their plumage is not quite as bright and smooth as that of fowls which have had nothing to do but pick up their own food and comb their own feathers. Combing, or preening, is a very important part of a bird's daily business. Each bird carries what we may call its pocket comb. This comb is the bill. When a bird wishes to comb a feather it draws it between the upper and lower mandible, that is, between the two portions of the bill. A hen with from six to a dozen small children to protect, scratch for, and keep warm and happy, has not very much time or energy left for any but the absolutely necessary attention to her own coat.

The warblers and allied birds lead most laborious lives when feeding the brood. In "The Life of the World," by Alfred Russell Wallace, we read of a chaffinch: "In a nest with five young the hen bird fed almost all day from early morning to sunset, bringing mouthfuls of food on an average four times in five minutes. Blue tits worked continuously for sixteen hours a day at midsummer. . . . A pair of marsh tits . . . made 475 journeys with food in seventeen hours. . . . A wren fed its young 278 times in a day."

Imagine yourself living in a holiday camp and having to do—what no one, of course, ever is required to do—cross a road 278 times in one day to buy some small article for the campers. If each errand took two minutes to execute, your task would occupy nine hours and sixteen minutes of your day. Don't you think that after all those hours of monotonous work you would have a right to feel rather fagged? These small birds often have to feed the young for about eleven days before they are ready to fly, and after flight it is necessary to supply them with food regularly for at least two or three days, and occasionally for a longer period.

The constant watchfulness which the father bird exercises during the time when the mother is covering eggs or brood must make no light demand on his energy. I am not prepared to assert that all male birds keep strict and continuous watch at these seasons; but no one can closely study such birds as the peewit, redstart, chaffinch, or yellow-hammer, without discovering that the male is a very alert sentinel, and rarely quits his post. No doubt, in times of drought, when food is apt to be scarce, he knows what it is to remain on duty when unpleasantly hungry. Some males, such as the wood-pigeon, take their turn in sitting on the eggs so that the mate may safely go away to feed and take exercise. In many species the practice prevails of the cock feeding the hen both on and off the nest. Last May I saw a cole tit very busy helping his little wife to get a meal. The weather was not very warm, and it was too dry a day for insects to be plentiful. These tiny creatures knew that the eggs would chill if left long uncovered, and that dinner must be as brief a business as possible; so the pair hunted diligently. The hen remained in one tree, but the cock ranged further in the wood, reappearing every minute or two with food, which she eagerly accepted. I do not know whether the cock of this species ever helps to hatch the eggs, but no bird works harder when once there are young bills agape for grubs and insects.

Those children who wish to get the fullest satisfaction from the study of bird life must not allow anyone to persuade them that it is not much use trying to learn about birds in August or September, when the foliage is thick and nesting practically over. True, the leaves are many, and, what is a worse hindrance, they are much darker in colour, and admit less light to pass through them than was the case in June. Very few birds sing after July. But if the difficulty of finding birds to study is greater now than in spring, surely the joy and triumph when one makes a discovery, or learns a fresh fact, is all the keener. Who cares to win an easy triumph?

A very few birds lay eggs and rear young even in August. These are not first or second broods, and, as in the case of the sparrow, they may be fourth or fifth. A newly laid sparrow's egg fell out of a nest in the creepers on my house late in July. I once found a yellow-hammer's nest with warm eggs in it at Allonby, in Cumberland, early in September. In the Manchester Guardian of the 12th of this month mention was made of a linnet's nest with four tiny birds in it which had been found two days before.

In the first fortnight of this month I saw very young robins, grey wagtails, and thrushes in the trees and hedges, and several times heard the unmistakeable twitter of young birds calling from the nest to the parents. They do not do this until nearly old enough to fly.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS OCTAVIA HILL.

In the course of a sermon on Christian Service at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, last Sunday morning, the Rev. W. H. Drummond made the following reference to Miss Octavia Hill and her work:—

Miss Octavia Hill was one of the noblest servants of the public good whom our time has known. Few have been more closely connected with the social movements for the well-being of the people during the last 50 years. She was in every sense a pioneer, and it is the measure of her success that we find it hard to realise how much daring and originality there was in her early efforts, and perhaps have passed on to fresh forms of enterprise or new methods of work, building unconsciously on the foundations which she laid.

In early life she came strongly under the influence of Frederick Denison Maurice and John Ruskin. With Ruskin she co-operated in her housing schemes. A friend has described the origin of this movement—it was in 1867—in these words: "The grain of mustard seed from which the sturdy plant of housing reform sprang was first planted in Ruskin's house at Denmark Hill. One day he and Miss Octavia Hill were having a friendly chat, and he lamented the dreariness of life without an object other than the usual daily round. 'I paint, take my mother for a drive, dine with friends, or answer these correspondents,' said Mr. Ruskin, drawing a heap of letters from his pocket, with a rueful face, 'but one longs to do something more satisfying.' 'Most of us feel like that at times,' said his visitor. 'Well, what would you like to be doing?' asked Ruskin. 'Something to provide better homes for the poor,' was Miss Octavia Hill's quick reply. The idea seemed to strike Ruskin, and, turning sharp round in his seat, he asked: 'How could it be done? Have you a business plan?'"

Miss Hill had a plan, Ruskin supplied the necessary money, and it was a success. Miss Hill's methods, the same friend continues, "stimulated legislation, and turned the attention of philanthropists and capitalists in the direction of providing civilised dwellings for the poor. Miss Hill's recommendations and methods have spread to most of the cities and crowded towns of Great Britain, and have been adopted in America and in many European countries." (See "The Life of Ruskin," by E. T. Cook, Vol. II., 118-20.)

But behind the stimulating influence of Ruskin there was another in no way less remarkable. Maurice was one of the greatest and most penetrating religious teachers of recent times. He is sometimes accused of vagueness because he formulated no closed system of belief and announced no finished programme of duties. But that is not the work of the highest religious genius. It creates souls and transfigures human life and becomes a quickening power in all our thoughts and affections. There are many even now who owe their wider vision and their larger hope to the teaching of Maurice, though they may never have read a word of his writings or even heard his name. In all Miss Octavia Hill's work there was a spiritual quality which she owed to these teachers and to the rare gifts of her own nature. It was this which gave her a diffusive power and made her in as real a sense a creative spiritual influence to her generation as a wise and practical reformer.

Many of us here probably know this from our own experience. She helped us to avoid the extremes of a spiritual inwardness detached from the practical facts of life, and an emphasis on surroundings which forgets that man is a living soul and character the most creative thing in the world. This harmony and balance between the inward and the outward was one of the most remarkable features of her work. In many cases it made men crusaders against social wrong and the hardships of the poor without impairing the delicate respect of their friendship or their invincible faith in the conquering power of the soul; and it encouraged us not to stay our hands in working for cleanliness, and fresh air and open spaces and better dwellings, and the homely virtues of thrift and household piety in the slum areas of our great cities, because the way of legislators is long and tortuous and the day of the millennium is not yet. Nor let us forget how many people have been saved for a true service of humanity among dazzling and bewildering dreams, which often fire the emotions while they enervate the will, by the conviction which was always so powerful in her and her groups of workers, that the plain duties of to-day are the best contributions to the Kingdom of God to-morrow, that it is always worth while to take much thought to be kind. And so it became comparatively easy, without bating one jot of heart or hope for the dawning of the better day, to cultivate the small plot of flowers, and to place beautiful pictures on school-room walls, and to talk to tired mothers about the future of their children, and to see in it all part of the ministry of love and redemption, which every man is to accomplish according to the ability which God giveth.

Let us not lose sight of these things or undervalue their abiding preciousness because the intellectual horizon has changed during the past fifty years, and we are more conscious than formerly that many of the problems, which affect the health and happiness of our vast industrial society very closely, require the restraining influence of law for their solution as well as the heroism of private effort. Every generation must learn the lesson of Christian service afresh, its dedicated love, its "passionate patience," its cheerful self-sacrifice, and it can do so best from the "helpers of the world" who have gone before, whose voices still sound in our ears, whose hands touch ours out of the past. The gratitude they ask of us is that we should continue their work. Their imperishable epitaph is in the hearts of men, whom they have served according to the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever.

A friend who knew Miss Octavia Hill intimately writes to us as follows:—

"The loss of Miss Octavia Hill has called attention to the ever-increasing need of personal influence and personal work in a time that threatens to introduce a belief in mere machinery of government or of large organisations.

"She may be said to have owed her training for her work among the poor to three people: her grandfather, Dr. Southwood Smith, who turned her attention to the special needs of the poor for healthier and decenter homes, an interest which was strengthened by her mother's influence; Frederick Denison Maurice, who gave her a peculiar inspiration and encouragement in her youth, and showed her the links between divine and human sympathy; and, lastly, John Ruskin, who provided the means for those experiments which are specially associated with her memory, and who also encouraged in her the love of beauty which coloured so much of her life. Much has been said in the notices (some very excellent) which have appeared in the newspapers about the work which she carried on in the London courts, and her work of providing open spaces both in town and country; but not enough, perhaps, has been said of her special power of finding the right people for special work and of training them to do that work by her sympathy and encouragement as much as by wise advice. Yet it is on the success of this part of her efforts that their future results must in a great measure depend. And those who know something of her fellow-workers can look forward to the continuance of that union of wisdom and sympathy which is her contribution to the improvement of the conditions of our country."

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

HOLIDAYS IN THE LONDON PLAYGROUNDS.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S PLAY-CENTRES.

A FORLORN little Peri stood outside the gate of Paradise, peeping through the key-hole at her comrades on the other side, whose happy laughter could be distinctly heard as they romped about in the sunlight. She had very blue eyes, and very fair hair tied with ribbon of the colour of forget-me-nots, and her rosy little face was a refreshing thing to look upon after a walk through the crowded streets of the East End, where olive complexions and raven locks are so common as to make it hard to realise that one is in England at all. The Peri was sorrowful, as a Peri in such a position always is, for she had missed one of the great opportunities of the day—two hours' fun in the playground of a County Council School between 10 and 12—because she had been obliged to stay at home and "help mother." Poor little woman! Her hands, already coarsened with toil, and obviously not unacquainted with scrubbing brushes and the wash-tub, plainly showed that she was a real "help" indeed! But the case was by no means hopeless, for although the magic portals were effectually barred against her for the moment, they would open again and admit her at half-past two, if she did not fail to present herself at that time. So we smiled upon her encouragingly as we ourselves entered the playground, armed with an official introduction to the superintendent, and left her with this comforting reflection.

The playground was a fairly large one, rather less dreary than such places usually are, although there was not a blade of grass nor the branch of a tree to be seen anywhere. It was a breezy day, with clouds high in the air, and that was a thing to make the heart rejoice even in Whitechapel. Between two and three hundred girls, big and little, most of them with large dark eyes and dark brown or black hair of most alluring waywardness, which betokened their foreign origin, were playing games in the open space under the shadow of the school-building, or engaged in quiet occupations such as painting, knitting, threading beads and making puzzle-pictures as they sat round tables in the open or in the shelters intended for use in wet weather. Others nursed in their arms younger sisters nearly as big as themselves, or kept motherly watch over tired babies slumbering peacefully in the canvas cots which have been provided by the indefatigable organiser of the Evening Play Centres, in whose mind the idea of filling the London playgrounds with children during the holiday month originated. In a distant corner a number of children were eagerly waiting for a turn on the swings; several more were making themselves happy with hoops or skipping-ropes. It was a cheerful scene—one that compensated in some slight degree for the painful sensations which a visit to the East End inevitably awakens in a visitor whose instinct for beauty has not yet been dulled by the dinginess of its streets and the pale faces of its workers. But always those lovely haunting eyes, full of a shy curiosity, followed one round the playground and raised a hundred questions as to the possibilities of human development, the universal craving for joy, the future of the slum-child, and the interplay of psychic forces in this great city of London, with its tremendous social problems and bewildering contrasts.

Here, however, a sensible attempt was being made to keep the children of the East End, at least, out of the streets, and give them a little fun and brightness in the holiday season, which to many of them would otherwise bring but little pleasure or change. It seems curious that until Mrs. Humphry Ward took the matter up, nobody cared, apparently, what became of the little people we are laboriously endeavouring to educate when the school-term came to an end, and yet the success of her scheme testifies to the urgent need which existed before the idea entered her head for such a practical extension of the work of the Evening Play Centres. It is estimated that the total attendances in the forty playgrounds supervised by the Play Centres Committee will have reached 450,000 at the end of the present month, irrespective of the attendances at the forty playgrounds now controlled by the London County Council. The enthusiastic superintendent at the first playground we visited proudly gave the record number of attendances for one afternoon as 502; the numbers on ordinary days varied from two to four hundred. In other places the average ranged from 100 to 200. The playtimes are from 10 to 12 in the morning, 2.30 to 4.30 in the afternoon, and 5.30 to 7 in the evening, and this entails hard work in the month of August, even when the weather is not sultry, for the capable and devoted men and women who look after the children and organise their play with every sign of interest and real affection.

The superintendent at this particular playground had only one assistant; the superintendent in the boys' department, where strenuous games of cricket and football are continually going on, had none; and both confessed, yet in the most cheerful manner, that they were thoroughly tired out at the end of the day. But the children are not! Some of them have twenty minutes' walk to the school, but they often turn up with unfailing regularity three times a day, although the attendances in the morning are smaller as a rule than in the afternoon, presumably because "mother" wants Rachael or Aaron to run errands. When the first batch is dismissed at 12 o'clock a group of new-comers is already waiting at the gate in order that they may be first in the field when it re-opens at 2.30. Such picturesque little people some of them are! One small person with coal-black eyes and a stolid expression which would have delighted Phil May, was festively attired in a dress of bright blue covered with spangles like a little Harlequin; another had glorious golden braids which glistened in the sunlight as she sat, the demurest of Marguerites, knitting her brows over alternate rows of "purl and plain." The Jewish type of features predominated everywhere, and the courteous superintendent of the boys' playground stated that the lads under his care were all foreigners without a single exception. Really one might have been in New York! One of his boys, he added, could speak five languages, including English, with which he had rapidly grown familiar, although he had only been in this country for a few weeks. The children, both here and at the two other schools we visited, seemed healthy, well-fed, and, on the whole, decently clad, though belonging obviously to the poorer classes. There were only a few who really looked ragged, forlorn, or positively dirty. One poor little lad with a rather grimy face was tucking a pair of bare feet under him as he sat at a desk carefully drawing a bunch of poppies, but he was, happily, an exception. When asked if he liked coming to the playground, he said, "Oh, yes, ma'am," with a sudden smile which spoke volumes for the monotony and squalor of his home-life; and indeed the wonder is that any child can thrive in the crowded and malodorous streets and alleys of Aldgate and Whitechapel. But the vitality of the Jewish race is one of those astonishing miracles which set even the calculations of the eugenicists at defiance.

Radiant is the only adjective that comes to the mind as one recalls the pleasant hours spent in these treeless, flowerless playgrounds, which are yet made to blossom with the beauty and grace of childhood at the bidding of one true-hearted woman whose name is loved by every member of her enthusiastic staff. The boys and girls are all radiant, and bubbling over with life, including the bright-faced monitors, who discuss with you the methods of maintaining discipline among a crowd of small children with a little air of self-importance which is soon dropped when they join in musical drill or a country dance. "Some of the monitors are paid 1s. 6d. a week," says a confidential young person of thirteen. "We four" (indicating three other girls) "were paid last year, but now we're not, and I really think it's better. Some girls don't want to help at all unless they get money, but we don't mind, because it's so easy, and we like it." The elder girls' tender, protecting manner to the infants under their care is delightful to witness, and nothing pleases the small mothers more than to have their chubby little charges noticed and petted by the admiring visitor. At one playground they have had a baby seven weeks old in attendance, but this was, as the lady in charge admitted, "wicked."

Another thing that strikes one particularly is the intelligence and aptitude for occupying themselves happily, and even usefully, shown by boys and girls alike. The collection of drawings exhibited at a playground said to be frequented by the roughest class of children in the neighbourhood gave evidence of artistic perception, careful observation, and a certain impressionist daring in which even a Futurist might discover genuine possibilities! And then to see some of these uncouth boys treading dance measures and going through Swedish drill, keeping time admirably to the music and looking highly pleased with themselves, after little more than a week's training under special difficulties, is to realise what can be done by a patient and kindly teacher with the most unpromising material. The girls, of course, take to dancing as naturally as they take to bright colours and pretty clothes, and many of them have the natural grace and abandon of a Pavlova in the making. One of the playgrounds gave a display a week ago, and the charming young superintendent who had trained the little dancers told us that they turned up in dainty white frocks, and were greatly admired by their proud mothers.

It should be insisted on without delay that the result of gathering together the children of the poorer districts in this way for several hours a day during the holiday season is wholly admirable, as much from the point of view of morals and manners as from that of the child's enjoyment. The superintendent of a playground in Shadwell, who, together with his co-worker in the girls' department is connected with an important mission at the London Docks, testified strongly to the good behaviour of the children, and to the improvement noticeable in their conduct after a week or two of associated play. "They learn to be unselfish," he said, "and to control themselves. I have never heard a rough or impudent word from one of my boys, and they obey my orders without a moment's hesitation. Discipline is maintained, for this is necessary even in playtime, but they do not mind it and it does them good." "They are much cleaner than when they first came," said a helper at another playground. "I always inspect them when they come in, and if they are dirty they are sent home to wash. They soon learn to come with clean hands and faces." It is certainly desirable that the methods inaugurated by Mrs. Humphry Ward should receive more attention and support, if they are not ultimately incorporated in our national system of education. Inquiries have already been received from Manchester and Liverpool, and we hope before many years are past every playground in the country will be occupied in the holidays in this pleasant way. At present, while the movement is taking root, more help is needed, and we can only urge those who have not yet given much thought to the subject not to let another summer pass without visiting the playgrounds for themselves in order to learn what is really being done. They will see at a glance how easy it is for those who have the will to help in one way or another—if not by personal assistance, by a gift of toys, materials for work, books, and flowers. Nothing is wasted: the scarves that are knitted, the necklaces that are threaded, the rafia work and wool-work that is done by the children, together with the toys and picture-books, are all distributed at the end of the holidays, and thus some of the pleasure gained at the playground is carried into many a poor home, to add to the happiness of the children, and give them a fund of joyous memories for the enrichment of heart and mind throughout their lives.

ERRATUM.—In last week's issue, p. 550, middle column, line 35, for "third century" read "third millennium."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Banbridge: Farewell and Presentation.—On Sunday, Aug. 4, the Rev. Edgar Lockett preached his farewell sermon as minister of the First Presbyterian (non-subscribing) Church, prior to leaving Ireland to become minister of the Elder Yard Chapel, Chesterfield. After service a congregational meeting was held, and, on the motion of Mr. S. Bell (hon. secretary), the chair was taken by Mr. J. Smyth, M.A., the senior elder of the church, who explained that the meeting was called to say farewell to Mr. Lockett, and to present him with a token of their affection and esteem. The formal presentation was made by Mr. Webster Glass, LL.B., who said they could not let Mr. and Mrs. Lockett leave them without in some way marking their appreciation of their life and work amongst them. For six years Mr. Lockett had been their minister, and during that time he had discharged his duties both in the Church and Sunday school ably and conscientiously and in a manner entirely satisfactory to them; while in public life and in his relations with other religious organisations he had maintained the friendly feeling they desired to exist. He had upheld the reputation and dignity of the congregation in a way pleasing to all of them. Growing experience of Mr. and Mrs. Lockett had brought a ripening regard for them; and they (the members of the congregation) would have been well content if they had spent the remainder of their lives amongst them. That was not to be, however; other voices had called Mr. Lockett from them. It was unnecessary, and it was not their way, to say much about it, but they were sorry to lose them, and they would always think of their stay with them with feelings of kindness and a sense of work well done. They wished them all good in their life, and trusted that Mr. Lockett would be able to look back from a successful future upon what he hoped he would always regard as a pleasant past in Banbridge. In the name of the congregation Mr. Glass then presented Mr. Lockett with a cheque. Mr. Lockett, in a few grateful and touching words acknowledged the gift on behalf of Mrs. Lockett and himself, and, after other words from the chairman, the meeting terminated, the members of the congregation waiting in the vestibule to take leave of their minister and Mrs. Lockett.

Bath: The late Mr. J. T. Linsley.—The funeral of the late Mr. J. T. Linsley, a member of the Trim-street Chapel congregation, who has died at the age of 63, took place on August 9, when a large number of friends and fellow-citizens were present. The Rev. John McDowell, minister of Trim-street, conducted the service, assisted by the Rev. M. J. Austin, of Cirencester. Mr. McDowell referred in his address to the deep sense of duty which had been Mr. Linsley's chief characteristic, and to the warm-hearted generosity with which they were all familiar. His long and honourable connection with that place would be a helpful memory to them, and for such as he there was no death; to live in loving hearts was not to die. The interment afterwards took place at Lansdown Cemetery.

Billingshurst: The late Mr. Joseph Kensett.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. Joseph Kensett, which took place on Sunday evening last, at his residence, Ivy Cottage, Brockham, at the age of 78. Educated at Horsham by the Rev. Robert Ashdown, he settled in the village of Plaistow, and when need arose frequently gave his services in conducting the worship at Billingshurst Chapel. In his rooms at Plaistow, also, village services were held by the Rev. Jno. Ellis, which were well attended and much enjoyed. Later, coming to live at Brockham, he soon became a power for good in the little community by which he was surrounded. The Penny Bank, the Reading Room and Library, and the village Flower Show owed much to his fostering influence. He sat upon the School Board; but perhaps he will be best and longest remembered for his many thoughtful and unostentatious kindnesses to those who needed them.

Burnley.—On Wednesday last, August 21, at the quarterly meeting of members of Trafalgar-street Church, twelve new members were added to the church roll. The secretary states that additions have been made at every members' meeting since the Rev. Wm. J. Piggott settled there. Reports of delegates to the Provincial Assembly were given by Mr. J. T. Bibby, the church secretary, and the Minister, and references were made to the general progress of the church.

Burton-on-Trent.—An attempt was made some years ago to establish a Liberal Christian Church at Burton-on-Trent, but the movement eventually died out for lack of adequate support. Efforts are again being made to revive it, and it has been decided that a devotional meeting shall be held on the third Sunday in each month at 6.30 p.m. at the Young Men's Christian Association Building (No. 3 Committee Room), High-street. All sympathisers resident in the town are requested to send their names and addresses to the hon. secretary, Mr. J. W. Belfield, 4, West-street, Swadlincote, Burton-on-Trent.

Leeds: Mill-hill.—At the morning and evening services last Sunday, August 18, the Rev. C. Hargrove preached on "The Ejection of the Two Thousand." He reminded his hearers that among the ejected were the two earliest ministers of Mill-hill Chapel, the first of whom lay for six months in Newgate Goal for the crime of preaching what stirred in his soul as the word of God. By the act of joining that congregation, by the fact of being born of parents belonging to it, they had become descendants of these men; not by following their opinions, but by sharing the spirit which led them to make so great a sacrifice for conscience' sake. Even in the present day there were temptations to go the way of the world, to sink one's own convictions. To many, perhaps to all of them, Nonconformity meant a sacrifice; but, through it, they might join their voices to the shout of those that had gone through great tribulation.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. F. K. Freeston is announced to preach to-morrow, August 25 (St. Bartholomew's Day), at 11 o'clock, on "The Glorious Two Thousand." In the evening a lantern service in commemoration of the Ejectment in 1662 will be held at Lindsey Hall at 7 o'clock, when Mr. Freeston will give an address on "The Heroes of Bartholomew's Day." The New Hymnal, which was adopted by the annual meeting of the congregation, will be used for the first time at the Harvest Thanksgiving on September 29.

Stratford: The late Mr. W. J. Hawkins.—The death is announced on the 20th inst. of Mr. W. J. Hawkins, in his seventieth year. He was at one time the secretary of the Unitarian congregation at Stratford, and worked devotedly in its interests both in that capacity and as superintendent of the Sunday school. He was connected in his boyhood with the London Domestic Mission, Chapel-street, and afterwards, as day-school master, and in the work of the Sunday school, with Carter-lane Mission. The funeral will take place at the City of London Cemetery to-day (Saturday), when the service will be conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

"WITHOUT ENCUMBRANCE."

Attention has been drawn once again to the frequent recurrence in the advertisement columns of the phrase "without encumbrances," one of those euphemisms, as the Times points out, used to express a hard fact which people do not feel quite comfortable in putting into plain language. It simply means that children, whatever they may be to their parents, are an "encumbrance" to those who employ their parents, and the hardships resulting from this state of things are apt to be overlooked by people who are continually expressing alarm because the birth-rate is declining. A statement has just been issued by the National Poor Law Officers' Association relating to certain necessary reforms in their conditions of service, which mentions the fact that in only a few exceptional cases is satisfactory provision made for married officers. The possibilities of making better arrangements for "living out" are discussed, and the committee of the Association are of opinion that this could be permitted a great deal oftener than is the case at present.

BURNE-JONES PICTURES AT THE TATE GALLERY.

Seven of Sir Edward Burne-Jones's pictures, including the beautiful "Love Among the Ruins," "Pan and Psyche," and "The Forge of Cupid, 1861," have been lent to the Tate Gallery by Mr. R.

H. Benson, where they will be on view in Gallery XX., together with other works of Burne-Jones lent by his son, and by Mr. Graham-Robertson, until the end of the year.

THE CINEMATOGRAPH IN SCHOOLS.

The time seems not far distant when the monotony of school routine will be broken by the introduction of moving pictures to illustrate lessons in history and other subjects. The excitement with which such an innovation would be welcomed by the children can be well imagined, and those who have from the first realised the educational possibilities suggested by the cinematograph will be glad to hear that English makers of films are directing their attention more and more to the production of scenes which shall have real value from the point of view of instruction. Mr. Ellis, the chairman of the Warwick Trade Company, told a representative of the Daily News and Leader a few days ago that some of the most interesting episodes in history, including the Fire of London, could easily be reproduced, and pictures dealing with animal life, and even scientific facts, which would undoubtedly prove attractive to children of all ages, will be at the disposal of the school authorities before long.

MISS HELEN KELLER AS A LINGUIST.

A delightful portrait in cap and gown of Miss Helen Keller appeared in the Manchester Guardian one day this week. Miss Keller has just added to her remarkable list of achievements (which includes the well-known "Story of My Life") by giving an address in English, French, and German before a congress of otologists at Harvard Medical School. It is said that although her speech is somewhat laboured, she has a very pleasant voice, and a sense of humour. She has gone through a successful college training, her examination papers at first being read aloud to her, but afterwards set up in specially prepared Braille type. Miss Keller now writes her letters and books, as she wrote her college essays and examination papers, on a typewriter with Greek, French, German, and mathematical characters.

A COLONIST IN THE MAKING.

There is an interesting article by Mr. Albert Dorrington in the Contemporary Review for August, in which salutary advice is given to those who are cherishing vague dreams of seeking health and fortune in Australia. The successful colonist is certainly not made out of an impractical person with little capacity for hard work and rough fare—he is not even made, it would appear, out of a man with much "English experience," for the moment he enters Australia with the intention of settling on the land "he has issued his challenge to certain unconquerable elements" of which he has had no previous knowledge. "Success depends upon the new arrival's willingness to suffer and learn under conditions that demand the highest physical and mental equipment," and in his long fight with plague and disease, solitude, and untoward circumstances of every kind imaginable, "only skill and knowledge and foresight can save him."

* * *

As an instance of what the unwary settler full of British energy and enthusiasm may have to contend with, Mr. Dorrington describes his own experiences on part of an estate known as Hungry Hill, and introduces his readers to the scourge known as Bad Families. These Bad Families are "groups of isolated gully-dwellers, whose instincts develop after the manner of the poison-weed." Going on the land with one of them on your boundary "is worse than living with a colony of centipedes." The Bad Family which made Mr. Dorrington's life a burden to him had a pack of yellow dogs, half-bred dingoes, who were as hungry and fierce as wolves, and speedily devoured everything eatable to be found near his house, including a big white cat with her kittens. "One terrible day in December, when the dry wind moved over the earth, sapping it of life and moisture, the Bad Family, without warning, fired the scrub on my boundary. In a moment it was a roaring gehenna of flame that swept upon us whistling in its fury. Delaney and I fought with greenhide beaters for six hours, while the Family whooped joyously in the background. Next day the police inquired about the affair, but the Family were not at home when the trooper rode up to the humpy. It would have required a regiment of black trackers to find them in the almost impassable gullies." Australia, it would seem, offers a mixed programme for the intending colonist, but there is one indomitable actor who is always waiting in the background. "His name is Drought, and the waiting audience knows not when he will appear."

THE HABITUAL CRIMINAL.

We do not feel that the case of the habitual criminal has been fairly treated by Mr. W. S. Lilly in his article on "Criminals and the Criminal Class," in the Nineteenth Century, or that the problem created by this black sheep of society would be effectually solved by deporting him to some island where he would be reduced to a state of industrial serfdom, and kept in order by means of the lash and low rations. The habitual criminal, with his atavistic tendencies, may not be the direct product of his environment, as some suppose, nor yet so morally diseased as to render him as little accountable for his actions as a lunatic. Nevertheless, the community which tolerates in its midst those other criminals alluded to by Mr. Lilly at the beginning of his article under the name of "predatory financiers," which the law does not seem able to touch, cannot wash its hands of all responsibility concerning him, or hope to stamp out his evil characteristics by treating him like a mad dog. This way of dealing with the habitual criminal could only be possible to those who believe that punishment and vengeance are the greatest moral deterrents, and Mr. Lilly himself has something to say about the "contamination of prison life," which is simply "an education in crime," and about the relationship of feeble-mindedness to evil deeds.

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]
A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching.—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.
Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.
Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.
Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:
THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.
of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."
Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH

LISCARD, near —To be Let, furnished or twelve months, comfortable, finished house; good garden. Three minutes from Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WAREHAM.—Rooms to Let in nice modern house; high situation, with a fine view.—Mrs. Wood, The Gables, Worrett-road, Wareham. Recommended by Rev. H. S. and Mrs. Solly.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

PLUMS.—Pershire Egg Plums, 24 lbs. 6/6, 12 lbs. 3/9. Victorias, 24 lbs. 8/6, 12 lbs. 4/9. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c. Bundles of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable; wears for years. Scores of beautiful designs, fascinating shades.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 24, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3662.
NEW SERIES, No. 766.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

The Christian Churches and the Protection of Animals.

AN OPEN LETTER

in reply to the

ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY

in the August number of

"The Animals' Guardian"

A specimen copy sent free by post to any reader of "THE INQUIRER."

Price 1d. 24 pages, Illustrated.

Can be obtained at most Railway
Bookstalls, or ordered from any news-agent, or direct from the Publisher, post free for one year, 2s.

Offices: 22a, REGENT ST., LONDON, S.W.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD

Principal:

Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

For particulars as to Lectures and Bursaries for Students for the Ministry apply to the PRINCIPAL, or to one of the undersigned:

A. H. WORTHINGTON, B.A.,
1, St. James' Square,
Manchester.

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.,
3, Keats Grove, Hampstead,
London, N.W.

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY

AT

St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance
and carriage drive through avenue of trees.
House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests.

Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy
access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House,
Food Reform Boarding Establishment,
Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

Man and Metaphysic. By Rev. F. W. ORDE
WARD. August 24.

The New Spirit in Education. August 24.

The Ejected Ministers. August 17.

Conditional Immortality. By Rev. J. M.
LLOYD THOMAS. August 10.

Values of the Faith. By W. SCOTT PALMER.
(Four Articles.) July 20, 27, August 3, 10.

The Eugenics Congress and After. By Dr.
LIONEL TAYLER. August 3.

The Christian Minister. By Rev. JOSEPH
WOOD. August 3.

"The New Unity." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD
THOMAS. July 13.

The Church and Human Life. By Professor
G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.

Any of the above issues to be obtained
from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand,
W.C. Post free 1½d.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.
P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

VISIT OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION TO DUNDEE.

THE SERVICES in the Unitarian Church, Constitution-road, Dundee, on Sunday, September 8, will be conducted by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D., of Cambridge,
Mass., U.S.A., at 11 a.m. and 6.15 p.m.

On Saturday, September 7, at 6.15 p.m.,
Dr. CROTHERS will deliver an address in the Church on "Religious Education."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical
Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 139, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEAD-
MASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors,
Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade,
Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.
HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR
BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for
the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing
situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT,
M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss
LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated
Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey,
Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to
the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—
PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions,
&c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected.
Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff.
Entire charge of pupils from abroad.
Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden.
HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic
and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation.
North German Head Mistresses. Highest
references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals,
T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, König-
strasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs.
BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton,
Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale,"
Letchworth-road, Leicester.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, September 1.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. H. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. GEO. PEGLER, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. GEO. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. A. STABLES; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, B.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11, Mr. F. R. NOTT, LL.B. No evening service.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. T. G. BARRETT AYRES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W. No morning service until Sept. 15; 7, Mr. S. PENWARDEN.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 only, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING. No evening service.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. W. H. SANDS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 22.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. D. DELTA EVANS.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. J. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. GEO. PEGLER, B.A.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. A. PAYNE.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. S. HURN.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODMILL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. MAGUIRE, B.Sc.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, B.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Mr. AMHERST D. TYSSEN, D.C.L., M.A.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. H. W. KING.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. H. MAISTER.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HOBSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. FISHER SHORT.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. LANG BUCKLAND.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Mr. J. H. EWBANK.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. A. C. NICKERSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. DAWTREY, B.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

GOLDEN WEDDING.

KENRICK—CHAMBERLAIN.—On August 26, at Unity Church, Islington, by the Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A., William, second son of Archibald Kenrick, Esq., of Berrow Court, Edgbaston, to Mary, eldest daughter of Joseph Chamberlain, Esq., of Highbury-place.

DEATH.

HEWER.—On August 26, at Inglewood, Mon-ton, Harriet Hower, in her 88th year.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.—Young Lady, aged 18, native of Luxemburg, and educated at the Lycée in that city, seeks situation in an English home or small school, from October next, where she would give lessons in French or German.—ETTINGER, 45, Highgate-hill, N.

CAN ANY LADY recommend a nice girl as Nurse or Nursery-Governess to five children? Ages two to eight years. No teaching required, as three eldest attend day school.—Address, Mrs. HOWARD MARTINEAU, Roughdown End, Boxmoor.

NURSERYMAN in Yorkshire wishes to place daughter, aged about 16, with a Unitarian family as Assistant Nurse. Fond of children. Healthy, willing to do any similar duties.—H. L., c/o INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

LADY (36) requires post in professional man's house (or equivalent) as Companion-Nurse: Housekeeping. Domesticated. Knowledge of cooking; supervise servants. Nominal salary.—M. F., The Rosery, Medstead, Hants.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken. Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	579	LITERARY STUDIES :— Francis Thompson	583	FOR THE CHILDREN :— Among the Birds in August.—II.	588
ONE THING NEEDFUL	580	QUESTIONS AT ISSUE :— Death and Survival	586	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :— The Moral Education Congress	589
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :— Commonsense and Metaphysic	581	CORRESPONDENCE :— The Cinematograph in Education	587	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	590
Under the Stars	582	Prayers for Children	587	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	591
Joey : A Plea for the Normal Child	583	Unitarian Ministers and the Insurance Act 588

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

With the beginning of September the slack season is well-nigh over ; and all institutions, churches among the number, which feel the influence of the holiday mood begin to recover their normal habits. The sameness of religion is one of its signal blessings. It enables men to clasp hands across the centuries and to feel the power of a fellowship which is undistracted by novelties. But this is no excuse for stagnation or a refusal to put a new edge on our spiritual weapons. The besetting weakness of many churches is their indefiniteness of aim. They are occupied with many things, but they do nothing strongly. They are continually trying new experiments in attractiveness, but their disjointed plans of work have little coherent relation to one all-controlling purpose.

* * *

It would be a good thing if their members would come together from time to time for serious and candid self-examination. What they need to consider chiefly is not the fulness and variety of the new programme of activities, but their own faithfulness to their duties and privileges as members of a Christian Church. Are they as keenly devoted to the service of human need, as generous in their gifts, as forgetful of themselves as they ought to be ? Do they rely for success upon the minor arts of popularity, or do they trust for the strength of their appeal to the witness of the Spirit in the hearts of men and the self-surrenders of faithfulness ? After many years of dissipated energy there are signs of a revolt against the tendency to magnify machinery in religion, which often degrades potential power into fussiness, and a recovery of the elementary truth that men are saved not by the cult of sociability but by the preaching of the Gospel and the training of character.

* * *

THIS does not mean that the church is to retire into pietistic seclusion. Far from it. It is simply a question of putting the chief things in the first place and giving them the first-fruits of our affection. We should be glad to see many churches relinquish some of their languishing societies and poor attempts at week-day amusement in order to give themselves to the patient and systematic study of social questions. Social questions are a perpetual challenge to the disinterested enthusiasms of middle-class congregations. We cannot advance a step towards their healthy solution except in a spirit of sacrifice. The great advantage of studying them in a Christian atmosphere is that they are grasped at once as urgent problems of human life, and their tragic human import illumines the long road of facts and figures and patient investigation of detail, which earnest and resolute men are bound to tread. Here, too, we are conscious of the dependence of all noble action upon spiritual power. It is harder for most men of intelligence to will and to do God's good pleasure than to understand what is needed. And so we are thrown back once more upon the central purpose of the church, to help men to live in the spirit of Christ. Failing in that it fails in everything.

* * *

THE annual Pastoral Address of the Methodist Conference is an earnest appeal for a revival of evangelism. It recognises frankly that much that characterised Methodism in the days of Wesley has gone never to return, and that it is neither possible nor desirable to live in the twentieth century as if we belonged to the eighteenth ; but it urges its members to rely as implicitly upon the same methods of direct witness to the power of the Spirit, and to remember that the preachers of early Methodism were before all things evangelists. "The evangelist," it says, "has a place in the heart of Methodism such as is yielded to no other, and for the direct work of winning men for Christ, our people give with a noble liberality. In missions and in circuits thousands are toiling with tireless zeal. At no period in the past history of our church did the spirit of evangelism express itself in more numerous or more varied forms. But is that spirit as universal in Methodism as once it was, or has there been a cooling in our ardour ? The question is one of vital importance. Methodism was born in a revival, and the evangelistic spirit is the breath by which it lives. Whatever may be the case in other Churches, we grow by conquest, or we do not grow at all."

* * *

STATISTICS of denominational growth or decline are liable to be more than usually misleading. Not only are they a very imperfect indication of spiritual health, they are also to a large extent unreliable for purposes of comparison, being based upon the returns of voluntary societies, scattered over a wide area with very different standards of accuracy. Bearing these drawbacks in mind we may read the statistics which have been issued recently by the Congregational Union with interest and profit. The satisfactory element in the returns is the increase in church membership in Canada and Newfoundland, Australia and New Zealand, China, India, Japan and the United States of America. There is also an increase in the figures supplied by the London Missionary Society. On the other hand the actual decline in the churches at home in spite of an expanding population has not been arrested.

IT is all to the good that Canon Hensley Henson's scathing sermon on the Putumayo atrocities has provoked some hostile criticism. The moral thrust was meant to strike home, and it has evidently done so. The correspondence between Canon Henson and the solicitors of the three Englishmen who acted formerly as directors of the Peruvian Amazon Company, which has been sent to the press, is a notable example of the folly of angry men. All the force and dignity are on the side of Canon Henson, who is quite indifferent to the blustering demand that he should make amends for conduct which is described as "unworthy of a clergyman of the Church of England—unworthy of a gentleman—unworthy of a man." If public prejudice against the former directors is accentuated before the Parliamentary inquiry into their responsibility begins, it will be the fault of their own amazing weakness and folly in rushing into print with this discreditable correspondence.

* * *

CANON RAWNSLEY gave an address to the Fabian Summer School, at Keswick, last Monday on "How to save the beauty spots of Great Britain." It will give unfeigned pleasure to all simple lovers of beautiful things. He spoke specially of the disfigurement of landscape by hideous advertisements, and our present failure to exercise any kind of public control. He advocated a government tax of so much per square inch, but confessed that at a time when the chief culprits in these matters were honoured by knighthoods, instead of heavily fined, he had a little despair of the growth of a public opinion that would save Britain from the advertiser.

* * *

IN the course of his address, Canon Rawnsley mentioned how he himself was instrumental a few years ago in painting out the huge six-foot letters of a patent food advertisement near a Swiss waterfall. The rocks upon which the abomination had been painted belonged to the hotel proprietor, but the impudent advertisers came in the night—let themselves down with a rope, wrought the mischief, and got off scot-free. To undo their work he and others armed themselves with buckets of paint, mixed to the colour of the stone, and, secured by ropes, climbed up what seemed a sheer precipice, 100 ft. or more, and daubed out the letters one by one. We hope that this is a parable of the active public spirit which will animate hundreds of people when we have learned the wisdom of Socialism in natural beauty and regard the simple enjoyments of ordinary men as infinitely more precious than the gains of the advertiser. But it is a matter in which public opinion has still to be created and roused into effective action.

ONE THING NEEDFUL.

"We do well to consider how our work may be so improved in this or that particular as to strengthen all moral and spiritual influences in the common life of our people; in other words, to make that life more truly Christian in spirit, purpose and character."
—THE BISHOP OF HEREFORD.

WE doubt whether the present year has produced a more excellent document of practical religion than the recent Visitation Charge of the Bishop of HEREFORD. It has many merits, among them its brevity and the noble simplicity of its language, its firm grasp of the needs and difficulties of ordinary men, and its spirit of fervent charity. There is nothing pontifical in its tone as there is nothing narrowly ecclesiastical in its atmosphere. Readers who are a little weary of episcopal caution will rejoice at its candour, while the partizan will retire baffled by the passages of quiet wisdom, in which earnestness is never wedded to bigotry and lofty spiritual aims leave no room for self-complacency.

As we read Dr. PERCIVAL'S words and ponder their meaning, he seems to be pleading with us for a revision of judgment in regard to many things which affect our normal religious attitude very deeply. For instance, we observe upon even a cursory glance over the field of religious activity that strong religious earnestness often goes hand in hand with some vehemence of method and intolerance of belief. It is a common charge against the latitudinarian that he never sees any religious truth clearly or grasps it strongly, that the very breadth of his sympathies dissipates his energies, and that consequently all his work is lacking in vigour and intensity. Some element of militant impatience, of rash speech, of fiery zeal, is assumed to be the sign manual of real conviction. If a man is quiet in his manner, fair to his opponents, and so reverent in the presence of the divine mysteries of religion as to admit that in some things he may be mistaken, it is the policy of those who account themselves leaders and set the tone of the religious platform to leave him on one side as a weakling who has no place in the decisive spiritual battles of the world. Is this conclusion just? Has it any real basis in the mind of Christ and the purposes of his spirit? In so far as breadth resides in the intellect alone, and amounts to little more than an acceptance of the doctrine of the relativity of all theology, it may paralyse both the will to believe and the will to dare in the wide fields of Christian adventure, and leave a man cold and undecided in presence of the noblest duties of religion. But if his catholicity belongs to the core of the spiritual man, if he has learned it in the school of Christ so that it is an inseparable quality of the wisdom of life, not an intellectual attitude but part of his daily walk with God, then it only frustrates what is limited or false, and sets the energies free for the intensest service of God and man of which the soul is capable. This is one of the lessons which the Bishop of Hereford has to teach us. It is as though the very clearness and simplicity of his vision and the disciplined breadth of his sympathies had liberated him for the real tasks of religion and the pure love of human souls, while other men are still entangled in their controversies about dogma and ritual. How practical and at the same time how rich in spiritual wisdom is all his advice to the clergy about their work, their difficulties, and their short-comings. He warns them that in their devotion to the efficiency of public worship they must not neglect their pastoral care and "all that work of social betterment on which the moral and spiritual life of the people so largely depends for any real progress." And in the same spirit of religious sympathy and solicitude he dwells on the unifying power of goodness and devoted service. "Feeling as I do, with the experience of many years behind me, that conduct and character are the most important things in life, I love to dwell in thought on the great company . . . of those good men and women, who, in our scattered parishes, remote, unnoticed, and without expectation of earthly recompense, are faithfully devoting themselves to the service of their Lord, sweetening the air of all the common life around them with the influences of His Spirit, ploughing their allotted field until their work be done."

Face to face with this view of religion, which is remarkable as much for the spiritual power as for the quiet sanity with which it is presented to us, we are forced to ask ourselves whether we do not need a new scale of values for our religious virtues. The loud advocacy of our own sectional opinions, the vehemence and the frequent bitterness of controversy, the blaring advertisements of the popular preacher, the easy excitements of religious assemblies, the rhetoric which draws cheers from the crowd, what have they to do with the Gospel of holiness and love, the humiliation of the cross, and the pleading of the Spirit in our hearts? It may even be a subject for serious reflection, whether many of the things which are taken to be signs of earnestness minister more to our own self-importance than to the progress of Christianity. It is good to remember the quiet rebuke of Archbishop USSHER to the Puritan divine, Dr. JOHN PRESTON, after they had been engaged in a long controversy, "Come, doctor, let us say something about Christ before we part."

Those who have discovered this sovereign cure for their own faults of method and temper in religious work will certainly lose some of their combativeness for the minor parts of divinity. But it is all infinite gain. The greater things have claimed them for their own, and their earnestness, as it is chastened into peaceable wisdom and an abounding charity, gains tenfold in spiritual power.

In the same spirit we escape from an attitude of conventional satisfaction with our own message and resentment of criticism, and many another familiar method of self-defence against a hostile or indifferent world, which waste the time and sap the strength needed for nobler tasks. Here again the Bishop of HEREFORD comes to our aid. "It is in no spirit of self-complacency," he says, "that we Churchmen can contemplate the influence of our Church on the dominant aims and the prevalent standards of opinion and conduct that determine the general character of the life, whether among rich or poor, whether in great cities or in rural districts. We live in an age of very strong and engrossing materialistic influences. We breathe day by day a materialistic atmosphere; and amidst such circumstances the task of the minister of Christ, called to inspire men with the regenerating spirit and power of the Gospel, is no easy one. Thus needing every help, we do well to consider how our work may be so improved in this or that particular as to strengthen all moral and spiritual influences in the common life of our people; in other words, to make that life more truly Christian in spirit, purpose and character." How simple and modest, and yet how strong! It is the strength of complete dedication to one purpose to which everything else is felt rightly to be subordinate. The breadth of mind, which is little more than another name for restless curiosity, may result in nothing better than critical sensitiveness to the ignorance of other people, or the enervating habits of the dilettante; and the dilettante in religion is of as little use to the world as the dilettante in old china. But once again we see that breadth of mind which has been learned in the school of CHRIST, and is recreated day by day at that inexhaustible fountain of charity, is a source not of weakness but of strength. It sets us, if we have ever grace to accept its discipline, at the centre instead of the circumference, in the burning heart of love, at the very source of the divine goodness and purpose. It strips us of all false pride of opinion, and when we are inclined to fold our hands or to congratulate ourselves upon our success or to take a backward glance towards the easier paths which we have forsaken, it sets our task before us once again, so amazing in its simplicity and yet so far beyond the reach of our keenest effort, to make life "more truly Christian in spirit, purpose and character." In comparison with that, none of the other things with which religious men occupy themselves, often in argument and dispute and party rivalry, seems greatly to matter. It is the one thing needful.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

COMMONSENSE AND METAPHYSIC.

"If you stand right fronting and face to face with a fact, you will see the sun glimmering on both its surfaces, as if it were a scimitar, and feel its sweet edge dividing you through the heart and marrow. Be it life or death, we crave only reality." And the pathway to this lies across the ultimates. We quickly discover that nothing less satisfies, and nothing more exists. We may rest at first in penultimates or ante-penultimates, but some healthy fact or rocky principle knocks roughly against us, and we relinquish our hold of the transitory and phenomenal and impermanent. "Next to us is not the workman we have hired, but the Workman whose work we are." "Nearest to all things is the Power which fashions their being." Christianity shines as the candle that reveals this truth, as no other religion has or can. "The oldest Egyptian or Hindoo philosophy raised a corner of the veil from the statue of Divinity, and still the trembling robe remains raised." But it was the Cross that rent the veil entirely. And now we behold the Truth, or a corner of Nature or reality, not through the medium of a temperament, but through the Light of the World. Christ was the revelation. For this thing was not done in a corner, or to a corner, but for all men God has stamped His thoughts, His metaphysic, on the constitution of our minds and on the constitution of Nature. Even when we collide with a material fact, like a stock or stone, we collide with a thought—a thought of God. We break our hearts or heads not against iron bars, but against thoughts, that ask us rude and therefore vital questions and compel us to think in the same coin by way of reply. "The Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." We talk about a right life, and we mean the right way of thinking. The infant most probably begins to speculate dimly in his cradle, upon the world of contradictions that surrounds him. He has views above his bib and bottle. The darkness grows less and less, as he relates persons and things to himself and to each other, and when he has established stable connections he has commenced to be a philosopher. As he drinks his way onward, he thinks his way also. He imbibes not only his mother's milk, but the mother's milk of humanity which (so to speak) flows from the bursting breasts of Nature, namely, thought. He feels the Divine overshadowing and the indwelling Presence. "I am conscious of the presence and criticism of a part of me, which is not a part of me but a Spectator." Ah, but a Worker, too, and a Co-worker, and above all l'Etre qui pense. For what is the produce of the labourer's hands, or the artisan's, or the artist's, but embodied or crystallised thought? Imperfect, clumsy, circuitous, and defective in many ways, it may be and, indeed, must be. But there it is, a living thought struggling to find expression in the inadequate matrix of matter, but still telling us something of the spiritual universe in which we lie and without which we could not exist a moment. "The universe constantly and obediently answers to our conceptions—whether we travel fast or slow, the track is laid for us." The child's broken toy manifests a glimpse of the Infinite Plus—it is a broken toy and something more, a broken thought. Riches (richesse) consists in the wealth of our thoughts, in so far as they have become working and guiding principles and have been capitalised by commonsense. Unless they act and react properly and always, unless they provide the desired clues to progress and life, they fail.

God dwells at the point of intersection of all the worlds, holding the rudder and over-ruling and disposing. The threads of thought, like so many lines of force, creative, compelling, sustaining, directing, are in His hand, and flow into Nature which they uphold. For what is the cosmos but a thought system, or spirit clothed in matter, or matter dimly endeavouring to express spirit? Hence that sensus numinis, which is also sensus communis, or the universal thought of God. Commonsense, our earliest instincts, make us philosophers. Thought reacts on thought, we feel we inhabit a thought world, controlled and preserved by a thinking Personal Presence. We know intuitively it is all akin to us, the universe and the Helmsman who guides and inspires the universe. To use a material figure, consciousness assures us we are of the same flesh and blood. The Supreme Worker works in the stuff of which He is composed. And what are the constants of thought? Naturally anthropomorphic or anthropometric, they testify immediately to the creature and the Creator, being at the same time necessarily theometric and theomorphic. The constants must be likewise the ultimates. They are the pre-assumptions, the elemental instincts, with which we come into the world. A conviction of final propriety, the inherent fitness of things, the rationality of all, the sweet reasonableness or unreasonableness (for they come to the same on a higher plane) of facts and events and relations.

That nothing walks with aimless feet,

That not one life shall be destroy'd

Or cast as rubbish to the void,

When God hath made the pile complete;

That not a worm is cloven in vain—

That not a moth with vain desire

Is shrivell'd in a fruitless fire,

Or but subserves another's gain.

The journal intime of the heart, that thinks as well as feels with a logic of its own, arrests our wayward wanderings with this secret certitude, Lessing's illumination, and everyone's belief—at bottom—the cosmic revelation written on the innermost framework of the mind—the law of liberty, and the liberty of law, in an immanent Divinity informing and yet transcending all. We must accept this thought, alike our security and condemnation, and still we freely accept it. Order will come out of confusion, right out of wrong, truth out of falsehood, rest out of storm. The apparent disharmonies, which any fool can see, are apparent only. Thought, reason, really over-rules—the Eternal Logos. “In eternity there is indeed something true and sublime. But all these times and places and occasions are now and here. God himself culminates in the present moment and will never be more Divine in the lapse of ages. And we are enabled to apprehend at all what is sublime and noble, only by the perpetual instilling and drenching of the Reality that surrounds us.” We all, that is to say, start with one aboriginal equipment—“the marks of the Lord Jesus”—the “Recognition marks” by which we know each other and know the Divine in us, the “dedication marks to Deity” of the freeborn slave. And, as in the Middle Ages the grand conflict lay between the Sacerdotium and the Regnum, with the usual predominance of the Sacerdotium, so in us the battle of thought lies between the Divine element and the earthly, or the spiritual and the material. No fights were ever so fierce and long as the campaigns of thought, contested on the eternal plane. And a man is rich not in what he possesses, but in what possesses him. Unless free of thought and free to think, he remains a bondsman. We may, we can easily dispense with most things, but not with our royal (Divine) inheritance of thought. Here we are in touch with the ultimates. Ah, and the metaphysic of the street or market-place, when unveiled and disentangled from its commercial chrysalis, strikes the very stars and rests in God. Were not the Semites really right in seeing something sacred in the very hairs of the head, no less than in the blood? What is there not, which does not contain at core the sanctity which reveals the Hand (if but “the ‘prentice Hand”) of God? A shadow of the Infinite lies even upon the dregs of the gutter and the poor wretches, the sweepings of the gutter and the prisoners of the slums. It is a vulgar objection to Hegelianism, “Why should the Absolute split itself up, to reunite itself again?” But we would ask another question, which the harlots and hooligans could answer. “Why was Christ’s heart broken to make the world whole?” The man in the street, the Pariah, the outcast of society, the Magdalene penitent or impenitent, will give the right reply—because even they can think. Though their thoughts may be and must be, more like a curse than a blessing and yet a saving curse.

And his own thoughts, along that rugged way,
Pursue like raging hounds their master and their prey.

Is not thought the “Hound of Heaven”?

No doubt, many great movements have apparently originated with great thoughts in undemocratised peoples, by setting on fire the hearts and minds of a class or caste (such as religious or military societies) or the upper stratum of the community. But this seems impossible now in most civilised countries, when the appeal is to the masses and corner “buzzers” at the last, if not from the very first. Till the common thought, or common sense, has become the property of the people, till it speaks as the public opinion of the masses, till the workers grow saturated with it, we know it does not enjoy the requisite omnipotence. The new horizon opened out must be finally translated into the vernacular and simple terms, before it can inspire to fruitful action and energise as the voice of God. Behind the armed battalions, beneath the conqueror’s march, at the back of diplomatists and Dreadnoughts, lies the heaven of some master thought that will shake and shape the world to a broader and better synthesis. We stand now on the threshold of great events, which may demand the “blood covenant of the threshold.” The creative thought which will effect this change has not assumed yet its final form, is, indeed, not distinctly articulate. But it cannot be long before it announces its message that will transfigure the face of the Empire.

O yet we trust, that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill.

It remains for the classes, and especially our rulers, to direct and determine this thought, that the vox populi may be the vox Dei.

F. W. ORDE WARD.

UNDER THE STARS.

BEECH CRAG was once one of the most picturesque valleys in South Wales. Two chains of hills that hem the vale met below in a series of wooded glens, through which a crystal stream made music—tumbling in white cascades or flowing gently in limpid pools fringed with ferns. But there are now five coal mines in the valley. A sullen sluice of black liquid stains the river bed, around which and up the hill sides narrow streets of hastily-erected houses crowd breathlessly together, as if to stifle every rudiment of æsthetic sense left to the patient dwellers. Two things alone rise above the sordid environment: the huge chapels, open once a week; and the huge inns that ply a busy trade the six remaining days. Everybody attends chapel, where a volume of marvellous voices gathers like the sound of many waters hymned in a minor key in praise not of him who lived but him who died—“y gwr fu farw ar y groes.”

Beech Crag is as alive as a beehive. As there are three shifts of workers for every twenty-four hours, it is somebody’s turn to be off duty at all times of the day. One meets blackened faces surmounting very un-athletic frames at three coming-and-going stages daily. At midnight the place is madder than Piccadilly. So ingrained is the habit of late hours that one may see children under five perched up at table attacking a heavy supper as late as half-past ten p.m. A persistent sensation recurs that the strained mirth but strives to hide the sense of an ever impending doom. The toll of death is appalling.

The prevalent theology is like the streets, narrow; and like many of the streets, without any back exit (to liberalism), and altogether lacking in “sweetness and light.” But how much so it needs the advent of a Unitarian van to discover. Three men one night had tried successively, but unsuccessfully, to drive in some simple elements of the larger hope. But they were asked: “What warrant have you for teaching all men are children of God when our Lord emphatically said to the unbelieving Jews, ‘Ye are of your father, the devil’?” and there was no doubt in the minds of the crowd as to the parentage of the three mild missionaries who were supposed to be bent on destroying the true faith. There the “poor devils” (in a double sense, it would appear) waged their unhappy strife in the open space amidst the clank of machinery, the din and turmoil of the passing traffic, and the jeers of the crowd. Little wonder if at the end of so unfruitful a meeting they desired to shake off (for some hours) the dust of the city of perversion. Sleep, at least, they would, as far as possible from the haunts of the men of Chorazin. They were plainly very sore, and sought, like so many whom men reject, for balm at the breast of Mother Nature. To sleep beneath the stars struck them as an inspiration. Sometime later, therefore, they might be seen trudging up the mountain-side, each carrying in his bundle canvas-spread and rug and pillow, and in his heart the prophet’s heavy burden. It was good to walk off the fumes of the cup of controversy. Nothing sobers like mountain climbing on moonless nights. Several hundred feet above the engines at the pit-heads the last lights are left behind. Several hundred feet more they are above the cultivated crofts, and disturbing the resting sheep. Nothing will do to-night but the mountain-breast. At last they have found their pitch, and are stretched out in luxurious quietude. For the plan was solitude à trois. Each felt alone with the night, only there were companions within call. Perhaps one cannot realise how the night comes down with peace profound until one lays roofless head beneath it. Nothing between the face and the Vastness. Nothing save the little beads of dew falling like accents of benediction upon the features. And then there is the cool breeze, softly eloquent, sweeping over one; not packing itself through an oblong space in a window, breaking its bounty over curtains and corners, but sweeping in a broad unhampered mass, not deigning to distinguish you from the tout ensemble, accepting you on the same terms as the granite boulder and the lamb and the coney and the owl. Having enjoyed the delicious restfulness and wondered why ever men hide themselves in close caves, one waits on the silence, and responds to the caress of the night-breath and listens. The bracken makes beautiful patterns silhouetted against the wonderland of starlit sky. One seeks familiar signs amid the stellar scenery, Charles’s Wain and the Northern Star and the Dragon. Is Altair really twelve times bigger than our sun, and are we now rushing through space at the rate of seven hundred miles a minute? Yes, one feels the motion. One feels the world; the hugeness of it, and yet its littleness compared with the abyss. One feels the wild speed of its orderly flight. How drowsy it makes one. Earth's majestic unconcern comes over the supine figures. Gently fans the wind—down, down one sinks—oh, long plummet of peace. . . .

The great experience of a night out is not the going off to sleep but the coming to in waking. To waken here amid the green world, with the purple hills all round and the bird-song on your bed-rail, so to speak. One opens eyes with a child's gentle wonder and then the swift recognition. A whole night in God's world, the soul washed white and clean of care. From far off beyond the gates of dawn on the long trumpet of morn comes the call to life. Chill falls the touch of Nature then, and nothing base will stand beneath it. One understands why in religious discipline this hour before the dawn has been chosen for the hour of meditation. In other climes I have heard the deep aum of the Hindu aspirant and the plaintive chanting of the Buddhist devotee. And for us in the West, Harriet Beecher Stowe has sung:—

Still, still with Thee, when purple morning
breaketh,
When the bird waketh, and the shadows
flee;
Fairer than morning, lovelier than the daylight,
Dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with Thee.

Alone with Thee, amid the mystic shadows,
The solemn hush of nature newly born;
Alone with Thee in breathless adoration,
In the calm dew and freshness of the morn.

Presently the sun rose over the crest of the opposite hill, and the three men stood upon their feet, and gazed upon it in silence. Thousands of years of adoration cried out along their nerves that moment, and the act was one of unconscious worship. And when they came down the hill, each one was softly singing to himself, wearing upon his face a look of strange fascination.

J. T. D.

JOEY.

A Plea for the Normal Child.

"You young limb, I'll banjo you. Where have you bin all day?" Mrs. Peacock held her offspring, a small boy, by the scruff of his neck; her voice was fierce, but her eye twinkled, and Joey raised his ugly freckled little face to hers with serene trust shining in his china blue eyes. He clasped against him a huge bunch of wild flowers—tansy, scabious, mauve and blue; foxgloves, meadow-sweet. All the flowers of July were crushed in his small arms.

His mother, stooping, met his gaze and kissed him between the eyes.

"Give me the flowers, luv', and you go get the big jar and set 'em up your own self."

"You think I'm foolish," she said, turning to her visitor, as the small boy vanished into the back place; "you think I should 'a given him a good hidin' when he's bin playing truant all day since half-past eight this morning. But you take my word for it, I have lathered him, and his father too, but it ain't no good, off he will go. The school attendance officer he won't summon us no more. He says the boy's country mad, and the only thing to do is to get him into the country. But there, I can't manage it. My man don't get good money enough for us to go out of the town. I can't afford to board him out. Barring his playing truant, he's as good a little 'un as ever walked, and handy in the house; there, my little girl isn't half so sharp. But I am that worried over him. Times I've almost wished he were a bit feeble-minded or a cripple, or 'tooberculor,' as they say, then he'd get plenty of attention and country air and things to his heart's content. It do seem a shame somehow as my boy and others' boys who is all right, but wants a little of what they calls in the papers hindividual attention, can't get it. My man is always goin' on about it. How can any teacher, he says, get the best out o' a boy or a girl when they have sixty in a class? It may do for some to be taught in a bunch, but it don't do for others, and Joey's one of them. Now, if he was, as I said, feeble-minded or a cripple, why the eddication folk would spare no pains about him. He'd have the chance of learnin' two or three trades in school, and they'd take no end of trouble wi' his lessons. Ever been to any of they special schools? My word! ain't they fitted up! Why, when I went up to Sherbourne-road school for cripples and softies along o' Mrs. White, whose Tommy is a hunchy, the teacher told us the fittings of the school cost more nor three times what they cost in a ordinary school. Why, for the poor little 'uns ther' as is really idiots, God help 'em, they've got toys! Why, one of they toys would have sent my children wild wi' joy! And a special teacher to show them poor little wretches how to play! And, Lord luv yer, why they would 'a bin just as happy wi' a bucket o' sand and a spoon what had cost nothin'. Shockin' to look at some of 'em were', no hair and flat-headed. It seemed cruel for 'em to be alive. An' I couldn't help thinking of my Joey and lots of other boys and girls in these streets—all sound, what never had no toys in their lives. Well, I suppose the Lord knows best! But Joey, he's bin over to the open-air school at Uffculme, and he's always on about it. 'If I was ill, Mummy,' he says, 'I'd get sent out there. Can't I ketch a cold?' he says, and he went and set under the water tap in the yard, and drenched hisself. But he didn't take no harm. He's hardy enough—but there, he'd have the time of his life if he wer' wasting or at all inclined to the consumption. Such a boy, too, as he is for sun and sky, bless the lad. He don't see much o' either in these streets. But he'll lay on his back in the yard, times again, a-staring at what sky he can see, and the sun do come into this little room in the mornin'. 'I can't see no sky, Mum,' he says, 'in my class-room, and the sun don't never shine in.' Why at Uffculme they've three sides of the class-rooms glass winders like, so that they children have sky an' sun all round 'em. And each child has his desk to fit him, and lessons only half-an-hour at a time, and then a change. The children get hindividual care there. And there's a grand open place and trees all round, and then a park all wild like, with birds and flowers and a pond. My Joey, he'd be mad with joy. He'd learn his lessons all right if he wer' there. The children is fed there, too, not but that the mothers pay something, but that don't cover the cost, I know. Real good food they get. Why can't my Joey, who's been crying his heart out for the country and the birds and flowers, have something like that for his school? 'Prevention is better nor cure' any day, and it don't seem to me right not to treat boys and girls as is sound as well as they treat delicate ones. If the well children had all the advantages of they feeble-minded and tooberculor ones, there wouldn't be so many fall ill."

Mrs. Peacock ran her knitting needle fiercely into her hair.

"Steady, my son," she called out, as Joey entered staggering under the weight of a large jar filled with water. He placed it on the table, and started with fingers quick with love to arrange his flowers in it; feathery meadow-sweet all round the edge, then foxgloves. Presently he stopped, sighed, and placing his hand on the small of his back gazed pathetically at his mother.

"Billy Jones says the water-lilies be out all over the pond at Uffculme, and he seed a blue dragon-fly. I've got an awful drefful pain in the spine of me back, Mummy; do'ee think the doctor would send me over ther' to school?"

LITERARY STUDIES.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

A SLENDER figure in an old brown coat rambled the streets of London in the last decade of the nineteenth century with a head full of dream and song. He walked the crowded highways seeing and hearing things which others missed, and, in the inner silence, waited expectantly till they should be reborn as poesy.

The trembling air of this attentiveness hovers over many a line and verse, enriching them with thoughts and images that are but dimly indicated though stirred in the reader's mind. The delicate touch of the mystical poet is everywhere felt, light and lovely as the fingers of dawn. It is little he brings as a whole; small volumes of brief songs beside the royal libraries of Shakespeare, Milton, and Shelley. This ruined Orpheus, who could have flung eternal sunlight through the halls of hell, or breathed a soul into the listening beasts, has left us, through lack of health, self-mastery, and means to live, only fragments of starry untold dreams. But these beginnings—bird-like, lyrical—enshrine the spirit that was Francis Thompson. In them he is seen again, wandering along the noisy thoroughfares with the large eyes of a seer and interpreter, peering out through the thin vesture of poverty, while his lips murmur lines of rhythmic beauty. He is the mystic singer of his generation, bringing a poet's priceless gift—sight for the blind.

A century of material conquests, devoted to law and order, to science, inventions, trade and politics, had sailed indifferently over deeps where lay such pearls as Shelley and Keats, and had well-nigh transmuted Tennyson and Browning into metaphysical disputants. But the apostolic succession of dreamers is immortal; it is a spirit clothing itself now in one name, now in another; and in due time it flowed through Thompson. He came from the shadowy aisles of the Roman Church, the first of her English poets since the seventeenth century. There was no drawing him into the materialism of the practical century, nor into the controversies of science and religion, for he started out with the child-like faith of a Catholic to whom life is far from being either commonplace, scientific, or theological. His was a world of symbol and beauty, in whose sensuous images he only saw the fleeting vision of spiritual loveliness. The very Church itself was but translucent mystery, with nothing of the etched austerity that attracts the scholastic and the priest.

Thompson felt the beauty of Rome, the romance which is the vitalising essence of her long strange history: he knew her symbols, not as most do, merely by name, but in all their poetical and spiritual significance. What he received from her he poured forth again the richer for being steeped in the dyes of his own contemplative imagination. Nothing had a purely objective value: it had to be assimilated; only when it had become part of himself, tinted with the delicate shades of his own experience, could he give it out again with freedom and delight. He was a still lake of emotions and thoughts, receiving reflections of the outer world that were as evanescent as clouds, and which melted into his being to reappear as poetic opals. The outcome is not so much a body of clear shaped ideas as a Corot landscape of thought, its pearl-grey and iridescent soul. There is very little of simple description in all his writing, for everything that came to his eyes from nature, man or the Church, entered the courts of memory and waited there for the deep meaning that could alone consecrate it into poetry as he conceived that art. The most ancient symbols of the Roman Church are charged with a fresh beauty when he uses them, and go forth with an appeal to men of every faith, being no longer elements of an isolated religion, but fraught with that universal life which thrills all symbolism, and recognises no fundamental difference between the flight of a gull and the flight of a thought.

He has the leisure of a poet who dwells in the timeless region of the Spirit, expressing himself with the same careful elaborate patience that preceded the verse itself. He does not set out to give idle pleasure by the passing of an hour with a tale, but appeals to the quiet reader to whom poetic ideals are of inestimable worth, stimulating mind and imagination to the highest reaches of spiritual life. Painting in words, he has an unusual mastery of his medium, responsive to every refinement of tone but excelling in his handling of the luminous mists of impalpable dream that recall his beloved Shelley. His curious vocabulary repels the many but haunts the few. Many of his unusual and thought-heavy words are of his own finding in ancient sources, for philology was a handmaiden always happy in serving the poet. The tilled soil of his memory often surprises us, by the turning up of antique gems of far off origin—Anglo-Saxon, Latin, or Greek—some golden cup, or figured amphora, to hold songs of wine. From deep seas of strange reading come rare lovely shells murmurous of their old weird home.

He prays in a Gothic nave, but his language is of all religions, drawing its colour from Greece and India, as easily as from Rome, with quaint touches added of colloquial London, so that the gift he brings to the altar is a poesy rich with remembered hints of many faiths. He draws from every firmament of the devotees some star to set in a crown wrought for the Queen of Heaven, who may be Mary, Artemis, or Astarte, and when he dreams of crowning divine womanhood with this circle of living gems it is impossible to think of him in terms of one religion or one age. He is as pagan as any Greek, as Christian as any Catholic. It is a wonderful world Thompson sees, a universe in solution—outwardly solid, still, immutable; inwardly alive with movement and power, typified in the molecular vibration of a rock, or in a poet's life, with its ceaseless emotions, its giving, receiving, feeling, dreaming, while the common people see only a somewhat less than ordinary man. It is a world mysteriously inter-related, manifold yet one, wherein great and small are discarded standards, fit only for mathematicians. Every trifle is significant, and the mighty is in league with the least; a fallen word can wreck an empire, and the plumed feet of angels tread the grapes of earthly song.

To the new eyes of thee
All things by immortal power
Near or far,
Hiddenly,
To each other link'd are,
That thou canst not stir a flower
Without troubling of a star.

Everywhere in this anomaly of secret order and apparent confusion, so that none can name the frontiers of matter and spirit, the imagined and the imageless. Standing on the Embankment, leaning on its granite balustrade, Thompson is soon looking out over the golden ramparts of heaven beneath which flows the river of human life. Seeming to be in the Strand he is really in Paradise: seeing in every careworn face an angel of pain or sympathy: and nothing is more natural than to meet the Magdalen there.

One is always in doubt, though it is a delicious doubt, as to whether the poet is on earth or in heaven. When he writes "Love in Dian's Lap" he blends prayer with a lover's reverence, never sure of any difference between Mary and Dian. The face of one who had shown such tender loving care for him who deemed himself too deeply stained for heaven's high company was easily confused with that of the divine mother. She is his earth-born goddess, so far above him in the sweet purity of her love that his speech turns natively to prayer, and a temple incense pervades the pensive gratitude of his heart. Similar marriage of heaven and earth is seen in his picture of the woman of the future. It is fragmentary, a dream on the wing, that escapes, leaving only feather tips in the hand. In it the after woman is seen using all her power of betrayal still, only she is leading men to bliss instead of unhappiness.

O what shall you not, sweet, do?
The celestial traitress play,
And all mankind to bliss betray:
With sacrosanct cajoleries
And starry treachery of your eyes
Tempt us back to paradise!
... In all men's hearts shall be
The seeing and the prophecy.
For ended is the Mystery Play,
When Christ is life and you the way.
But here my lips are still,
Until
You and the hour shall be revealed.

His inspiration would seem to spring from the Hebrew poets, the psalmists and prophets who naturally interweave the words of God with the harps and swords, the poverties and the thrones of men. Certainly he is of their band in his fearless acceptance of life's contradictions and inconsistencies: with any Ezekiel he can say, "Mine eyes saw not, and I saw."

In the crowd of vigorous and successful men, shouldering and elbowing each other on the road to the dark mines of mammon, a seer like Thompson will be a puzzling anomaly, a thin strange voice that utters hidden parables. But there are subtle beauties in the speech that linger in the memory, provoking troublous thoughts of high desire long since put aside—and the thoughts may stir the past visions to life again, and time justify the poet.

I hang 'mid men my needless head,
And my fruit is dreams, as theirs is bread:
The goodly man and the sun-hazed
sleeper
Time shall reap; but after the reaper
The world shall glean of me, me the sleeper!

Love! I fall into the claws of Time:
But lasts within a leaved rhyme
All that the world of me esteems—
My withered dreams, my withered dreams.

He may not always have recognised the power of his dreams, and probably sang them simply as the bird sings, with no thought of the listeners. But the power was there, the magic by which the sense-bound world could be dissolved into pure light, joy, life, and poesy. This is the paradoxical atmosphere of the mystic who, listening, hears no voice from the mother of the world

Yet unforgetting,
The ravished soul her meanings knew,
Mine ears heard not and I heard.

When earth is so near heaven in every moment of a man's life there is nothing but contempt for logic and common sense—the marvel to the poet is that every one does not intuitively see the beauty of the half-veiled mystery, and walk the commonest highway with timorous, reverent footsteps. Spirit is everywhere, shining through substance; with surprises always at hand: a wisp of cloud becomes a flying angel; we touch the face of God before we are aware of Him.

O world invisible we view thee,
O world intangible we touch thee,
O world unknowable, we know thee,
Inapprehensible, we clutch thee!
The drift of pinions would we harken,
Beats at our own clay-shuttered doors.
The angels keep their ancient places:—
Turn but a stone and start a wing!
'Tis ye, 'tis your estrangèd faces,
That miss the many-splendoured thing:

So easy is it for the seeing eye to behold
Jacob's ladder

Pitched between heaven and Charing Cross.

In the Orient Ode, where he has praised the sun, as only a worshipper of that orb could praise, recognising too its gifts to man, he is suddenly overcome with wonder as he perceives the godhood of light, and realises that the sun, Horus, and Christ, may all be one.

Ay, if men say that in all high heaven's face

The saintly signs I trace
Which round my stoled altars hold their solemn place,

Amen, Amen! For oh, how could it be,—
When I with wingèd feet had run
Through all the windy earth about,
Quested its secret of the sun,
And heard what things the stars together shout!

This is a fundamental truth of existence, the One present in all things, taking a thousand shapes and names. It is the deifying of the universe, by which the veil of substance grows thinner and thinner till matter is seen to be luminous spirit radiating beauty. When our heart goes out to that which is beautiful we are conscious of a longing for the source of its beauty. Somewhere, far out of sight, it must be one with beauty itself, the loveliness that has enchanted man from the first, and that clothes itself as easily in a smile as in a dawn-pink mountain-top. In that desire we touch divinity, seeing with eyes that are earlier than creation itself, and when we come to build we find ourselves pursuing designs already breathed into the essence of our being: we cannot escape the all-pervading Alpha. What we make has existed already in thought:—

Our towns are copied fragments from our breast;

And all man's Babylons strive but to impart

The grandeurs of his Babylonian heart.

The only direction Thompson can give towards this mystical reading of earth is to quote from himself; he at least knows how close at hand is the secret of apprehension which any moment may reveal—

Learn to dream when thou dost wake,
Learn to wake when thou dost sleep,
Plough thou the rock until it bear.

But in perceiving the one underlying reality that links all externals,

The world above in the world below
(And a million worlds are but as one),
And the One is all,

Thompson's mysticism leads, as we have seen, to some Heinesque confusions: apparent opposites mingle easily in him: Moses and Sappho, the Hesperides and Eden, Sinai and Parnassus, Ariadne's laurel and the crucifix carved from its wood. And there is occasionally that touch of humour which breaks out in the Catholic mystic as we see in the Fioretti of St. Francis, in the legends told by Irish peasants, and wherever there is intimate familiarity with the things of God. It is almost the happy anthropomorphism of childhood, which can say quite naturally—"God loves to jest," "God whistle thee to heel," or "When thou to thee pluckest down the neck of God."

The mystic is continually transmuting terrestrial and celestial: the vision of the one is arrayed in the force of the other. Images, metaphors, similes, are native and inherent to him, helping him to personify or visualise everything, providing shape and substance for the eyes of the mind. He does not merely decorate his pages with these illuminated capitals, nor simply find a pleasure in the pictures themselves. He is for ever reading through the things seen, and changing the significance back again into the thing. As Thompson has written of Shelley, the enchanted child:—"The universe is his box of toys. He is gold dusty with tumbling amidst the stars. He makes bright mischief with the moon. He dances in and out of the gates of heaven. Its floor is littered with his broken fancies. He runs wild over the fields of ether." And elsewhere, "He plays truant from earth, slips through the wicket of fancy into heaven's meadow, and goes gathering stars." Thompson revels in this same wildplay that has so deep a meaning. Take the Orient Ode. It overflows with metaphor. A Parsee might envy the sacramental handling of sunrise as keenly as a Catholic, although the latter alone would fully understand the symbolism of the opening passage, when the day as priest begins Benediction. Each of the separate services of the sun is enumerated in lovely figures, and the pagan joie de vivre in Thompson breaks out in the vision of the sun, as lover, wooing the Earth, as maid, who—

Secret views herself afraid,
Till flatteries sweet provoke the charms
they swear,

And so the love which is thy dower
Gives back to thee in sanctities of flower:
And holy odours do her bosom invest,
And sweeter grows for being prest.

Or looking through his sensitive poems on children, in which he sees the mirrors of some lost and irrecoverable dawns of his own life, see how as in the "Making of Viola," all heavenly creativeness flows symbolically into the birth of a child: Young Jesus scoops the wood-brown pools of Paradise for her eyes, Lord Paraclete breathes the soul, and child angels drop their rosy bloom on her cheeks. Elsewhere, in his magnificent way, he beholds the earth, at autumn, swing as a thurible before the throne of God, sending up

Folds of the blanched amiced cloud, or there comes to him a vision of eternity, not as the pale formless void of general thought, but as a strong, eternal structure built of the mighty battlements discerned in glimpses, against which the storms of time can only "roll, break, and form again."

In the Assumpta Maria Catholic and pagan imagination meet, metaphors pouring forth. Mary is Daniel's mystic mountain, or Danae of the shower of gold, or a breathing Eden; lines of imagery are added as the great masters give tint upon tint, for the building up of what seems at last but one rich full colour. The reader comes from the poem with a mind full of mingled memories of things seen, that interchange continually, as recollections after the first visit to a foreign land.

The Ode to the Setting Sun is another poetic symbol, woven of sun and crucifix. The slanting rays light up the cross in the convent garden, and, with the sun as emblem of life, the poet sees its finger pointing to pain and the cross as the key of human existence. Dawn and sunset, sunset and dawn, are the symbols of that life; while the cross, shining in heaven's splendour, is on earth but a shadow, though its darkness leads to light.

Whatever Thompson saw became musical to him with the mysteries of Paradise, filled with the tones of unseen glories, or shadowed with the darkening fears of the soul. He can lose consciousness in the joy that thrills him as his dreaming eyes peer into the heart of a flower. Or, leaning low over the silent earth, asking the eternal questions of life and death, their meaning, and their worth, he can whisper in her ear sad tender reproach—

Mother of mysteries,
Sayer of dark sayings in a thousand tongues,

Who bringest forth no saying yet so dark
As we ourselves, thy darkest!

Born of her he cannot bring himself to look upon her from without, for he is too intimately her own. There is a nervous consciousness of co-vitality whenever he speaks of her, making him unusually sensitive to nature. To think of her "Titanian primal liturgy" is to be spurred to filial song himself, and poems grow in him as living things in her:—

As earth, ere blossoming, thrills
With fair daffodils,
And feels her breast turn sweet
With the unconceived wheat.

Like Browning's Paracelsus he is in birth-right unity with her.

I in their delicate fellowship was one.
I knew how the clouds arise.

I was heavy with the even
When she lit her glimmering tapers
Round the day's dead sanctities.
I laughed in the morning's eyes.
I triumphed and I saddened in all weather.

Heaven and I wept together.

One phase of nature seems never to have been open to him, though in it, perhaps, is her most mysterious sphere of images. From immemorial days swirling waters have been the living beryl of the seer. But who shall say from his poems that Thompson ever escaped from the prisoning inland to watch the sea? Poverty appears to fence him within a limited round of experiences. We look in vain for the treasures he might have drawn from the blue deeps, the infinity of symbolic hints of human life. We may only surmise what he would have brought us from those boundless waters, gleaming with unfathomable tints, that join earth and sky, white with the rage of greed and foam of hate, awful with destiny's engulfing waves, or, on the sunlit days, glinting with showers of stars, that flash their instant life and death like thoughts and man.

There is a priesthood of poesy, and Thompson was of that order. They have learned to sing through fire and pain. They have passed many days, as Thompson did, in that melancholy atmosphere of disease, and poverty and utter weakness which is the world's parallel of John of the Cross's Dark Night of the Soul. "Pierced with thorns which formed no crown, a poet hopeless of the bays, a martyr hopeless of the palm," as Thompson wrote of Mangan, the Irish poet; this have they all felt in desperate moments when they were slowly learning how

From spear and thorn alone
May be grown

For the front of saint or singer, any divinising twine.

"The harvest waves richest over the battlefields of the soul"; we read in the essay on Shelley, "The heart, like the earth, smells sweetest after rain."

Such poets are both priest and sacrifice, and seeming never to lose the sacerdotal solemnity of thought-laden song, they roll rich cadences. When they walk in the temple of Apollo it is always with a saintly gravity. Hardly conscious of the joys and commonplaces of ordinary men, their whole life is an art. They master their movements, gestures, speech; and are as consciously clad in amice, alb, and chasuble as any priest. We read their books, if we would master them, in something of a subdued and solemn mood, accompanied only by silence. Then the resonant lines linger in our minds, as a rhythmic liturgy, and our lips repeat the imperial words as though they were part of a sacred office.

Cast wide the folding doorways of the East.

The world's unfolded blossom smells of God.

The stars still write their golden purposes.

Somewhere at the edge of a far stretching wood I once sat and read the "Hound of Heaven." Golden sunshine of late autumn lay all that afternoon upon the sleeping fields and low hillsides. Like cloud shadows filled with living spirits, the poet's thoughts played in the sunlight, fading at the end of every verse, gently and regretfully, to the refrain of the patient footfalls of heavenly love. Pain, sorrow, human sin, laughing childhood, Pan with his pipes and gladness—I seem to recall each of the shades gliding out from the printed page and melting that day into sunlight. And I fancy now it was one of the dearest visions life can bring. For on that radiant day I felt I knew how the joys and sorrows of life cannot drive us faster than the feet of love pursue—love that is greater than life. Only a priest-poet could have wrought that.

EDGAR DAPLYN.

MR. C. E. MAURICE writes from Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead:—"We are thinking of preparing a memoir of my sister-in-law, Miss Octavia Hill. Will you allow me to ask any friends of Miss Hill who may have letters in their possession suitable for such a memoir to send them to me, as by Miss Hill's wish I am to act as editor, in concert, of course, with my sisters-in-law?"

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

T. WERNER LAURIE:—The Cathedrals and Churches of Rome and Southern Italy: T. Francis Bumpus. 16s. net.

THE CRYSTAL PRESS:—Life Understood: F. L. Rawson. 7/6 net.

MESSRS. W. RIDER & SON:—The Rake's Progress: Marjorie Bowen. 2/- net.

The Religious Aspect of the Women's Movement. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Cornhill Magazine, The Contemporary Review, The Burden of Protection (July).

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

THE problem of the survival of consciousness after death has ever loomed large on the mental horizon of humanity; it is the question of questions which has exercised the human mind throughout the ages and one the interest of which never flags. It represents one of the great riddles of existence of which the key has not yet been found, and perchance may never be.

Is our present life the real life or does it represent but a passing episode in a deeper, fuller life where our real individuality lies, and which endures from eternity to eternity, or are we but little points of consciousness dotting the great sea of universal life, from which we arose and unto which we shall return when our little cycle, during the course of which we are privileged to catch a fleeting glimpse of nature's passing show, is completed? Is there a survival of personal consciousness after death? That is the real point at issue. When death overtakes the individual and the complex cells of the brain are broken down and resolved into their ultimate elements, do life and consciousness cease to exist, or may we regard life as something transcending a synthesis of the inorganic energies, something more than a manifestation of the chemical and physical forces inherent in the living protoplasm? In other words, is the human brain but the instrument through which life is manifested, such manifestation being possible only so long as the instrument remains intact. It has been said that the brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile, but such a view can hardly be maintained although it may be correct to regard thought and consciousness as functions of the brain. Consciousness in some form must have existed previous to the development of the most elementary form of brain structure. Although we find no anatomically differentiated nervous system in such lowly organisms as the protozoa, it is very generally admitted that their protoplasm contains a diffused nervous system. It would, for instance, be just as unreasonable to deny some elementary form of consciousness to a protozoan because the organism has no brain as to deny that it can digest because it possesses no stomach. Again, the law of the conservation of energy teaches that while energy may undergo many transformations the sum total remains a constant quantity. This is true so far as our limited experience goes; but apart from this it is impossible to conceive of anything being utterly destroyed, as passing away into nothingness, just as it is equally impossible to conceive the idea of creation out of nothing. The conception of the eternity of matter and force is also, in the last analysis, equally unthinkable. But if nothing passes absolutely out of existence it is clear that persistence is in one sense assured, but is it in a form which will satisfy the human craving for continuity? Have we any warrant for regarding life and consciousness as other than potential in the primordial elements? The real issue involves the question whether consciousness endures in such a form as to ensure the preservation of the personal identity of the individual. It is somewhat difficult to see how this can be. Presumably consciousness has been developed on this planet in relation to existing conditions, and assuming for the moment the existence of an ego which persists, that is, which survives the decay of the physical body, it would, if translated to a different plane, have to develop a fresh form of consciousness in relation to the changed conditions. With the passing of the old state of consciousness all memory of former conditions would be obliterated, and the taking on of the new consciousness would thus for all practical purposes imply the annihilation of the former personality. The ego might persist, but it would be clothed with a fresh personality, thus involving the paradox that while we persist we are yet annihilated. Continued existence implies pre-existence, but we have no experience, no memory of any former state of existence. Thus while the ego might persist, consciousness in that form which concerns us here and now would be obliterated with the destruction of the brain, and although a fresh form of consciousness might be developed in harmony with the changed conditions, the personal identity would be lost, which in other words means that for all practical purposes death spells annihilation.

The test of survival is persistence of consciousness, and persistence of consciousness is dependent upon memory, so that ultimately the true test of survival is narrowed down to memory. But if it be true that our faculties are developed in accordance with our needs, and only in so far as they are of use to us under existing conditions, it becomes difficult to see how memory of present conditions could be serviceable in another existence where conditions might be totally different. And if memory be obliterated it is evident that individuality in the narrower sense of the term is for all practical purposes, annihilated. But are we not obsessed by the idea of individuality? Is not the conception of individuality something of a delusion imposed upon us by the limitations of the physical body, or, if we may so express it, by the outer casing through which flows, and within which for a time is imprisoned a portion of the universal life force which finds expression through the medium of the brain and becomes subject to the limitations imposed by the material organ. The question has arisen as to whether that limited portion of the mind represented by the field of consciousness is our true life or whether the latter is not something far larger and more comprehensive than we have any idea of. Much evidence corroborative of this point of view is found in the operations of the subconscious mind. Man does not always act by the light of reason. At certain crises there is not time for reason to act, but the subconscious mind would then seem to take command and impel to a course of action which we frequently call instinctive. In the case of sudden accident, for instance, the subconscious mind appears to gather up the whole situation in a flash, and action follows quite irrespective of the slower working of reason. It is suggestions such as these that impel to the conception of a richer life, of a more extended individuality than that covered by the limited area of consciousness.

There sometimes flashes across the field of consciousness an instantaneous perception of the oneness underlying all phenomena, a recognition of individual persistence in all living forms, a conviction that in the great stream of cosmic life the individual self endures amid all changes of outward forms and conditions. Such an intuition may be but momentary, but it leaves an ineffaceable impress upon the mind and affords a fleeting vision of a larger existence apart from that of ordinary sense perception. Here then one seems to see the break-up of that narrower sense of individuality by which we are cribbed, cabined and confined, and a linking up of all life in the ultimate conception of the world life and world soul. The term "cosmic consciousness" is used by Dr. Bucke to indicate certain aspects of these strange psychic phenomena, and cosmic consciousness he regards as a higher form of consciousness than that possessed by the ordinary man. He who experiences cosmic consciousness receives an intellectual enlightenment or illumination which places him on a new plane of existence. He experiences "a sense of immortality, a consciousness of eternal life, not a conviction that he shall have this, but the consciousness that he has it already." Of direct evidence of the survival of consciousness at death there is none, but on the other hand science can adduce no convincing proof that death means annihilation. It is rather a flashes of intuitional insight that we must trust to bring conviction that the soul of man is immortal, and in the last analysis belief in the survival of personal consciousness after death must resolve itself into a supreme act of faith.

EDMOND JOHN HUNT.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE CINEMATOGRAPH IN EDUCATION.

SIR,—You refer in your last issue, in "Notes and Jottings," to the use of the cinematograph for teaching purposes in schools. This is sure to come eventually, but at present the apparatus is not sufficiently safe or simple for use, except by experts. Being strongly impressed with its educational value, I was enabled to make some experiments last winter, the success of which may possibly induce some of our friends in other towns to follow on the same track. You cannot at present take the cinematograph to schools; then take the school classes to the cinematograph.

We have in Ipswich an excellent picture house which seats about 500. The proprietors kindly allowed me to give a number of experimental lectures on natural history subjects at certain advertised hours, notice of which was sent to various schools. The result was that we had packed audiences at the usual prices of admission, sixpence and a shilling, and scores were turned away for want of room.

My method was to describe the specimens, their construction and habitat, with the use of about twenty ordinary lantern slides, followed then by special cinematograph films which the proprietors obtained. Most of these were indeed excellent, and it was a real pleasure to lecture on them. The lectures should be "chatty" and especially prepared for children; the "grown ups" quite appreciate them in their simplicity. Lectures should not exceed half an hour; the audience can then remain and enjoy the rest of the varied programme. I have been strongly pressed to continue this method during the coming winter, and hope to do so if time permits.

—Yours, &c.,

FRANK WOOLNOUGH,
Curator of the Ipswich Museum and Free Library.

Ipswich, August 26, 1912.

PRAYERS FOR CHILDREN.

SIR,—On this subject I would like to call to remembrance Coleridge's "Child's Evening Prayer":—

Ere on my bed my limbs I lay,
God grant me grace my prayers to say.
O God! preserve my mother dear
In health and strength for many a year;
And O preserve my father too,
And may I pay him reverence due;
And may I my best thoughts employ
To be my parents' hope and joy;
And O preserve my brothers both
From evil doings and from sloth,
And may we always love each other,
Our friends, our father, and our mother.
And still, O Lord, to me impart
An innocent and grateful heart,
That after my last sleep I may
Awake to Thy eternal day!

Yours, &c.,

G. H. VANCE.

Porthwin, 12, North-hill, Highgate, N.,
August 25, 1912.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the letter by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland on the subject of "Bed-time Prayers for Children."

The prayers given therein are certainly an improvement upon the old "Now I lay me," &c., so far as sentiment is concerned, but many—indeed, most—of them are not truly prayers at all: they are statements of facts. Also, there is not one of them that rises above a thought of personal interest in its petition. Even granted that some children are purely selfish little animals, is it well to encourage this selfishness by ignoring the thought of others in the earliest prayers, which will surely be a sacred memory all through life?

I venture to submit a few short verses of prayers. The first is for a very young child only; the second is also for a very young child, but is more comprehensive in wording; and the third is for the child who is facing life's responsibilities with the beginning of schooldays.

I.

Dear Father, I would thank Thee
For all this happy day.
Help me to-morrow to be good,
And bless me while I pray.

II.

Dear Father, bless me while I kneel
And make me do the right;
And bless all other little ones
That pray to Thee to-night.
Dear Father, bless my parents, too,
And bless all those I love,
And make us all sleep happily
Till morning shines above.

III.

Dear God, I come with thanks to Thee
For all Thy love to-day,
That guarded me and guided me
Both in my work and play.
Dear Father, give me happy sleep
Till morning wakes again:
My mother, father, and my friends,
Keep them from care and pain.

Dear God, all good things I enjoy
Come every day from Thee.
Let me be kind to everyone
As Thou art kind to me.

May I also add the following little verses? They are not suggested as a model prayer for a child. They are rather the prayer of a child—a child's thought, that is—the purely personal petition of a wilful, rebellious, imaginative child, struggling hard after goodness:—

I bless Thee for Thy goodness, God,
Bless Thou my goodness, too,
For what Thou dost so easily
Is hard for me to do.

It is so hard to do the right,
So easy to do wrong,
Dear God, bless me with stronger light
To help the fight along.

Then when I come each night to Thee
At every set of sun
To bless Thee for Thy goodness, God,
Say Thou to me "Well done!"

Yours, &c.,
E. CLEPHAN WATSON.

UNITARIAN MINISTERS AND THE INSURANCE ACT.

SIR,—The Commissioners have now given their decision in response to the application made by me, as Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in respect to ministers whose salaries are under £160 a year. It is as follows:—"That the employment of a Unitarian minister on the terms set out in the application, at a rate of remuneration not exceeding £160 a year, is not employment within the meaning of the National Insurance Act."

Will you please make this decision known through the columns of THE INQUIRER, and oblige yours faithfully,

W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall, London,
August 21, 1912.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

AMONG THE BIRDS IN AUGUST.

II.

"THE wettest and gloomiest August I can remember." That is how one person after another describes this month. Girls and boys who hoped to almost live out of doors, as they did last year in August, have had to make the best of sopping fields, muddy lanes, and dripping woods. Many a picnic or mountain climb has been planned one day to be abandoned the next. The waterfalls have had it all their own way, and have been worth tramping far to see.

Have any of you felt as if it were of no use to look for birds in such a gloomy season? Or perhaps you have looked, and have seen so few, and those so indistinctly, that you have in despair given up trying to recognise those you know something of, or to learn to know fresh ones. Much depends on how you look. Not many days ago two people stood by a fence and looked through slight drizzle into a field full of long swathes of cut hay beginning to turn brownish through much soaking. "No birds there," said one. "Let us look longer and we may see some," said the other. And look they did—carefully, slowly, along the swathes. By the end of three minutes they had seen five tree pipits and one meadow pipit, some moving slowly over the hay, others standing still. To give further proof that you can find birds on very dull days if you look with care and patience, I will tell you what success I had when spending an hour and a half on August 10 in a wood not a mile from the beautiful Lodore waterfall, which Southey made famous by his poem "How does the water come down at Lodore?" I reached the wood at three o'clock. The day had been sunless, and rain fell gently at intervals. The only favourable condition for bird study was the absence of wind. The stillness allowed even faint sounds to be distinctly heard. The "lit-it-it-it" of robins was the first and most frequent sound. The loud flap of a rather bony wing told me that a wood pigeon was near. As it passed through an oak tree nothing was seen of it but the general outline, no colour, not even the white bar on the neck could be distinguished, but the broad fan-like tail and the noisy flap of the wings left no doubt as to its being a wood pigeon. Leaning on a wall under a huge and wide-spreading sycamore, whose lowest boughs overhung the lake, I stopped to look for other birds. On a first slow glance all around not a feather was noticed. Another and much slower gaze revealed a tiny creature creeping about a twig, busily hunting for insects. It was about four inches long, had a short neck, and was feeding upside down. A tit—but which kind? Not a blue tit, for the head was not flat enough. It must be either a cole tit or a marsh tit. A movement brought it out of deep shade into comparative light, when at once a white spot on the back of its neck proclaimed it a cole tit. This bird had, like all the other tits, a pair of white cheeks, but the white spot on the nape distinguished it from the marsh tit, which is very much like it. More close-scanning of the branches and a silent and motionless greenfinch was recognised by its size, build, and very thick bill. Next a sort of gentle flutter, as of a scrap of loose bark on the massive trunk of the sycamore. But the scrap moved upwards with a progress that was half creep, half jerk, and now and again strayed a few inches to right or left while steadily keeping a general upward trend—never so much as a look downward. The moving thing had a coat of very smooth feathers, a long bill—long, that is, for its size, a good deal curved, and with a fine tip; the tail was rather long and formed of stiff feathers, which the bird used as a fulcrum or prop when climbing. From tip of tail to tip of bill it measured but some five inches. In a sort of stealthy silence it worked its upward way, poking the long delicate bill into crevices in the bark and extracting now an insect, now a wind-blown seed. "Excelsior" is the tree creeper's motto. It never creeps earthward, but when the top of the tree or highest part of an upward tending bough is reached it flies either to the bottom of the same tree, or of one close by, and begins the same steady climb over again. So busy is it that it lets the observer come within two or three yards if he is very quiet, but let him make a sudden movement, and immediately the bird works its spiral way round to the other side of the trunk and remains hidden. By the time my tree creeper had climbed so high that I had to throw my head back to see it, the sky had become a little less clouded, and the slight increase of light enabled me to see the bright yellow colour of the under parts of a bird which flew through the sycamore crying "Chiz-zic, chiz-zic!" This bird was one often taken for a yellow wagtail, but it was a grey wagtail, a bird nearly an inch longer than the former and rather more active and restless. The sharpness of the alarm note was proof enough of the nearness of a nest, or of young birds. Twenty yards away there was a boat landing; as the wagtail flew towards this it was joined by its mate. The pair alighted on the boards and began to talk to a young one which sat there. They evidently wanted it to fly with them, for they tripped round it, then flew a few yards and returned as if to coax it. They did not say "chiz-zic" to it, but something quite different, and it answered them. An ordinary observer would not have taken it for one of their young ones, for it was not much like them. The fluffiness of its plumage made it appear to be larger in the body than the parents; its colours were far duller and the tail was quite short, too short to wag, but not too short to display—when at last it was induced to fly—the two white outer feathers, a feature by which you are helped to recognise a wagtail even before it is ready to leave the nest. I say "helped" advisedly, because it is not a certain sign, for the pipits, buntings, the skylark, and some other birds have it too, and all show it in flight.

On turning to look once more at my tree creeper I was delighted to see a second working its way up to the first. Two creepers on one tree is a rare sight. Had you been watching these birds with me and had turned from them to look at a coloured picture of one in any bird book, you would probably have exclaimed that these two could surely not be tree creepers because they had dull, brown bodies, and the one in the book was very prettily mottled and barred with yellow and white and reddish brown, and was whitish on the under parts. Well, I used to wonder at the apparent difference between the birds as I saw them on trees and as represented in books, until one day a tree creeper, which had not seen me, alighted on a silver birch on which the sun was shining, and began to climb not two yards from me. Seen thus, against a background of light-coloured bark, and with the sun full on it, I found that the pictures had exaggerated nothing, and that the little climber wore a coat like Joseph's, "of many colours."

Further on, where the wood swept up towards lofty crags, I stood long, hoping to get a sight of the handsome jays—birds with blue-barred wings—which were to be heard screaming harshly above me; but jays shun mankind and love to hide in the tops of tall trees. Space fails me to tell some interesting facts about a baby thrush on a fir bough, and a family of pheasants which I saw in the wood; but enough has been written to convince you that birds can be enjoyed if one does but look carefully among thickly leaved trees on the duller days of August.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS. MEETINGS AT THE HAGUE.

LYING amid the emerald lawns and brilliant flower beds of the Botanical and Zoological Gardens at The Hague, a large assembly hall offered hospitality to the second International Moral Education Congress (August 22 to 27). The environment embraced the charming avenues which overshadowed canals and boulevards, the curiously simple brick churches, the clean-swept streets, the electric tramcars that hummed their way down to the lively beach at Scheveningen, the House in the Wood, where the first Hague Peace Conference was held in 1899, and the walls and towers of the new Palace of Peace, which is to be opened next year. Death had transformed the active devotion of Dr. J. T. Mouton, the President, into a cherished memory which was gratefully recognised in the inaugural address of Mr. R. A. van Sandick, and the concourse of Dutch, English, French, German and American men and women who stood in silent homage to the name of Dr. Mouton presently broke into applause when Mr. Sandick praised the energy, resource and idealism of the Congress-Secretary, Miss Attie G. Dyserinck. Familiar figures who stepped early upon the platform were Professor Sadler, Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University, and Mr. Gustav Spiller, the never-fatigued secretary of the first Congress (1908). The marching orders of the philosophers and teachers who gathered at the four-days' Congress were to consult together on the right treatment, physical and moral, of childhood and adolescence, and to discuss on a basis of equal courtesy accorded to speakers of all denominations of thought and worship. Four volumes* brimmed with material for debate, and a succession of many orators—professors, teachers, inspectors, clergymen, Theosophists, and the rest—maintained a stream of argument, criticism, pleading, affirmation, and negation.

Two sessions were devoted to the clash of views represented mainly by the Secular Ideals of the French schools (l'école laïque) and the Christian tradition and dynamic represented by Dr. Sadler, Catholic priests, Protestant ministers, and denominational teachers. By design or accident, the first item in these debates was the picturesque uprising of an Egyptian, whose red fez symbolised Moslem loyalty, who rapidly sketched for us the ethics of the Koran, and who benevolently closed his speech with the utterance, "Peace be unto you." A few minutes later, a voice proclaimed that the supreme ideal in education was the imitation of Christ, and that this Christ was not a fixed pattern, but an ideal living and energising. But, said an ethical lecturer from Brooklyn, N.Y., there are multitudes who do not accept Christian or other religious doctrines, and who yet desire that their children should possess the common moral heritage of the race. One lady had scarcely expressed her belief that God the Absolute was the true basis of moral education, when another lady claimed that faith in the Supernatural was yielding place to faith in the Natural. A Parisian Positivist breathed the formula of Family, Country, Humanity, and summed up the Religion of Humanity in the motto, "Love for principle, and Order for Basis; Progress for End." To him succeeded the olive-tinted and turbaned delegate from Calcutta, Deva Prasad Sarvadhiary, who courteously reminded the Congress that India possessed spiritual ideals before such conceptions had dawned in Europe. "Morality itself is religion," affirmed Dr. Stanton Coit. Not a mere code of precepts do we need, said M. Gabriel Séailles, but a deep-seated sentiment of respect and affection for human nature. With such miscellaneous estimates of the problem we passed our first morning, and when, at a subsequent session, the controversy was resumed, tempers almost approached heat. M. Ferdinand Buisson, who for thirty years has carried on the advocacy of the French secular system initiated by Jules Ferry, vehemently claimed that morality was based in human nature, and that every heroism could be evolved without the aid of theology. In supporting his thesis, he forgot to obey the bell of the chairman (M. Boutroux), and paced the platform, declaiming rhetorically amid a tempest of both cheers and protests. A Catholic priest followed, declaring that morality was indeed based in human nature, but human nature needed to be interpreted on Divine principles. At this point Mr. Sarvadhiary intervened. In his own Indian country, he said, Moslems and Hindus were divided; he had come to The Hague, hoping to learn the way of educational peace, but he found priests and philosophers engaged in an intellectual war. This appeal of Asia to Europe marked one of the most striking moments of the Congress.

Other sessions were devoted to calmer topics. Dr. Felix Adler, founder of the Ethical Movement, was heard with much interest when he asserted that it was useless to plan moral education for children unless in relation to a plan for all the stages of life, each period having its special opportunities and perils; and the chief object all through should be to develop the intrinsic worth of each personality. Adler's views are stated with fulness in the American volume prepared for the Congress.

The discussions just outlined occupied the Friday and Saturday; and I may be allowed to note by the way that I had the privilege of teaching a class of English children before an audience of Congress members of varied nationalities.

To Monday were allotted the subjects of character-building in institutions outside the field of primary instruction (secondary schools, technical schools, family life, &c.), and to the needs of abnormal children. Cordial salutations greeted a Salvationist woman in the Army costume when she stepped forward to deliver, on Mrs. Bramwell Booth's behalf, a paper in which the mother was described as God's first message to the human soul. An English lady insisted on the indispensable need for discipline of body and mind, her point of view being that of the Duty and Discipline movement favoured by the Earl of Meath and others. Christianity itself, said a speaker, adopts the family form in the conception of a Heavenly Father and the Law of Brotherhood. And, as the discussion wound its way through a variety of English, French and German channels, one felt that the family idea still held firm ground in the modern educational philosophy, in spite of many complaints as to the break-up of household rule and morality. Another section, meanwhile, discussed adolescence. Miss Alice Woods, for instance, confessed that English girls were lacking in independence of thought, and also in mental breadth. They were interested in the Woman Movement, but were apt to narrow their ideas down to the fragmentary issue of the vote. We all should be better for a conception of life which liberated itself from the prejudices of creed and nationality. Everybody smiled when the German gentleman who praised the benefits of Self-government overran his time, despised the chairman's bell, and was upbraided with cries of "Selbstregierung!" Miss Lilli Jannasch observed that school self-rule was a natural preparation of the child's sense of freedom for the responsibilities of municipal administration and the parliamentary system: in short, it should be essentially a training in democracy. Johann Langermann (author of a valuable monograph on the Erziehungstadt) charmed the audience by his breezy and human demand for the liberty of the young soul. Not a machine, but an organism was the child. Fichte said the child was a "piece of the Fatherland"; and Langermann would take the children from wearisome books and benches to the open-air of gardens and to companionship with the animal world. In this enterprise he had found the assistance of women indispensable. The task of developing the nature and powers of the young mind required the combined activities of woman and man. This latter suggestion was happily realised in the closing session of Monday (Tuesday being left for business), when a lady—Madame Tideman—presided over the conference on the training of the delinquent, feeble-minded, deaf and dumb, and blind. She drew a pathetic picture of the prison-house in which a soul dwelt when afflicted with deafness, muteness and blindness, and yet possessed of an intelligence and aptitude for logic if only communication could be set up with normal minds. The subjects of study were the same as in normal schools, said Madame Tideman. In this simple remark was wrapped a whole world of philosophy, for it suggested that one psychology manifested itself in all the types, from the most pitiable imbecile to the profoundest sage. Perhaps in such a principle one may see splendid promises of ever-developing thoughts and methods in future congresses.

* Published by Martinus Nijhoff, The Hague. The volumes contain papers in various languages; the American volume, which was delayed, can be obtained, as can the other four, from Miss A. G. Dyserinck, Bilderdijk-straat, 78, Hague.

Nothing could be more cheering than to hear the many voices—of Chinese educators, of London County Council Inspectors, of Catholic clergy, of Protestant pastors, of French Rationalists and English Salvationists—expressing at least a basic, though necessarily incomplete, harmony of aspiration towards ideals of child-culture and citizenship.

F. J. GOULD.

The Hague, August 26.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Doncaster: Opening of the Free Christian Church Hall.—The opening of the Doncaster Free Christian Church Hall took place last Thursday afternoon, August 22, amid much rejoicing. It was a memorable day in the history of the Free Christian Church, and some stimulating speeches were made. The Rev. P. W. Jones expressed his appreciation of the happiness and unity of his people, their boundless enthusiasm, the entire absence of anything that could be termed "friction," and the geniality and energy of all the church officers. At 3 o'clock Mrs. G. E. Verity, of Leeds, opened the entrance gates, and the little crowd of people who had gathered round entered the new hall. At 3.30 the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Union Congregational Church, Brighton, conducted the opening service, and preached the inaugural sermon. "It is a long time now since prophet souls confidently declared the victory to God and the good," Mr. Williams said. "Still, they do it, as much to-day as ever. When all sorts of wrecks and failures are about them, in their hearts they say: 'We have received a kingdom that cannot be shaken.' The divine assurance of life is that the morning cometh, that the good shall prevail, that righteousness shall be established, and that love shall be the bond of society. The actual experience of the world at any time is that the night also cometh, that this victory is by no means won, that there is enough unrighteousness and selfishness to make a great part of human life a tragedy. Sons of the morning appear; they announce its coming; they work with the utmost devotion to hasten its coming, to win victory for some great cause; they may win the victory even, but it may turn out to be very disappointing. Now I believe this earthly life of ours is only just one among many standards in God's great school. The reason why the world to-day is not as much better than the world of long ago as we could wish is that those who were trained in it have passed on to other lives, to other standards in God's school, and fresh pupils have come here who have to do the work over again, because they need these same lessons that were given to their predecessors. The necessity for this battle is, I think, the reason for the fact that the elements of life's conflict are the same in every age. Those who wrought in past ages for the world's good drew the good into their own souls, and have passed out of great tribulation and washed their robes and made them white in the purifying process of the sacrificial life. Let us glory in tribulation too, and get out of it patience, hope, experience, and a great infilling of the Divine Love. As certain as that there is darkness there is also a conquering light." At the evening meeting the chair was taken by Mr. G. E. Verity (Leeds), and the speakers were the Rev. Charles Hargrove (Leeds) and the Rev. T. R. Williams. Mr. Hargrove delivered an address on the "Past and the Future." Our thoughts and wisdom came out of the past, he said, and our religion too. The old Unitarianism was a thing of the past, but it was out of the courage and fidelity of that little band who had worshipped on the spot where the new hall now stood that this splendid building and all that it stood for had arisen. They revered the past, but their faces were toward the future. The Rev. T. R. Williams delivered a searching address on "The Relation of Christianity to Progress." He frankly admitted that the outstanding principles and qualities of Christianity were not those of Western progress. "It is not," declared Mr. Williams, "hungering and thirsting after righteousness that makes the millionaire." Christianity had too often been crushed by other things, even in the Church. The speaker instanced on this point the attitude of the churches to war. The Christian ideal of life, nevertheless, however ignored, was never dead, and the whole question was whether what we called progress was real progress. The highest type of humanity would be realised when the best in the ideas of the East and the West combined. The time must come when the nations, having developed their great powers, would decide that they must not spend their powers in fighting, but must use them in co-operation. When that day came we should know the spiritual value of the progress we had made. The Rev. P. W. Jones moved a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers. The financial proceeds of the opening services, including special "thank offerings," amounted to just over £120.

Dundee.—The annual meetings of the British Association for the Advancement of Science are to be held this year in Dundee, commencing on September 4. Special services will be held at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, September 8, at 11 a.m. and 6.15 p.m., and the McQuaker Trustees have arranged that these shall be conducted by Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass. There will be a meeting arranged by the Scottish Unitarian Association on Saturday, September 7, when Dr. Crothers will speak on "Religious Education."

Great Hucklow: Commemoration of the Ejection in 1662.—"In the one quiet hour of the week, the hour between the departure and arrival of our merry Holiday Home parties," writes the Rev. C. Peach, "when our village of Great Hucklow resumes its normal calm, we held a service in commemoration of the 2,000 ejected ministers in 1662. Remote as we are from the highways of commerce, we were not even then beyond the reach of the long arm of ecclesiastical tyranny. Two brave men in our High Peak country were counted among the two thousand. One of these, the Rev. Thomas Stanley, was ejected from the living of the neighbouring village of Eyam, and there he eventually died, a victim of the plague which had decimated the village, and which his heroic spirit had inspired the villagers to meet in a manner which has earned for them undying honour. In the presence of this great trial, Stanley and his successor Mompesson were reconciled in the Christian spirit which transcends differences in Church polity; and in the same spirit a memorial has been erected in the Eyam churchyard by modern Churchmen to perpetuate the name and renown of the heroic Stanley. When Stanley was dying he was visited by his loved friend, the Rev. W. Bagshawe, the other of our two sufferers for conscience sake. When Bagshawe was ejected from the living at Glossop, family ties drew him to the centre of the district of which Glossop is on the confines. In Great Hucklow itself he had relations at the Old Hall, where he frequently stayed; but his labours were not limited to one village. He was the Apostle of the Peak, and the whole of this neglected wild moorland country became his parish. Riding through village and hamlet, he delivered his message, gathering such as would hear; and, finally, when the storms had passed, he left half-a-dozen congregations with their own little meeting-houses to attest his labours. Of these congregations two still meet—those in Great Hucklow and Bradwell—and both have held their memorial services. At Great Hucklow, on the Saturday afternoon, there was a gathering representative of every phase of local Nonconformity, gathered from many surrounding villages. The service was conducted by the Rev. C. Peach, and a former Minister, the Rev. R. S. Redfern, gave the address. On the following day there was a crowded congregation at Bradwell, when Mr. Redfern again officiated. During his residence in the Peak Mr. Redfern made a prolonged study of the story of the two congregations and their founder. His addresses, full of local incidence and moving reminiscence, were very deeply appreciated."

Ipswich.—A bazaar and sale of work to reduce the restoration debt of the Friars-street Chapel was held in the grounds of Mr. W. E. Watkins, Willoughby-road, on Wednesday, August 21, under the management of Mrs. Watkins. Mr. Robert Pearce, M.P., was unfortunately prevented by illness from performing the opening ceremony, which was kindly undertaken by his daughter, Mrs. Rook. There was a good attendance, and the takings amounted to £30. The excellent photographs of the chapel were much admired, and met with a good sale. A few remaining copies can be had from Mr. Scopes, 28, Marlborough-road, Ipswich.

London: Essex Church.—Last Sunday commemoration services were held in memory of the ejected clergy who were deprived and silenced by the Act of Uniformity, August 24, 1662. In the morning the Rev. F. K. Freeston preached on "The Glorious Two Thousand," speaking of the abiding significance of the piety which enabled these men of honour to follow the dictates of conscience in an hour of national crisis. In the evening the service was held in Lindsey Hall, so that a number of lantern slides might be shown. In the first place, portraits of many of the heroes of St. Bartholomew's Day were shown, while Mr. Freeston gave many interesting facts regarding the leaders of the Ejection; and afterwards slides were shown of a number of old English Presbyterian chapels, which owe their foundation, directly or indirectly, to ejected clergy. Special hymns were sung, led by the choir of the church, and the service was entered into heartily by a congregation which almost filled the hall.

Manchester: Cross-street Chapel.—The Chapel has recently been painted inside and out, and the electric light installed. Reopening services will be held on September 1, when the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas will begin his ministry in succession to the late Rev. E. P. Barrow. It is further announced that a special service organised by the Provincial Assembly in memory of the 2,000 ejected ministers will be held in the chapel on October 5. Harvest and reunion services will be conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas on October 6, and the anniversary services of the Lower Mosley-street schools on October 20. A welcome party to the new Minister and Mrs. Thomas will be held in the schools on November 2.

Mansfield.—It is with great pleasure that we record the placing of another stained glass window in the Meeting House. The new one adjoins the R. F. Vallance memorial window, and is the gift of Miss Maud Vallance and her brother, Mr. H. C. Vallance. The main subject represents the holy family, with a seated figure of St. Mary holding the infant Christ, behind whom stands St. Joseph. The left-hand side light shows a standing figure of St. Elizabeth holding the infant St. John the Baptist. The lower windows portray the Presentation in the Temple and Jesus among the Doctors; and the two small lights above have cherubs holding scrolls with the words "Faith and Love." The inscription reads:—"To the glory of God, and in memory of George Vallance, who died May 30, 1880; also of May Vallance, his wife, who died June 13, 1890." The window has been executed by Messrs. Geo. F. Gascoyne & Son, of Nottingham, and by the beauty of its design and colouring is a splendid addition to the chapel.

Scarborough: Westborough Church.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, August 25, when the Rev. Ottwell Binns, a former minister, preached morning and evening.

Tenterden.—Special services were held at the Old Meeting House on Sunday, August 25, in celebration of the 250th anniversary of the congregation. Tenterden Old Meeting House is exceptional, if not unique, in the fact that its first two ministers were ejected vicars. The former of the congregation was the Rev. George Hawe, who was ejected from the vicarage of Tenterden. He was succeeded in the ministry by the Rev. Joseph Osborne, who was ejected from the vicarage of the neighbouring parish of Benenden. Both were remarkable men, notable alike for piety and scholarship. Of the career of the former nothing is known beyond the bare facts just recited, but Calamy gives many interesting particulars of the latter. Mr. Osborne, subsequent to his ejection from his vicarage, went to Hatherfield, in Sussex; then to Brighthelmston in the same county. He afterwards preached at Peckham for some time. Then he went to Ashford, and next to Tenterden, where he remained nine years. He spent nine years more at Bearstead, near Maidstone, and finished his course at his old home at Staplehurst, December 28, 1774, aged 85. He was buried in the parish churchyard there. On Saturday last, on behalf of the Tenterden congregation, a wreath of bays was placed upon his tomb by the Rev. H. Rylett.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—The following resolution was passed at the quarterly meeting of representatives of the churches of the Union at Leeds, August 13. Moved by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, seconded by the Rev. W. H. Eastlake, supported by Mr. F. Clayton, and carried, all the members rising:—"That this meeting of the Yorkshire General Committee desire to express to Mr. Chalmers their sympathy with him in the loss he has sustained by the death of his father, who served the Union both as President and Treasurer, and was for many years a valued member of the Committee; and as minister of an ancient and important chapel contributed to maintaining the effectiveness of Unitarian work in the county."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE RECORDS OF AUGUST.

An extraordinarily wet and cold August has driven us all back to that perennial topic of conversation—the weather, and everybody talks as if the present month had beaten the record for general inclemency. But Professor H. R. Mill, director of the British Rainfall Organisation, will not have it that we are experiencing anything much worse than we have had in other years, or that "the ideal fierceness of the August sun and the absence of rain, which make London uninhabitable and the country delectable," are anything more than illusions born of memory and hope. In an article in the Daily Chronicle Professor Mill states that July is the culminating month of the year for temperature, but more than half a century of unbroken daily observations gives an average temperature for the whole of August of 62.3 deg., half of the observed Augusts being cooler than this, while four had a mean temperature below 60 deg. He admits that the present August may, when it is past, come near the bottom of the list for warmth, but it is most unlikely that it will prove the wettest August on record—for London, at least. Up to the 23rd the rainfall had been 2.94 in. The number has, of course, risen since then. The wetter Augusts have had more than 4 in. of rain on six occasions, and more than 5 in. on two. . . . The total for the three summer months of 1878, notwithstanding a very dry July, was 14.97 in. Of this 3.28 in. (more than the present much-maligned month produced in 23 days) fell in an hour and a half on the afternoon of June 23.

THE SELBORNE SOCIETY.

An announcement has been made that a new section to be known as "Antiquities" has recently been formed by the Selborne Society, for the purpose of further promoting the third great object of the Society, namely, "the protection of places and objects of antiquarian interest or natural beauty." Various matters will come within the purview of this section, such as ancient buildings, earthworks, and other historic relics, in addition to coins, weapons, and utensils of all periods. Dr. William Martin, a member of the Selborne Society, and honorary secretary to the Congress of Archaeological Societies, will be the chairman.

THE PRESERVATION OF THE INDIAN FAUNA.

Sir Harry Johnston's letter to the Times on the need of legislation in regard to the protection of the fauna of British India recalls his interesting article on the same subject in the Nineteenth Century for July. He points out that the question thus raised is of interest not only to those who, as he puts it in the article referred to, "plead for the retention of beasts and birds in our landscapes, of remarkable trees and plants, solely because of their beauty or the intellectual stimulus aroused by their strangeness of form, the mystery of their origin," but to others who know that it is intimately connected with the welfare of man in Southern Asia. "The reckless destruction of insect-eating birds (for example) which has been going on unchecked for fifty years to feed the wicked plumage trade, is causing a great increase in germ-spreading insects and ticks, and consequently of the germ-diseases which destroy human beings and the domestic animals on which they depend for their food supply.

Yet the projected Game Act of 1911 provided little or no protection for insect-eating birds—merely dealt with such game birds and beasts as might (in the words of Mr. E. P. Stebbing, addressing the Zoological Society in October, 1911) be likely to interest persons with the minds conventionally attributed to country squires."

THE CROSS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

The South American Supplement of the Times contains an article of special interest on "The Cross in Central America" which, incidentally, traces the connection between the cross as a pre-Christian symbol and tree worship, so prominent a feature of primitive European religion. In Central America, however, the cross was a weather symbol. The first one seen by Cortés and his soldiers was an emblem of the goddess of rain. "The goddess of rain (called Chalchihuitlique) was represented with a cross in her hands. In spring festivals were held in her honour, no doubt with the design of propitiating her, and inducing her to send rain. At these celebrations, sacrificial victims, nailed to a cross, were shot with arrows. Closely connected with the thought of rain is the idea of wind. Just as we should expect, the cross also appears as a wind symbol, in the hands of Quetzacoatl, god of the winds. The numerical analogy between the four winds and the four points of the cross is obvious. It may safely be concluded that the cross was a symbol of the four winds. That conclusion is not only probable in view of the facts already mentioned but is borne out by similar facts among other peoples. For centuries before the Christian era the cross was used as a symbol in China, India, Persia, Syria, and Egypt. It may not have stood for the four winds always, and in all these countries. In Egypt it was probably a life-symbol, but in all instances where the cross symbol has four branches a reference to the winds may well be assumed."

A FAMOUS RUSSIAN EDITOR.

M. Suvorin, the founder and editor of the Novoe Vremya, whose death is announced, made his journal the mouth-piece of the Russian bureaucracy, identifying himself completely with the policy of the Government. In his early days, however, he had pronounced liberal views, and at the age of twenty-four wrote sketches of village life for the Sovremennik (Contemporary), which was edited by the famous Socialist, Tchernyshevsky. At this time, having abandoned his early military ambitions, Suvorin was championing the cause of the poor and earning his living as a village schoolmaster. In 1863 he went to St. Petersburg to make his fortunes as a journalist, and became a member of the staff of the St. Petersburg Vedomosti. From this point a gradual change came over his opinions; nevertheless he wrote some scathing articles which, when published in book form, brought him within the clutches of the law, and resulted in two months' imprisonment for "treasonable disrespect towards the established institutions of the realm." M. Suvorin was the son of a serf who had achieved a remarkable career in the army.

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had a rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.
A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.
Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.
Heroes of Faith—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.
Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:
THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.
of every description accurately typed.
1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,
EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—
Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WAREHAM.—Rooms to Let in nice modern house; high situation, with a fine view.—Mrs. WOOD, The Gables, Worgret-road, Wareham. Recommended by Rev. H. S. and Mrs. Solly.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c. Bundles of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable; wears for years. Scores of beautiful designs, fascinating shades.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale). JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 31, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3663.
NEW SERIES, No. 767.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net.

MAN'S CHIEF END,

and other Sermons.

By R. B. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of
ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD

Principal:

Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

For particulars as to Lectures and Bursaries for Students for the Ministry apply to the PRINCIPAL, or to one of the undersigned:

A. H. WORTHINGTON, B.A.,
1, St. James' Square,
Manchester.

Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.,
3, Keats Grove, Hampstead,
London, N.W.

MR. FRANK HOPPS, Kirby Fields, Leicester, can supply a limited number of the following works of the late Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS:—"Pilgrim Song" at 1s., "Sermons of Sympathy" at 1s., and "First Principles of Religion and Morality" at 9d.; or the three works, half-a-crown post free.

MISS DREWRY hopes to resume her Courses of Lectures, Readings, and Lessons on English Language and Literature early in October. For particulars apply by letter.—143, King Henry's-road, London, N.W.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Mr. G. BOWER CODLING

conducts Classes in

PUBLIC SPEAKING

at Hasluck's Academy, Bedford House, Bedford Street, Strand. Commencing Friday, 4th October. Special Class for Ladies. Assistance given in the preparation and delivery of Speeches for all occasions.—Write for full Syllabus to SAM. L. HASLUCK, Director, 3, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

Commonsense and Metaphysic. By Rev. F. W. ORDE WARD. August 31.

"Francis Thompson." By Rev. EDGAR DAPLYN. August 31.

Moral Education Congress. By F. J. GOULD. August 31.

Man and Metaphysic. By Rev. F. W. ORDE WARD. August 24.

The New Spirit in Education. August 24.

The Ejected Ministers. August 17.

Conditional Immortality. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. August 10.

Values of the Faith. By W. SCOTT PALMER. (Four Articles.) July 20, 27, August 3, 10.

The Eugenics Congress and After. By Dr. LIONEL TAYLER. August 3.

The Christian Minister. By Rev. JOSEPH WOOD. August 3.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

NOW READY.

42 pp. Fcap. 8vo.

The Provincial Assembly Lecture for 1912.

"The Immanence of God and the Individuality of Man,"

BY

Sir HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt.

6d. net. By post 7d. Quantities 6d. each plus postage.

Messrs. RAWSON & CO., 16, New Brown St., Manchester.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 136, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H.

WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate with their own, ages 3 to 13.

The house stands on the edge of Blackheath Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.

They will be assisted by Miss Enid Branson (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.

For illustrated prospectus apply Westminster, Chilworth, Surrey.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, September 8.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. W. J. PIGOTT.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. H. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ROWLAND HILL.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Rev. D. D. EVANS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BEETRAM LISTEE, B.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. T. J. JENKINS, of Hinchley.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. C. BOWIE.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W. No morning service until Sept. 15; 7, Mr. R. HOLLOWAY.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 only, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mrs. BROWN; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 22.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. A. HURN, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. J. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROOKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. C. PEACH, of Manchester.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. M. WRIGHT, M.A.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. C. NICKERSON.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. H. VAUGHAN, B.A.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, B.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Mr. F. R. NOTT, LL.B.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.

CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30.

CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.

CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKE.

{DEAN ROW, 10.45, and
 {STYAL, 6.30, Rev. J. T. DAVIS, B.A.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.

EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.

GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. H. MAISTER.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. K. H. BOND.

LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. FISHER SHORT.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.

MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street. Closed for repairs.

MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.

NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. HALL, M.A.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.

PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TBAVERS.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.

SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. T. ANDERSON.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.

SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Mr. PERCIVAL CHALK.

WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTE.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

MARRIAGE.

SWANNELL—BICKERS.—On August 28, at the Unitarian Chapel, Bedford, by the Rev. Herbert C. Hawkins, William Henry Swannell, only son of the late Wm. Swannell, of Felmersham, Beds., afterwards of Canterbury, to Sadie, third daughter of William Bickers, of Worlingworth.

DEATHS.

BEALE.—On September 3, Charles Gabriel Beale, of Maple Bank, Edgbaston, Birmingham, and Bryntirion, Dolgelly, aged 69.

JOHNSON.—On September 3, at his residence, Brinnington House, Stockport, John Goode Johnson, J.P., in his 82nd year. Funeral service at the Unitarian Church, Stockport, on Saturday, September 7, at 11.30, prior to interment at the Borough Cemetery. Friends please accept this (the only) intimation. Inquiries respecting funeral to Wm. Berry Underbank, Stockport.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

EXPERIENCED GOVERNESS (young) seeks re-engagement. Usual English subjects, fluent French, German, Music, Botany, Drill, Games; Cyclist. Excellent testimonials.—K. G., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LADY (36) requires post in professional man's house (or equivalent) as Companion-Nurse: Housekeeping. Domesticated. Knowledge of cooking; supervise servants. Nominal salary.—M. F., The Rosery, Medstead, Hants.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken. Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	595	CORRESPONDENCE :—		FOR THE CHILDREN :—
THE CHURCHES AND INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL UNREST	596	The Care of the Feeble-Minded	599	The Painter	604
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Prayers for Children	600	MEMORIAL NOTICES :—
William Robertson Smith	597	Death and Survival	600	Mr. James S. Beale	604
Swarthmore Hall	598	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		Mr. Charles G. Beale	605
A Tramp with a Soul	599	William Shaen	601	The Social Movement	605
		Socialism and Character	602	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	606
		The Philosophy of William James	603	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	607
		Publications Received	604

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PROFESSOR SCHÄFER delivered his Address as President of the British Association at Dundee on Wednesday. His choice of subject, the Origin of Life, and his line of argument, are likely to revive many of the controversies which lie on the border-land of religion. His main thesis he expressed in the following words :—

“Setting aside, as devoid of scientific foundation, the idea of immediate super-natural intervention in the first production of life, we are not only justified in believing, but compelled to believe, that living matter must have owed its origin to causes similar in character to those which have been instrumental in producing all other forms of matter in the universe ; in other words, to a process of gradual evolution.”

* * *

On a first cursory review the line of argument strikes us as singularly ineffective. A large part of it depends for its validity upon the evolution of living from lifeless matter, but it is just here that proof breaks down, and Professor Schäfer has to keep company with theologians in making assumptions in regard to things which it is reasonable to believe. For him the problems of life are essentially problems of matter, but he has to acknowledge that no process of transition has hitherto been observed. He thus leaves the problem very much where he found it, with a strong expression of his own preference for the purely physical solution. The Address is not likely to lead to any rebound into speculative materialism, though it is calculated to disturb the complacency with which the philosophy of vitalism is accepted by many people. We cannot ignore the possibility that some day living matter may be produced in the laboratory. And what then ? Even then we do not think that the spiritual interpretation of life would have received an incurable wound.

* * *

A TERRIBLE account of Russian atrocities in Tabriz appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Tuesday from the pen of Mr. G. D. Turner. Love for their own country makes the members of the Persian Constitutional party specially obnoxious in Russian eyes, and numbers of them have been sent to the gallows under circumstances of hideous brutality, among them the Sikat-ul-Islam, the chief Moslem ecclesiastic in Tabriz, who is described as a man of very unusual ability, of great personal charm, and singularly broad-minded. Our partnership with Russia in the control of Persian affairs has been defended on the ground that it is in the best interests of a decaying nation. If our Foreign Office ever believed this, these accounts of Russian terrorism should dispel the delusion. But we greatly fear that it is simply a logical part of an unimaginative and fatalistic foreign policy, in which the rights of weak nationalities are of small account, and plain questions of right and wrong are seldom asked.

* * *

THE friends of international peace will notice with grave alarm that the strong and influential plea for the limitation of the use of air-ships in war has been quite fruitless. We have no evidence that it has been even seriously considered by our own or any other civilised Government. War is a hideous game carried on under definite rules. Many barbarous practices, like the killing of wounded men, have been scheduled as inadmissible. The mangling of hundreds of human beings by the dropping of shells from an aeroplane might have been placed in the same category by international agreement. But the competition in the application of science to purposes of destruction has been too strong for such reasonable and pacific counsels, and it is announced that the new hyper-super-Dreadnought is to be covered with protective armour against attack by aeroplane.

* * *

THE meeting of the Trade Unions Congress is an annual revelation of the enormous strength of organised labour, and not less of the advantage to the community that labour should be organised, and that it should formulate its policy and discuss its interests in public debate. The 45th Congress, which has been held in Newport this week, has been not less notable than its predecessors for the healthy variety of opinion represented, and the importance of its decisions. In the course of his address, the President, Mr. Will Thorne, M.P., pronounced emphatically against compulsory arbitration in industrial disputes. He also once again identified the interests of organised labour with international goodwill. By taking part in politics they should learn, he said, that no nation lives to itself alone. They must understand international relations and their position as a great international working class movement, which would put an end to the foolish policy of spending at least one-half of the national expenditure in building Dreadnoughts and guns.

* * *

At a later stage an important step was taken towards the federation of all unions in the same industry, but this was accompanied by a virtual condemnation of the methods of Syndicalism, while the policy “to down tools” all at the same time, and the national strike found little favour. On Wednesday the Congress adopted by a small majority a very drastic resolution to the effect “that the question of secular education be eliminated from the questions for discussion at any future Congress." Clearly a resolution of this kind cannot bind the future, and it was adopted in order to allay some smouldering theological irritation. But its adoption reveals a good deal of practical wisdom. As long as it remains operative it will save the Congress from the disaster of squandering its energies in religious controversy, and meanwhile the education difficulty is solving itself, and all over the country the school under public control is becoming the normal type.

* * *

THE problem of Sunday amusements has become a hardy annual. The arguments for strict observance or greater licence have been exhausted long ago, but there has been a remarkable change of public sentiment, and the immunity of the Picture Palace from Sunday prohibitions has again raised the question in an acute form. The army of professionals who work hard to amuse other people have no intention of surrendering their day of rest unless economic pressure is too strong for them. Putting the distinctly religious sentiments and associations of Sunday on one side, we may reinforce their plea by the less obvious interests of the audience. It is not good for them that it should be made easy to escape from boredom simply by following the familiar round of week-day amusements. As Mrs. Ormiston Chant pointed out the other day, after all the hurrying and speeding up of the present time the brain needs rest and a change of thoughts. We cannot afford to go on in a chain of similar things day after day. England, she maintained, would be committing moral suicide and physical race suicide if she gave up her Sunday. This is not a plea for dulness in the interests of religion, but for a sane and restful use of Sunday, and for the preservation of its distinctiveness from other days for the sake of health and happiness both in body and soul.

* * *

WE print in another column an important letter from Miss Mary Dendy, on the care of the Feeble-minded. There are few, if any, people in the country who have a better right to influence public opinion on this subject, and what she writes about the Bill at present before Parliament should re-assure many waverers of its sterling value. But her letter has a practical side as well, which should not be overlooked in the discussion of the probable issues of legislative action. The efforts for which Miss Dendy and the society she represents are responsible at Sandlebridge are in urgent need of funds. Our readers have responded liberally in the past to Miss Dendy's annual appeal, and made the "Inquirer Fund" an appreciable item in the treasurer's accounts. We hope that they will be eager to do the same this year.

THE CHURCHES AND INDUSTRIAL AND SOCIAL UNREST.

By Industrial Unrest I mean the conviction on the part of great masses of organised workers that they are not receiving as large a share of the wealth of the country as is their due, and their determination to get it; and by Social Unrest I mean in the first place a gradually permeating suspicion or conviction on the part of others (who have nothing to gain and perhaps something to lose by any change) that this claim is, in the main, a just one. But Social Unrest goes much further than this. It recognises inarticulate wrongs to be redressed and sores to be healed. There are sufferers that cannot or do not make their voices heard in protests, threats, or demands of any kind, and social unrest is in the hearts of all who hear their mute appeal. And again there is a constantly growing sense of collective responsibilities for "wounds and bruises and putrefying sores," the responsibility for which cannot be brought home to any individual or even class, and the healing of which seems to be beyond the reach of individual effort and to demand an organised expression of the collective social will.

And yet further there is an uneasy questioning in many hearts as to the worthiness or even the legitimacy of our whole scheme of personal efforts and ambitions, the goal of our practical aspirations for ourselves and our children. If our ideals are not frankly and ultimately material, do they not at least involve and imply a privileged material position as a basis? Do they not involve something which in its nature belongs to the ideals of a class, not realisable by a society in its integrity? And perhaps the worst of it all is that the chief driving force of the "industrial unrest" itself appears to be of much the same material nature as our own resisting and resenting ambitions, and often to be as unscrupulous and as cruel in its methods. While Capital and Labour are defending or storming positions of material advantage, do either of them cherish in their hearts and exemplify in their lives the worthy spiritual ideals to which we feel that material possessions are only means? Are the demands and desires of labour any less material than the enjoyments of capital?

Here then we are brought directly and inevitably to the Churches. What are they doing, and what ought they to do?

We are always lamenting that they "do not reach the working classes!" At present I will not lament it, but will assume it to be the case. Let us think of our churches in fact or in spirit, then, as mainly middle-class institutions that can have no direct control of industrial unrest, but which, just because they are based on spiritual fellowship, cannot be indifferent to the wants of the unprivileged, and cannot be content to take their own privileged position for granted. It is only natural that they should be permeated by social unrest.

What is their position? First of all, if they are living institutions at all, they both express and cherish the sense in our hearts of an actual life worth living. If we are true members of a church we have not only pity for the disinherited, but a vivid sense of the glory and joy of the heritage of life; we have not only the noble pessimist's resolve to lighten, if we may, the burden of life, but the optimist's possession of a gospel of great joy. And so of necessity our churches must at the very least qualify the hardness and the ferocity of our material ambitions, while at the same time they quicken our sympathies. If we have even faintly apprehended the things of the spirit, then what we most value in life will appear to us decreasingly dependent upon large command of material resources. I say "large" command, for as long as we are compact of body and soul our spiritual life cannot be independent of our bodies. "No man can be a poet or a saint or a lover unless he has recently had something to eat. But it is no use his having anything to eat, unless he is, in his measure, a poet, a saint, or a lover, when he has eaten it."

The Church has always done at least lip homage to the second half of this truth, but not to the first. Yet they are equally essential, and, if we deepened our homage to the one, we should inevitably recognise the other. If we really felt that material things are only to be valued as bearers of spiritual things, we should understand how vastly more important to the spiritual life it is that those who have little should have more than that those who have much should keep it.

The Church, then, in the exercise of its primary eternal and essential function of expressing and sustaining the spiritual life and quickening the sense of brotherhood, must incessantly turn the aspirations of its members in directions which should make them welcome, and not dread, any tendencies or movements towards the more even distribution of wealth as tending to a gain, accompanied by no countervailing loss.

But in old days the Church was not content to concern herself with the heart alone and leave the intellect outside her action. Severe and protracted intellectual effort was demanded to define the precise truths of doctrine and rule of practice that made for salvation. Our conceptions of salvation have become wider and more complex. As in the personal life we have learned to look upon the body no longer as the foe of the spirit, but as its organ and servant, and have learnt to think of it with the reverence it demands, as such, and to require of teachers and trainers of youth some knowledge of physiology; so in this wider social organism we have learnt to recognise the spiritual significance of the industrial relations and conditions of life and to demand of ourselves and each other a patient and reverent study of the mechanism, or rather organism, of industry, that we may better understand how by a wise direction of this great social instrument to advance towards the realisation of the social and spiritual aims of society. Whence shall the impulse to this study spring? From the sectional organisations that are avowedly pursuing in the first instance some material advantage to their own members? From the academic world? From the political arena? All are active, all are inevitable, and all may be worthy; but must not the purest impulse come out of the cry of the churches for guidance? Pastor and flock are in equal need. Alone of organised bodies can they press the demand for guidance from the right point of view, insist on having it directed to the right goal, and instinctively feel whether it is animated by the right spirit.

To the theology of a former age sustained and severe intellectual effort was ungrudgingly given, for it pertained to salvation. Shall a less zealous service be rendered in our age to Sociology? Can the question "What shall I do to be saved?" be separated from that other question, "What can I do to save?" and can that, in its turn, be answered without an appeal to Sociology?

But what can the churches do? They cannot yet create or promulgate a systematic sociology. But they can create a demand for it and they can prepare a public for it. They can acquaint themselves with some of its most obvious problems and can drive home the vital necessity of dealing with them in the spirit of religion which is the spirit of life.

This, and nothing short of it, is the meaning of the organised effort that is now being actually made to establish centres of study of social problems in the churches all over the country.

P. H. W.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON SMITH.*

On an April day of the year 1894 the parish churchyard of Keig, in Aberdeenshire, received within its gates all that was mortal of William Robertson Smith. Behind there followed a strangely mixed procession of mourners, in which some of the first scholars of the land rubbed against dour unlettered farmers and crofters, drawn together by a common sorrow and a common veneration. They came to commit to his last quiet resting place in the dear earth one who for five years had walked in a whirlwind, reeling the dust of ecclesiastical controversy through church courts, universities, newspapers, and peasant homes, a theological Æolus who flung tempests over Scotland from his chair in that northern cave of learning at Aberdeen. Now he had spoken his last word to shake terribly the earth, as the dogged Presbyterians thought it, misinterpreting their own nervous agitation. His spirit had been an arrow—straight, swift, piercing—and it is still in flight though the bow from which it was shot is broken.

The scholars not only of this country, but of Europe, had known him at his splendid worth in the thick of his fight for the liberty of unlicensed printing of the facts about the Bible, as revealed to patient and intelligent research. He had enjoyed their friendship, esteem, and support, when for the most part those of his own household of faith, led by names on which this Life will confer a fearful immortality as of the shades about muddy Styx, were raising a hullabaloo against him and his "infidelity" that sounded like a set of wild, blatant, and discordant bagpipes, blown by amateurs, driving him from college and land. A few there were who, in the thunderstorm before the dawn, knew where the morning star shone unquenchably behind cloud and thick darkness, and followed in its wake, men gone from us now but still honoured—like Prof. Davidson, his Old Testament tutor; Prof. Candlish, Bruce, Marcus Dods, Dr. Walter Smith, and Mr. Taylor Innes; and men yet among us like Dr. Whyte, of Free St. George's, mystic and saint; and Prof. Lindsay, now of Glasgow Free College. As these read this Life they will thank Heaven that they were built in view of the future, not like those whose eyes have been put in the back of their heads.

But ere Smith was laid in the churchyard of his native place, Presbyterianism had been dragged at the wheels of Germany into the path of the Higher Criticism; it had been impressed upon it that it must hobble along, however rheumatically and painfully; the infidelities of Robertson Smith had become the platitudes of its colleges, and the living martyr was once more the posthumous hero. The General Assembly which, thirteen years before, had driven him into exile south of the Border, now wrote its own Tristia in the form of a panegyric of Smith, recording in its minutes that "his brilliant career as a student, distinguished alike in classics, in science, and in philosophy, the rapid steps by which he advanced to a foremost place among the Biblical scholars of Europe, are still fresh in the memory of the Church and of the community," and congratulating the Free Church on such a gifted son "born and educated in one of her manses, trained in her halls . . . and holding a distinguished place among her professors, &c."

. . . Sic fata deum rex

Sortitur, volvitque vices, is vertitur ordo.

His life had been a theological tour de force. He was born on November 8, 1846, his father, Dr. Pirie Smith, being then Free Kirk minister of Keig and Tough. Those were post-Disruption days, when people often put no sugar in their tea, that they might have more to contribute to the Church. Pirie Smith had a stipend of something under £150 a year, supplemented by taking in pupils, while the church in which he preached on Sunday mornings was a shed rigged up during the previous night, to escape the interdict of the local land proprietor. William was a very delicate boy, a very precocious one to boot, and gave early signs of theological distinction. His father once heard the little fellow lecture his younger brother in the following strain: "The doctrine of the Trinity is incomprehensible, incomprehensible in this sense that man could not have invented it. Therefore it must be true." Perhaps the Platonic theory of reminiscence is verified by such an incident, and in a previous existence "Willie" had sat at the feet of an Aquinas, or it is just, perhaps, possible that he had heard this reasoning, so attractive in a child, on the lips of some learned divine in the Keig pulpit. He and his brother George, about sixteen months his junior, were educated at home till the former was fifteen, when he gained a bursary of £30, and the latter one of £10, and they entered Aberdeen University.

The two brothers had a brilliant college career, carrying back to Keig the highest academical honours, though they had both to battle with ill-health, to which George succumbed three weeks after his final triumphal success. Even amid his last sufferings he struggled on with his Herodotus and Butler. William survived, gained the Ferguson Scholarship in mathematics, and in 1866 entered New College, Edinburgh, to study for the ministry. In the competition for the Shaw Philosophical Fellowship he stood second to his friend, the present Principal Lindsay. Such was his mathematical ability that he secured the assistantship to the illustrious Prof. Tait, and in connection with this post went to Göttingen, and visited Heidelberg to get hints from the laboratory work of Helmholtz and Kirchhoff.

In 1869 he became a candidate for the Chair of Old Testament and Hebrew in Aberdeen, and though he was only twenty-two, and had just been licensed as a probationer, the Assembly conferred on him the appointment (May 25, 1869). His inaugural lecture laid down the principles of historical interpretation, which he followed in his Old Testament work, and whose application led to the articles in the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, especially that on "Bible," in which he denied the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy, in consequence of which he was afterwards arraigned as a heretic and infidel.

* The Life of William Robertson Smith. By J. S. Black and G. W. Chrystal. 15s. net. Lectures and Essays of W. R. Smith. 10s. 6d. net. A. & C. Black, 1912.

The Germans who seem to have influenced Smith most were Ewald in Old Testament and Rothe in Dogmatik. His good, but canny, Scotch admirers and friends tried to get him to be more judicious, and not to "commit himself to crude notions from Germany, as there was a danger of his 'unsettling' young divinity students." Smith in turn claimed that his attitude was reconcilable with the standards of the Church, and that he was only following in the tradition of the great Protestant Reformers, Luther and Calvin. And, indeed, he was right, for their conception of the Bible as the supreme authority in religion applied only to such parts of it as their reason and conscience left intact. Neither of them accepted implicitly all the books of the present canon, any more than did the early Christian Fathers.

A heresy charge, however, was proceeded with through College Committee, Presbytery, and the daily press, which set itself on fire with a theological controversy that raged and burned and roared to the heart's content of every self-made cantankerous Scotch theologian in the land. The case came before the General Assembly in June, 1877, and by 491 votes to 113 Smith was provisionally suspended from the duties of his Chair.

At this point it was suggested to him that he should sign the Thirty-nine Articles, and take the next vacant Balliol living! He declined.

The process dragged its weary, sinuous length along till the Assembly of 1880. The fight again took place on the Assembly floor, and ended with Smith admitting the necessity for greater clearness and completeness in the expression of his views and the Assembly reinstating him in his Chair. Harvard had kept a Professorship waiting for him, but he preferred Aberdeen, and it went to Prof. Toy. Congratulations on the issue came in from scholars all over Europe, and then appeared the eleventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, containing an article by Smith on "Hebrew Language and Literature" (1880).

The Rev. Mr. Macaulay, of Edinburgh, a popular preacher, whose only claim to originality and scholarship lies in a brilliant philological emendation of the name of the Dutch scholar Kuenen to "Quenen," a correction which has not, however, been followed by critics and students since, raised anew the storm of persecution. Smith was again suspended till the memorable Assembly of 1881 met.

Rainy, the moderator, whose attitude in the case had been shifty and unstable, veering irregularly and with vacillation away from shaky support, now at length, after very precarious navigation in and out between Scylla and Charybdis, stood up, as he conceived pro Christo et ec- clesia, and moved that it was "no longer safe or advantageous for the Church that Prof. Smith should continue to teach in one of her colleges."

It must be conceded that to Rainy, diplomatist and courtier, this compulsion to take the bull by the horns was a most dread, distasteful, as well as disastrous duty. With Sir Robertson Nicoll we think he was not so Jesuitical as Smith believed him. His spiritual sight may have been dim. It is said he never slept all the previous night before moving the fatal resolution. At any rate, with a heavy heart, standing on the side of Mediævalism against the new Renaissance, and with the eyes of European scholarship upon him, he sacrificed Robertson Smith, his old pupil. As pitiful an object he seems to us as Agamemnon offering up Iphigenia at Aulis that the ships might go on with prospering breeze.

Prof. Davidson moved the negative; Dr. Whyte supported, declaring: "Fathers and brethren, the world of mind does not stand still; and the theological mind will stand still at its peril."

Whyte was the very incarnation of Calvinist, Puritan, Presbyterian—the three in one—but softened with evangelic grace and molten in spiritual fire; the face of the man itself a patriarchal benediction. He pleaded for the open eye on the broad path, but in vain. Smith, on his side, remained immovable: "I take my stand on the critical position."

The long process ended. He was no more a professor in the Free Kirk. Several of the greatest figures in the Assembly and Church entered their dissent against the judgment; and Prof. Lindsay declared his right, at a protest meeting, to believe and teach the views in "Hebrew Language and Literature." It was a moral victory for Smith, and a moral defeat for the Church. The tide of thought rolled on unabashed and irresistible.

The victim soon got a post as joint editor with Baynes of the Encyclopædia Britannica, on which he wrought tremendously. He delivered lectures in Glasgow and Edinburgh, published in 1882 as "The Prophets of Israel," "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church" having been published the previous year. He also worked on the Old Testament Revision Committee, and in 1883 became Professor of Arabic at Cambridge. In 1886 he was made Librarian to the University on account of his encyclopædic knowledge. His most important work was "The Religion of the Semites," in which he advanced the "Communion" theory of sacrifice, and played his part in initiating the study of Comparative Religion.

He had never been robust, and had often to work in the fires of pain and weakness, but his mind was like a diamond. In 1892 he had to be operated on for tuberculosis in the vertebral column, but never fully recovered, and after many agonies, heroically endured, he passed away in 1894.

The editing of the Life and the Lectures has been a real labour of love, carried out with patience and thoroughness, and though it comes as a thing born out of due season it will be welcomed as a fitting tribute to one of the most gifted, open-minded, original, and much-suffering Biblical scholars of the nineteenth century.

Sæpius ventis agitur ingens
Pinus, et celsæ graviore casu
Decidunt turrets, feriuntque summos
Fulgura montes.

R. NICOL CROSS.

SWARTHMORE HALL.

SWARTHMORE HALL, the old unpretentious Elizabethan country house in which George Fox lived some of his passionate years, has come into the possession, as is fitting, of the Society of Friends. A good deal of expectation of sensational bidding had been aroused, but this did not take place; and what competition there was played about the land considered as a commercial asset. The bed on which he may, perhaps, have slept, and the old battered desk on which he almost certainly wrote, awoke much interest, and it seems a pity, sentimentally speaking, that the desk is now parted from the old house. The oak panelling of his bed-chamber remains intact, and the chimney-piece is a decidedly handsome piece of carving. On the second storey a door (now blocked up) opened in the outside wall, making an admirable position for a preacher; and here Fox is said to have addressed such hearers as gathered from the neighbouring cottages and stood on the ground below. A spacious cupboard within offered on occasion an opportunity of retreat. It is a matter of congratulation that this monument of unique associations should now be in the keeping of the honoured representatives of that remarkable religious impulse which George Fox initiated.

Nevertheless, George Fox has probably never been so interesting from the general point of view as he is now. We no longer talk of his fanaticism, or of his eccentricity—all that matters nothing. We rank him among the great mystics, and the secret of his life draws and fascinates us: the secret which lifted him above things trivial, and even ludicrous, to the diviner ether which burns up all except the imperishable and eternal. And that our time is seeing a remarkable recrudescence of interest in mysticism and the mystics can hardly be denied. The men and women who, amid the profound dissatisfactions and perpetual flux of life have found a sure abiding place, attract us more and more strongly. We seem to see that though these persons are not the monopoly of any creed, church, country, or climate, and though they manifest through the widest variety of forms, their experience is essentially the same, and forms, as Miss Underhill has said, a vast body of consistent evidence which cannot be ignored in any impartial examination of the human spirit. There is in them something vital and passionate, something essential and eternal, which our surface contentions fail to touch; which is above all shibboleths, even when it is driven to use shibboleths; which is far profounder than all theories, even when it is driven to clothe itself in theories. Paul, Augustine, Francis, George Fox: we feel them palpitating and thrilling with the consciousness of a relation of which their own descriptions are inadequate—even, it may be, misleading. Some of us know, here and there, such a personality. We are fond of stating what we want in a "preacher"; and complex, indeed, are our mental and moral needs. But how many tired souls among us turn from the theorists who offer their theories for the Bread of Life, from the controversialists, who shout their arguments for inspiration, from the intellectualists, who substitute their philosophy and psychology for the divine Gospel, from the men who cannot even in their most fervid moments forget themselves, to the spirit that we feel instinctively experiences God. That first—and all after: all learning, all knowledge, all eloquence—but that first. The spirit that denies, the spirit that pugnaciously affirms, holds our ears for awhile; then we turn away, seeking rather for him who, having proved in his own soul, shall teach us to prove ours. Such souls there are, thank God; such souls have been. And among them we name George Fox.

F. R.

A TRAMP WITH A SOUL.

I think I could turn and live with animals,
they are so placid and self-contained,
I stand and look at them long and long.
They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins.

—Walt Whitman.

I MET him on the outskirts of a pleasant hamlet.

I had been standing for some minutes looking across a meadow in which English kine were feeding, and was asking myself and wondering what it is that makes red and white cows and brown horses wed so intimately and peacefully with green pastures. My attention was especially riveted upon a foal which lay sprawling in the hot sun near its mother in the ultimate ecstasy of luxury.

If it had been his cue, my man could not have appeared upon the scene at a more fitting moment. Two sacks hung over his shoulder, and he was dragging his limbs with a slouching gait along the path toward me. When he was a few yards off he lowered his burden, tilted his peaked cap, mopped his forehead with his palm, and hailed the stranger.

"It's a 'ot day, sir!"

To which obvious remark I assented.

The sacks were nearly full, but with light material which would not have turned the scale at many pounds avoirdupois.

"That foal is hugely enjoying himself," I remarked.

"That's just what I was thinkin' on mysel', sir," he replied, "as I was comin' along with these confounded sacks on my back. I was sayin' to mysel' as 'ow I was just cut out for that ere occupation."

Whereat he again mopped the beaded forehead.

"But would yer believe me, sir, I saw a sight as'd bate that 'oller just turned four this mornin' by the village clock. I was sleepin' in that ere barn, leastways I'd only just opened my peepers, an' I saw that ere same foal put 'is fore-legs roun' 'is mother's neck an' love her like a kid 'is mammie. Yer needn't believe me, sir, unless yer likes, but it's as true as I'm a stan'in' 'ere. Yer'll excuse me, sir (mopping his face and glancing at his trousers which were well ventilated), 'but I'm better than this sometimes. I ain't 'ad no wash this blessèd mornin'. I've got a lump o' soap astickin' to my pocket, but I've lost my towel. An' lyin' about rough takes the crease out o' yer trousers! But none o' them creepy, fusty lodgin' 'ouses for me, thank yer! There's many a wuss bed than a few wisps o' clane 'ay'll make yer!"

Once set going, he rattled off at a gallop; took me in imagination with him on his rounds; hit off in graphic style the special weaknesses of this crony and of that; how this one had given him twenty (sic) waistcoats, one of which he was then wearing (where the remaining nineteen were stored he did not explain); and how from another he had bought for an old song an antique pair of tongs which he had converted at a second-hand dealer's into half-a-pound sterling, and deposited with all speed at my host's of the Cart and Horses.

"I'm not goin' to try an' make myself out an angel, sir. I've got a thirst on me this very moment as deep as the Pacific Ocean, 'an these 'ot days don't some'ow make it evaporate. I'm not o'erfond o' work neither, an' it's no use sayin' as I am, specially this weather. But blest if that ere foal don't take the cake!"

The said foal had remained absolutely motionless during the conversation, his legs stretched out at exactly the same akimbo.

"The only difference between me an' that ere foal, sir, as I can see, is that 'e's lyin' down drinkin' o' the sun into 'is innards, an' I'd be in my element liftin' a glass or two to yer honour at the Cart and 'orses. Yer don't 'appen to 'ave a few coppers makin' 'oles in yer trousers' pockets, do yer, sir?"

Overcome by the careless jollity and bluff honesty of this boon companion, I dived down and hauled out the loose contents—4d.

At that moment a pal happened to pass by, laden also with a sack and obviously of the same industry.

"I'm glad to see as 'ow yer knows yer manners, Bill," said my beneficiary. "I believe as 'ow yer'd go right by an' never open yer beak to a mate cos he's in the company of a gen'leman. Why, man, I've just come into a fortune! 'Ere's three-alfpence for yer, Bill! We'll drink the gen'leman's 'ealth together at the Cart and 'orses. I only wish 'e'd a' made it longer! What I likes about yer, sir," shouldering the sacks and giving me a parting shot, "is yer never made no conditions at all. Now most o' my friends on the road they always tells me to be sure and not spend it at the public 'ouse. An' o' course, to please 'em, I allus says as 'ow I'll be sure to place it to my account in the Post Office Savin's Bank! But I likes to tell a gen'leman the truth whenever I can. Come along, Bill. And may yer honour never die o' thirst!"

He took the turn of the road with Bill at a slightly increased pace. I pictured him a few minutes later in mine host's cool taproom, an added twinkle in his eye and a more tripping lilt of humour on his tongue. And I think of some who toil week in and week out, without a twinkle in the eye or any tripping of humour on the tongue, who appear to be further removed from the Kingdom of Heaven than this one to whom the love of a foal to a mare still remained a mystery that excited wonderment and who enjoyed his glass the more for having a pal to share it with him. A tramp (even a thirsty one) with a soul is better than a millionaire without one.

I strolled away pensive. The foal traced a semi-circle with his long legs, wheeling over to bake the other side, and again resumed the perfect quiescence of the most exquisite dolce far niente.

HARROLD JOHNSON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—It pleased me very much the other day to have my attention called to the fact that I had not this year had an appeal in THE INQUIRER for my children at Sandlebridge. The interested friend had been looking out for my annual letter with a view to once more helping our work. You will remember that last year our appeal in the spring was not very productive, and you kindly helped us again in the autumn, with most excellent results. I thought it best to wait until autumn was here again before putting our fresh needs before your readers; but I must delay no longer, for, indeed, our needs are at present extremely pressing. I am glad to say that we are at last taking seriously in hand the building of our Ashby Memorial Hospital; a friend, a doctor in the neighbourhood of the Colony, has interested himself for us to such purpose, that we have received some very considerable donations; our preliminary plans have been prepared, and we propose to ask our governors to pass a scheme at their next meeting. But the scheme, we find, must include more than the hospital; it has become imperative to build a little house for our Superintendent. Her accommodation at present is not satisfactory; she lives in the house which belongs to the young women, and we find that her doing so results in her working harder than she ought to do. Moreover, the rooms which she occupies are badly needed for the girls themselves; they are at present doing their sewing in the room which is supposed to be my bed-room; it is a useful room; we had already fitted it with great cupboards, so that it might be used as a stock-room. That is all right; there is still space in it for a bed. But it is not all right that our girls have no sitting-room except their dining-room; in the summer they do very well—if it be not raining; in the winter, they ought to have a recreation-room; and the room which is used for the committee and for our superintendent's sitting-room would serve this purpose excellently. These two buildings would find us about twenty-four more beds; the hospital would release twenty beds, now reserved for sickness; and the house is to have a small dormitory in it, as some girls will live there and do the house-work. These girls will also do the cleaning for the hospital, which will be connected with the house by a covered way, so that the same kitchen may serve both buildings. Even this is not all that we must now undertake—we must arrange our weaving-sheds. For these, old buildings, and to some extent old material, will be available. They will, of course, add to the expense of the scheme, but not so very greatly as to make it desirable to postpone longer accommodation so very sorely needed.

I am much afraid lest people may suppose that the Mental Deficiency Bill will, when it is passed into law, provide for all our needs. I trust that some of our most pressing anxieties as to maintenance may be to some extent relieved; but I am sure that, for some time to come, we shall still have to look to private generosity for the extension of our buildings. We cannot afford to wait; we never have waited; as you are aware, we have determined that certain things must be done, and then we have done them; and your readers, with other generous friends, have given us the means.

Perhaps you will allow me to say here a word about the Mental Deficiency Bill. So very much has been written in abuse of it that it can hardly be that some prejudice has not been created against it. I hardly think it possible that some of the writers against the Bill, whom one might think from their reputation to be men of education, can be unaware of the falsity of their statements. I am not concerned to repeat these; but I do wish to assure your readers that I firmly believe that there is not the slightest danger that any individual liberty will be interfered with under the Act. I believe that more stringent legislation will make for more justice and kindness in the treatment of the feeble-minded, who have certainly, in the past, met with scant measure of both. Such people never have liberty in any true sense of the word. They are always incurring the penalty of the law, and the law has at present no proper means of dealing with them. It is most unjust that a poor feeble-minded lad should spend his life going in and out of prison with intervals of the workhouse, when he might be safely and happily at work on a farm in the country—not earning his living, but not wasting his time either—and living the only wholesome life that is possible for him. At the same time, I quite agree with you that every safeguard must be provided against the possible detention of normal cases. As the Bill proposes only to deal with those who have already come under notice because of their inability to guide or protect themselves (as inebriates, criminals, or paupers), and as very careful and gradual certification is provided for, and may be further restricted, I believe that there is no risk of even a single person's being unduly restrained. On the other hand, the lamentable cases which come to our notice of illegal private restraint will become impossible. It is a pitiful thing to see a feeble-minded boy who has been forced into imbecility and crippled for life by having been for years tied into a chair to avoid trouble in caring for him. It is certain that no scheme must be tolerated that does not, in dealing with the feeble-minded, make their happiness and safety a primary consideration. Minute inspection will secure the well-being of those who must be detained, and will also secure that no person shall be detained improperly. The external evidences of detention, such as walls and bolts and bars, are absolutely unnecessary; a metaphorical turning of the key is all that is needed in the case of the feeble-minded; this is our experience at Sandlebridge, where every boy on the place could walk off it, "if he had the mind to."

And this brings me back to our boys, and I should not like to close this long letter without telling you that we have opened our men's house. Our men over eighteen years of age are now living there, except one who is too delicate to leave the care of the matron he has so long been under. Their pride and delight in their new home are very pleasant to see. It is a charming house, though very simple; their living-room has been built with a screened recess at one end, which has seats all round it, and is large enough to hold a small billiard-table which has been given to them. The dining-tables are at the other end of the room; the walls are of brick painted green, but with a dado of stained wood; the dormitory above has the same colouring. There are two fire-places in each room. The master and matron are our carpenter and his wife, and she is assisted by her sister. A friend has given a harmonium, and so the lads can have the singing they are so fond of. In front of the house is their cricket-field, where they have been taught, ever since they went into the house, to play cricket with rather more science than when they were brought to it as "boys." At the side of the house they are levelling the ground for their bowling-green. They have taken the garden in hand themselves, and are keeping it very gay and neat. We could not afford to give them quite all they ought to have; we have had to be content with an ordinary set-bath; we wanted to have shower-baths, but they cost more than we could manage. However, we hope we may get them in the future. Our other new development is a shoe-maker's shop. This is a pleasure to some of the boys, who are learning to make and mend shoes, and will, we hope, prove to be a great convenience and economy. Our girls are knitting now all our stockings by machine and hand; so that we hope the foot-gear of our large family may not cost so much in the future as it has done in the past. We have over 250 to provide for, and we very much hope that friends who cannot send us money will perhaps send us clothes and boots.

One more request. Looking after feeble-minded folk is arduous work in the best conditions; will friends please remember our staff, and send us any books they have to spare? We are getting together a library for our good helpers, and I am sure that anyone who has felt the pleasant recreation of a good novel after a day's work, will be glad to help us here. Please address parcels to me at my home address.

I need not say that I shall await with anxiety the results of this letter. We want at least £6,000! We shall gratefully receive any sum, small or large; and I hope friends will not forget the shillings for the "Healthy Children" fund. —Yours, &c.,

MARY DENDY, Hon. Sec.,
Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded.
13, Clarence-road, Withington, Manchester,
September 2, 1912.

PRAYERS FOR CHILDREN.

SIR,—Cannot good and sufficient reasons be given against the teaching of the usual kind of "Morning and Evening" verses to little children? Short sentences and rhymed words are quickly learnt by them, and remain with the connecting circumstances in the memory for many years; hence the desirability not only of simple language, but that the ideas expressed should be helpful and suggestive to both youth and age.

In spite of all that is talked and written about education nowadays, it is not only amazing, but appalling, to notice the utter indifference of the majority of parents to the kind of literature (?) with which their little children become acquainted. A moment's thought given by the most careless must surely convince them that the parrot-like gabbling of what for the most part is horrible doggerel should have no place in the religious life of their children, and that to call these verses prayers is but to belittle that word.

The following little prayer, though not ideal, I have always found easily understood and remembered:—"Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, to thy most loving care we commend the whole human family; praying Thee to keep us from harm, and to increase in us the love of good and the hatred of evil."—Yours, &c.,

E. COBB.

88, Lee-road, Blackheath, S.E.,
September 2, 1912.

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

SIR,—Mr. E. J. Hunt has given a fair and careful summary of the arguments for and against the belief in the endless survival of human personality. It is not surprising that he should have to admit that there is no evidence whatever to support the belief. The subject has been debated for thousands of years, but we always come out at the same door at which we went in. There can be no profit in continuing the fruitless discussion.

What is more to the point is to trace how the belief arose, and that is perfectly clear. It arose in primitive man, and possibly in other animals, out of original mental defect, or, as we sometimes say, "want of intelligence," and has continued to the present day partly through imitation, partly through similar mental defect, and also partly by "sub-conscious" inheritance.

The modern man is indeed far less excusable than the savage, for he accepts the conclusions of his primitive ancestors while denying the validity of their arguments. It is Dr. Frazer, I think, who says that the superiority of the modern man consists in his finding new arguments for absurd customs. The savage to-day, as he doubtless did a hundred thousand years ago, confidently bases his belief on an erroneous interpretation of sleep, dreams, faints, delirium, hysteria, memory, death, and various physical phenomena. The savage also draws similar false conclusions from external phenomena. The sun is a person, so is the rain, the wind, the thunder, or even the tree and the running brook. These have a seen and an unseen part as it seems. The unseen is the soul or spirit (type, the breath).

Frequently, the evidence seems to demand two, three, or more souls to each individual human being. There is the soul which dies, the soul which goes to the sky, the soul which stays in the grave, the soul which remains with the tribe. This is without reckoning the wandering ghost. The soul which goes to the sky has a perilous and trying journey. It may meet with a "second death," in which case it is at an end.

Now the savage does not like this kind of survival. Extraordinary pains are taken to prevent the soul from coming back. The funeral is taken through a hole in the wall. The dead man is turned about to confuse him. A false trail is sometimes made round the grave. The dead man is abjured—"If you go, go altogether." The dying man is made to promise not to return. Even severer measures are taken. The body is bound or dismembered; sometimes it is eaten, and sometimes cremated.

Now these old beliefs are still in our bones, as it were. We smile at the stupidity of the savage; but do we not show greater want of intelligence when we practically, to a large extent, accept his conclusions while admittedly we have not a single fact in support of them?—Yours, &c.,

O. A. SHRUBSOLE.

Reading, September 2, 1912.

SIR,—As a constant reader of THE INQUIRER, I read the following sentence in your last week's issue:—"The problem of the survival of consciousness after death has ever loomed large in the mental horizon of humanity; it is the question of questions which has exercised the human mind throughout the ages, and one the interest of which never flags. . . . It represents one of the great riddles of which the key has not yet been found, and, perchance, may never be." As a religious body who claim to be progressive, I am astonished to find that you are unaware of the fact that the Lord, through the writings of Emmanuel Swedenborg, has revealed a full account of the spiritual world. In these wonderful writings is found a full, clear, reasonable and luminous description of the life beyond the grave. Nor is this to be wondered at; for it is unreasonable to suppose that the Divine Providence would leave man for ever in ignorance of his future destiny. It has often been a matter of astonishment to me to find that so many of the learned are ignorant of the priceless treasure that lies in their midst.—Yours, &c.,

HUGH MULLENEUX.

38, Croxteth-road, Liverpool,
September 2, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

WILLIAM SHAEN.

William Shaen: a Brief Sketch. Edited by his Daughter, M. J. Shaen. With Portrait. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 3s. net.

ONE would like to claim William Shaen as the noblest lay illustration of the religious, yet unorthodox, Nonconformity of last century. Descended from a sturdy Liberal justice of the peace and with Neal's "History of the Puritans" running through his veins, a boy at Malleson's, the Brighton Willaston, a pupil at University College School, a graduate in honours from University College, Clerk of Convocation of the newly established University of London, one of the Williams' Trustees, as were two of his ancestors, an active trustee likewise of Manchester College, a London solicitor of high standing and with wide connection—what "leading layman" could claim a finer training or a prouder tradition!

Yet it is not for this distinction that we remember with honour William Shaen, and still speak his name in reverent tone. Learning may be self-centred and knowledge make sad; Puritanism may condemn yet not reform, and Nonconformity may protest in vain. But here was much more—a brave reformer, a true Christian warrior, one who deliberately consecrated his profession and his career to the defence of righteous causes and the redress of difficult wrongs. Intended for the Bar, and with a promising future, he renounced his prospects, changed his course of studies, and faced a solicitor's practice. His legal knowledge and wise advice, added to his personal interests, soon gave him a quite unique position amongst those engaged in educational reform. He was solicitor to Newnham and Girton, to the Girls' Public Day Schools Company; the Shaen Wing at Bedford College commemorates his long connection with this institution, of which he was for ten years chairman, and of Somerville Hall he was, moreover, an honorary life member.

Further, he was a personal reformer with regard to those matters especially unpopular which were considered fads, or worse, in his time, viz., homœopathy, teetotalism and anti-vivisection. The fact of his advocacy helped to lift them into respectability, for none dreamt of calling Shaen a fanatic. Believing deeply in the duty of civil and religious liberty, he was ever ready to champion legally those who suffered from persecution or calumny. Many will recall the successful appeal to the Privy Council against the illegal deposition of Bishop Colenso, and also the unsuccessful contention against the inhibition of the late Rev. Charles Voysey. William Shaen was the solicitor in each case.

But the real "solicitor with a soul," the Bayard without fear or reproach, the Galahad of the holy ideal, appears in his fight against "the social evil," his work amongst the sinful, and his part in the crusade for "Repeal." For the details of this matter, which cannot be given here, we refer the reader to the recently published Life by his daughter, with the included testimony of Mrs. Josephine Butler. We are grateful to Miss Margaret Shaen for her frank and right treatment of this whole painful subject—a true rightness of judgment and sympathy which marked invariably her father's advocacy. No difficult moral reform was ever more fortunate than the one which had such saints for its inspiration as Josephine Butler and William Shaen.

Of the larger enterprise one branch was the Social Purity Alliance, which he founded along with the Rev. W. H. Channing. We can clearly recall through thirty years one of its meetings for students, and the deep impression made upon one young man by the sight and speech of Wm. Shaen. With Christ-like simplicity he spoke quite freely and plainly, without reserve or apology, yet with a gracious radiance in his face and a quiet comfort in his voice which carried even more assurance than his words:—

A sweet attractive kind of grace,
A full assurance given by looks,
Continual comfort in a face,
The lineaments of Gospel books.

It is twenty years since he was suddenly called to rest, and those who remember him, therefore, are ever growing fewer. It was more than time that his Life should be written for the inspiration of a new generation, and this "Brief Sketch," with its happy portrait, is, indeed, very welcome. We had hoped that the editor of the delightful "Memorials of Two Sisters" would have given us a rather fuller record of a life so rich and contagious in both its private and public influence. The friend of Mazzini and Garrison, of James Stansfeld and Peter Taylor, of Frances Newman and James Martineau, kept illustrious company both in politics and theology. And there was Travers Madge, who taught with him in the Sunday school at Carter-lane, but of whom there is no mention. But of the high faith which nerved and upheld this chivalrous life throughout there is sufficient indication beyond doubt. "The weakest cause grew strong when he took it in hand." "He never set his hand to a bad cause, and never turned his back on a good one." "The spirit of ancient knighthood lived again in him." "The truest friend of women and the noblest and best beloved of men." As Mr. P. H. Wicksteed said of him, "He realised the moral opportunities and responsibilities of his profession so deeply that it was to him a veritable ministry."

This little book has made us think that the greatest triumph of life is to fight the evil of the world on its own ground, yet keep oneself unstained; to be in the world and know its vicious side, yet be unspotted by the world; to behold the foul and the vile and the abominably wicked, yet still wholly believe in the good and keep a cheerful faith in God. The true Saint understands more about sin, and not less, than the sinner himself, yet because he knows it he sinneth not, being of the pure in heart.

F. K. F.

SOCIALISM AND CHARACTER.

Socialism and Character. By Vida D. Scudder. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 5s. net.

MISS VIDA SCUDDER has given a challenging title to her important book on Socialism which will, we hope, commend it to the notice of many who believe that revolutionary economic doctrines connote ideas in regard to morals which are equally "dangerous." It may not carry conviction to them on certain points which are hotly disputed by Socialists themselves; but if it leads them to view more sympathetically the aspirations of men and women who are endeavouring to lay the foundations of a new social order, much will have been achieved. For undoubtedly, whether we like it or not, Socialism is looming on the horizon, though we are far from its realisation as yet, and it is necessary that we should at least clear our minds of cant and prejudice on the subject. The gravest objections to Socialism, some of us are beginning to see, only start up when we have practically become converted to it; and they are not derived from the sensational pages of the new "immoralists" (as we believe they call themselves) who have joined the movement under a quite mistaken idea that State ownership of the means of production is synonymous with everybody being a law to himself.

At the outset Miss Scudder announces that she is a "class-conscious, revolutionary Socialist . . . to whom none the less the spiritual harvest, the fruits of character, are the only results worth noting in any economic order." The chapters in which the author describes how she found her way to this satisfying creed are full of interesting personal reminiscences, which will probably wake an answering echo in the minds of many readers. From the first stirrings of social compunction, through tortuous paths of the soul illumined by Mazzini, Tolstoy, Ibsen, Ruskin, or St. Francis, past those landmarks of personal sacrifice, philanthropy, and social reform which arrest us all in turn, she passed with steps that ever grew slower, and eyes in which the sadness deepened until she came upon that kindling force which "sought neither to moralise nor to abandon, but to transform our existing civilisation," and thereafter all was well. She believed that what the charitable people working in settlements, and millionaires giving away their dollars could never accomplish, the disciples of Marx were destined gloriously to achieve. She was convinced that where Christianity and the gospel of renunciation had failed, class consciousness and the assertion of human rights was going to succeed. And in a most interesting manner she gives her reasons for holding the faith that has reconciled her to the misery of living in a world which travesties altruistic ideals, and outrages our divine sense of justice every hour of the day. "Socialism quieted that ache of the heart which had never before found comfort."

It must not be supposed that Miss Scudder mixes up the advent of Socialism with the Millennium. That, she agrees, would be a singularly foolish thing to do; and she reminds the reader at a point where he might be supposed to have attained to no small degree of blissful expectation that there will be many hazards to face, many difficult readjustments to be effected, many quite unforeseen problems to solve when we have won our economic freedom. And "there may possibly be more real wickedness in the Socialist State than in our own"—a rather unfortunate, if refreshing, admission to make in the hearing of the enemy! What she does believe, however, is that Socialism will establish a nobler and more just conception of men's relationship to each other and to the nation of which they are a part than the world has ever seen before, and that it "really means an unparalleled degree of law and order" which will swiftly and surely test the rank and file, and prove infallibly which man is really at home in the new order evoked by the common will."

We cannot go into Miss Scudder's lengthy disquisitions on the rise of the proletariat and the ethics of equality and inequality, or do more than draw attention to the optimistic speculations as to the future of religion under a new social order with which the book closes. But we must confess to a feeling of apprehension awakened in us by the aggressiveness of modern class-warfare which the author of "Socialism and Character" does nothing to allay. The old pagan serenity in face of the miseries created by modern industrialism is now, for most people, impossible, and it is imperative that by some means or other our administrators, political economists, and religious teachers should show us a way out of a horrible impasse from which there seems to be no escape except by collective action. But we cannot all see with equal clearness that any ultimate good will be obtained by fanning the flame of hate which never merely smoulders when men and women are talking about their rights. Miss Scudder tells us that Tolstoy and Ruskin were on the wrong track; that the followers of St. Francis were espoused to a Lady of Poverty who walked the hills of Umbria like a goddess, but who haunts our modern slums like a murderess; and that Christianity has "failed" because it teaches self-abnegation, leading naturally to the cloister and the desert. And then she arouses us from the dejection into which such statements may have momentarily thrown us, against our better reason, by extolling the feeling of solidarity aroused by class-consciousness and self-assertion, frankly confessing that this is warfare, and that she "thrills unabashed to martial strains." "The passions educed by the whole situation," she admits, "are essentially those of the battlefield; men exult in wresting advantages from their antagonists, they are trained to regard one another as adversaries—not brothers." Undoubtedly this is the negation of the higher ethical laws, and diametrically opposed to the teaching of him who taught us to love our enemies. Incidentally, too, it lends support to Tolstoy—whose tremendous moral force is pathetically underestimated throughout the book—in his unwearied insistence on the fallaciousness of exchanging one violent method of government or one form of despotism for another, even when it masquerades as a movement by the people for the people. The rise of the democracy to power is now inevitable—the only possible outcome of long centuries of oppression; but we see no hope for permanent peace and harmony even in a Socialist State if it is to be reached only after a fierce struggle between the classes, intensified by personal rancour and prejudiced statements, and inaugurated by a victorious proletariat in a spirit of jubilation such as sober English people witnessed with horror on far-famed Mafeking night. Is there no other way out of our dilemma? We should not forget that some of the greatest social reformers, and even Socialist leaders, have come from the despised "privileged" ranks of society; and that the democracy must still look beyond the working classes for help and guidance while it is all too confused in its aims and lacking in administrative experience and ability. To entrust the ship of state to its sole care at this juncture would be about as wise as to entrust an Atlantic liner to the care of an individual utterly unqualified to act as captain, on the strength of his assertion that one man is as good as another. The outlook is sufficiently bewildering, and he would be a bold man who ventured to prophesy with any degree of assurance what is going to emerge from the tumult and clamour in which we find ourselves involved; but it should be obvious to those who are pleading for a reduction of armaments, and the deepening of goodwill between men, that arguments against the war spirit are as necessary in one sphere as in another if we are not to sow seeds of bitterness and hatred which may bear fruit for centuries to come. These and other disquieting problems are ably discussed by Miss Scudder, but she has failed to convince us that the finest types of character are being produced by the fierce industrial struggles of these troubled times. We believe, indeed, old-fashioned though it may sound, that unless Socialism comes as a result of the transforming of the minds and hearts of men, capitalists and toilers alike, which the great religious reformers and men of spiritual insight are alone capable of effecting in any age, it will be scarcely less mischievous in its effects than the unabashed despotisms of the past.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF WILLIAM JAMES.

Essays in Radical Empiricism. By William James. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. 6d. net.

WRITING some time ago, in this journal, with reference to William James, we ventured to suggest that the one thing above all others in which James was interested was his metaphysic, that total view of life which was to give some satisfying account and explanation of experience as it came to him and as he reacted upon it from the depths of a rich emotional and finely tempered nature. The collection of Essays recently published, under the able editorship of Dr. R. B. Perry, gives ample proof that our suggestion was not wide of the mark. The Essays have been gathered together from various places, and were written at very different times; but in them all James pursues the same theme and endeavours to make clear the same central idea. The present volume, says the editor, "sets forth systematically and within brief compass the doctrine of radical empiricism." Radical empiricism was the name given by James to his final view of things; it is "empiricism" because it "starts with the parts" and proceeds inductively with a continual return to the individual facts; it is "radical" because it "must neither admit into its constructions any element that is not directly experienced, nor exclude from them any element that is directly experienced." This latter stipulation covers the most fundamental tenet in the whole doctrine, the notion, namely, that the connecting elements in experience are as objective, as real, and as much "given" as are the facts of experience which unite or are united into an orderly system; "the relations that connect experiences must themselves be experienced relations, and any kind of relation experienced must be accounted as real as anything else in the system." This, we say, is the central idea in the book. It is not easy to grasp, and still less easy to explicate in any popular way, and its implications are sometimes startling; but anyone who professes interest in James must come to grip with this notion. How did the world appear to James? It stood before him, rather it moved before him, as an incomplete flux of which he himself was part, made up of substantive and transitive, or connective, elements, of what we ordinarily call things and their relations, all present and working in the flux. Many have thought that experience comes to us as a chaos of sensation into which we, by virtue of our intellectual activity, introduce order and system. What we call the mind supplies the connective elements to experience; but that James denied. For him the connective elements, the relations, are there, just as much as are the things related. In a simple experienced situation, say "hat on table," we have not first a collection of sensations which we interpret as "hat," and then another collection interpreted as "table," and further, a mental agency joining these two groups by a relation of "on-ness," which it supplies. On the contrary, we have "hat," and nothing but hat, "table," and nothing but table, and "on-ness," all, for the moment, united in one total situation, and immediately given as united. And the terms are unprejudiced in nature by the relation: it makes no difference to the "hat" as such whether it is on the table or in the cupboard; it is the same hat all along, just a bit of "pure experience" to which all sorts of relations can get attached. The hat concerned may be one which I wear frequently: then it is known to me, it is part of the content of what I call my mind, it can be, at one and the same time, on the table and in my mind. For what we call knowing is still only another relation of the same order as "on-ness," and just as much immediately given as a bit of pure experience. When the mind knows an object there is, according to James, no peculiar activity on the part of the mind: the mind does nothing. The mind is simply a bit of pure experience, having a special nature, no doubt, which gets connected up with other bits of pure experience by the relation of knowing. Consciousness, or mind, as a peculiar kind of being, exercising a special function, disappears; for James, consciousness does not exist. The world is reduced to complexes of pure experience, some called mental, others material, connected with each other by all sorts of relations. The time-honoured distinction between thought and thing, feeling and object, goes also; things and thoughts are not heterogeneous, but made of the same stuff, "stuff which is not to be defined in any other way, but simply taken as given, to be named, if one so wishes, the stuff of experience in general."

Obviously, such a view of reality, here so briefly and imperfectly outlined, requires much amplification and not a little persuasion if it is to be accepted. James, as we should expect, never tires of the effort to make his view clear; but there will always be two kinds of people whom he cannot convince. There will be those for whom consciousness or mind is an immediately given entity, given as different from all else and as peculiarly certain: "cogito, ergo sum," is a proposition which radical empiricism is not likely easily to upset, and, for those who hold even vaguely by this proposition, the distinction between "subject" and "object" remains paramount. On the other hand, there will be those who simply cannot find relations in the immediately given field of experience, those who never yet perceived "withness" or "and-ness" or the like. If you question the unsophisticated mind on this matter and put the case clearly, you will find it most surely declaring for the mind-made quality of relations; the mind gives order to experience. Nevertheless, radical empiricism is sure of a considerable following, even in its more abstruse and technical aspects. The theory of the externality, the independence, of relations is already widely held. The further implications of James's philosophy find acceptance where its technical basis laying is unknown; and this is a fact with which we feel no particular quarrel, for there is surely much to be said for a philosophy, the logical carrying out of which leads to pluralism, novelty and indeterminism, moralism and theism, and is peculiarly careful for "the personal and æsthetic factors" in life. In the present series of essays, James does not work out these implications of his thought, but they are well enough known from his other writings. His quarrel was with dualism and absolutism; the former he held untrue to experience, the latter conflicted hopelessly with his moral and emotional nature. He preferred an incomplete and moving reality, in which there was room for real, creative freedom and individuality, a world, too, in which there were no insurmountable distinctions; and such a world his radical empiricism gave him. Needless to say, there is wonderful freshness and vivacity in all the writing in these essays; James is never for a moment dull, and even the most startling propositions are carried gaily along with the most persuasive air of innocence and harmlessness. When consciousness is destroyed, as it is in the first essay, no one could feel hurt, the "mind" is so gently handled as to be unhurt; and when James deals with his critics it is as though he truly loved his enemies: save and except the wild Hegelians! These drive him to wrath and to despair. But then he never could convince them: what need, when his own philosophy of pure experience, uniting all distinctions, is only inverted absolutism.

S. A. M.

OF the forty new volumes which Mr. J. M. Dent will add to "Everyman's Library" next month, perhaps one of the most important is Roget's "Thesaurus," which Mr. Andrew Boyle has revised and brought up to date.

* * *

TEN new volumes of Messrs. Williams & Norgate's "Home University Library of Modern Knowledge" will be issued on September 11. Mr. Hilaire Belloc contributes another volume, this time on a comparatively novel subject, for which, however, he has special qualifications—"Warfare in England." Another historical contribution is Mr. J. R. Spear's "Master Mariners," a sketch of sea-craft and sea adventure from the earliest times. In the literature section, there is a biographical and critical account of "Great Writers of America," from Washington Irving to Mark Twain, by Professors W. P. Trent and John Erskine. Mr. G. E. Moore, of Cambridge, discusses the problems of "Ethics," Professor B. W. Bacon, D.D., presents a summary of the results of modern critical research on "The Making of the New Testament"; and Mrs. Creighton writes on "Missions, Their Rise and Development." The difficult task of re-stating the theoretic groundwork of "Political Economy" in the light of recent thought has been entrusted to the competent hands of Professor S. J. Chapman, of Manchester. The three scientific volumes are "The Making of the Earth," by Professor J. W. Gregory, F.R.S., of Glasgow; "Electricity," by Dr. Gisbert Kapp, Professor of Electrical Engineering at Birmingham; and "The Human Body," by Professor Arthur Keith, M.D.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—The Makers and Teachers of Judaism: Charles Foster Kent, Ph.D. 5s. net.

MR. JOHN OUSELEY:—The English Stage: D. E. Oliver. 1s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS:—Henry Demarest Lloyd: Caro Lloyd. In two vols. 21s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—Main Currents of Modern Thought: Rudolf Eucken. 12s. 6d. net. The Economic Outlook: Edwin Cannan, M.A. 5s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Vineyard, The Nineteenth Century.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE PAINTER.

A PLEASANT face, sparkling eyes, bushy hair appeared at the door. The bushy-haired man had a blue blouse on, spotted here and there with paint of various colours; and in his left hand he carried a painter's palette and brushes.

Sister C., a lady of the Order of St. Vincent de Paul, dressed in a grey robe and a widespread white cap or "cornette," looked surprised when the bushy-haired painter opened the door.

Meanwhile, the rain splashed heavily in the streets of Paris and the thunder rattled over the roofs.

"Pardon me," said the Sister in a soft voice, "I was told that here—No. 54, in Rue Paradis—I should find a family who are always good to the poor. I ascended the stairs to their apartments, rang the bell, and no one replied. Just then, hearing a sound in your rooms I thought I had made a mistake, and so I rang at this door."

The painter smiled.

"Never heed the mistake, good sister," he said, bowing. "While this terrible downpour lasts, pray take shelter in my studio."

She entered and took a chair. The chamber was large, and on the walls and scattered about were pictures of all sizes, glowing in many colours. Most of them were landscapes. Chance had led Sister C. to the studio of Corot, one of the most famous of French artists. Sometimes he painted human figures, but chiefly he loved to portray forests, streams, the dawn, and the setting sun, and there was beauty and wonder in his branching trees.

"You look after the poor?" he asked, as he wielded the brush, and went on with his work.

"Yes, and just now I am collecting funds for the baby-home at Saint-Marcel. We search out the families where the mothers are not able to take proper care of their infants, and we give the babes every comfort in our crèche."

Sister C. told all the story of the babies' home, and then, glancing at the window, saw the rain had ceased, and she rose to go.

"Sister," said Corot, "I little thought of having a visit from you this morning. I expected a friend. The storm which kept him from coming has kept you from going; and now I have heard the touching history of your labours for the children. I will ask you to let me help towards the expense."

The bushy-haired landscape painter pressed a bank-note into her hand, and added:

"Whenever you are short of money for the needs of the unfortunate people whom you befriend, do not fear to come to Corot. Nobody is allowed to enter my studio but my friends; I will, however, tell my housekeeper and the doorkeeper (concierge) below that they are always to show you in when you call."

"What a good soul this Corot is!" said the Sister to herself, as she passed into the Paradise-road. "Holy Virgin, protect him, and pay him the debt that I owe him!"

Two months rolled by. Sister C. had often prayed for the generous painter, but had not yet felt she had a right to beg for further aid.

But a hard case had come to her notice. In the Monnaie-Blanche quarter of Paris an old man had lost his wife, his son-in-law, his daughter, one soon after the other, and now was left alone with a granddaughter, aged eight years; and he himself had just had a stroke of paralysis. In the dull streets of the neighbourhood there beat many warm hearts. Poor as the folk were, they wished to help. Some came in to help the grandfather; some to see to the child. The landlord, who was not at all well off, did not ask for the rent; and the small shop-keepers sent food and other articles without demanding payment. But this kindness could not go on for very long, and so Sister C. once again rang the bell at the apartment of the bushy-haired painter. The concierge and the housekeeper had let her pass with a smiling "Good-day."

The man of dawns and sunsets and forests was sitting among a group of friends, and lively was the chatter.

He rose at once when he saw the white cornette, and the grey robe, and the gentle face.

"Good-day, Sister," he cried. "The storm does not drive you here this time. You have something to ask for your poor, I feel sure."

In a few moments she also had made a picture, not—as Corot could—with palette and brush, but with a voice that went to the heart of all who listened. Corot saw the old man, the little girl, the dingy rooms, the neighbours, the landlord.

"We want 200 francs," she said, "a hundred to pay for the child to enter an orphanage; sixty to pay the arrears of rent; and the other forty to go to the shopkeepers, and to some of the neighbours who have given what they could ill afford."

The painter hastily thrust his hand into his pocket, and drew out notes and silver—200 francs in all.

"Many thanks," she began—

"No, no," he said. "How sorry I should be if I could not assist. It is you who should be thanked, for you have taken all this trouble to tell the tale of suffering."

In Paris this painter had been born; in Paris he died in the year 1875.

It is said that in his last illness, when his mind wandered, his frank eyes opened wide, and he cried with joy—

"Look! Do you see how beautiful it is? Never before have I seen such grand landscapes."

Dawn and sunset and stream and forest—he still saw the fair scenes in his vision.

In Corot's soul also there were lovely things; and the Sister of the Grey Robe had found them.

F. J. GOULD.

NOTE.—Adapted, with a few additions, from F. Bournand's Pages de la Charité Chrétienne, published 1910.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR JAMES S. BEALE.

We deeply regret to announce the death of Mr. James S. Beale, which took place on August 28 after a long illness. Mr. Beale was head of the great firm of solicitors which bears his name, and he acted for many years as legal adviser to the Midland Railway Company. But, in spite of the exacting responsibilities of his official duties, he found time for other congenial tasks. An old student of University Hall, London, and with the blood of a broad-minded Nonconformity in his veins, he served the cause of Liberal Christianity with unswerving devotion. For many years he acted as chairman of the congregation of Essex Church, Kensington, and for two years, 1908-10, he was president of the Provincial Assembly of Non-subscribing Churches of London and the South-Eastern Counties.

The funeral service was held in the Crematorium Church at Golders Green, on August 31. It was conducted by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, of Essex Church, Kensington, with the assistance of the organist and choir boys. A large and representative gathering filled the building, and joined in the hymns, "O God, our help in ages past" and "Abide with me." In the course of his address Mr. Freeston said: "We have come to this church to pay our earthly farewells to one widely and worthily known amongst us. We have come to express our true admiration and high esteem for a nobly just and righteous man. To him whose passing we mourn this morning had been given both length of days and strength of purpose. He never shirked or slacked in the strenuous tasks of life; he was a hard worker, and we do not forget it. From the time when he first came from Birmingham to London, half a century ago, he played an efficient and a prominent part in whatever work he undertook. There are representatives here this morning not only from his own firm and profession, from the Midland Railway, which he served so long and conspicuously, and the Law Society, by which he was honoured so highly, but also from the Provincial Assembly of Churches in London and the South Eastern Counties, and from his own church in Kensington, of which for seventeen years he was the trusted counsellor and chairman. As a justice of the peace in the country town of his later residence, he was able to enforce the claims of a wider righteousness and also to promote methods of training and discipline among the young.

"We here to-day are but a very small company out of those who have sought and received his kindly counsel most gratefully in their hour of difficulty, and who have valued and trusted his far-sighted judgment and wisdom on many a critical occasion. And he was always so frankly human, with a keen sense of the humour of a situation.

"It is but just to him to refrain from all adulation. A man of few words himself, no one cared less, I think, for praise or compliment. Yet just because of that we cannot and would not forget what we owe to his quiet strength and foresight.

"This is the true gift of the upright to their day and generation, this the legacy and the memory he has left to those who inherit his good name and tradition. We bear tenderly on our hearts at this time the widow in the vacant home and the brother on his own bed of sickness: and we offer our deepest sympathy to all the family absent or present to-day."

MR. CHARLES G. BEALE.

In July last, the City Council of Birmingham recorded the eminent services rendered to the community by two of its leading municipal statesmen, Alderman Beale and Alderman Clayton. To-day Birmingham is mourning the loss of the former, a man who indeed served his city with a devotion and distinction rarely equalled, never surpassed.

In the Birmingham Daily Post, the impulse of his life is described as having its source in the sense of civic and personal duty, inspired and nurtured by a religious faith which, in the past, has kindled in Birmingham many noble characters, liberal-minded, unselfish, aiding good causes without thought of reward. His was a life nurtured religiously in the Church of the Messiah, which now loses a prominent supporter, a trustee of forty-four years standing, one who in his earlier years devoted thought and energy in the active work of the church and its institutions, and who in later life always had its interests and principles close at heart. It is possible to give here but a brief sketch of his career, and to indicate the debt owing to him from many quarters. He came of an old Nonconformist family, one identified with the life of Birmingham for many generations, and one from which several men who have rendered distinguished service to the town have already come.

Mr. Charles Gabriel Beale was born in 1843. He was educated in Birmingham, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and on leaving the University was articled to his father, and entered on the career of a solicitor at twenty-five years of age. In this same year he married Miss Alice Kenrick, daughter of Mr. Timothy Kenrick, of Maple Bank, Edgbaston. Throughout life she has shared all his interests and supported him in his public work in such a way that any appreciation of the influence and achievement of the husband necessarily involves the wife. Mr. Beale first became publicly known in connection with the management of the Triennial Musical Festivals, in which his father was then taking an active part. He remained on the Orchestral Committee until the year 1910, and being himself a great lover of music, the services he rendered in this connection formed an important branch of his public work.

In 1885 he was elected to the Municipal Council, and during the next twelve years served on its various committees with such sound judgment, business capacity, and zealous labour, that in 1897, whilst still a Councillor, he was elected to the office of Lord Mayor. This office he held for three successive years, and again in 1906, on the death of Lord Mayor Berkeley, half-way through the term, Alderman Beale for the fourth time filled the position. This municipal work, though hard and exacting, was to him at the same time a source of keen pleasure. He was at home in all its ramifications, giving of his time and of the best that was in him, always ungrudgingly. The details cannot be entered into here, but the spirit in which he toiled, and which he evoked in the community, can be judged from the statement made at the close of his Lord Mayoralty, that his three years of office had established a record in respect of public generosity, the various funds raised amounting to over half a million sterling.

Alderman Beale took a leading part in the establishment of the University of Birmingham, on the old foundation of the Mason College. His interest in education was always keen, and in the administrative work connected with the new University, this interest, allied with his great practical ability, found full scope. He was one of the first members of the Court of Governors, and in 1900 was elected to the honour of Vice-Chancellor of the University, the appointment being moved by the Chancellor, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. During the long illness of Mr. Chamberlain, the Vice-Chancellor was called upon to fill his place, and each year has conferred the degrees at the University Congregations.

As an instance of the wide recognition of his power, mention may be made of his appointment on the Royal Commission in connection with the Railway troubles in August, 1911. The small body of men appointed had a most difficult task, but they carried it through so successfully that a basis of agreement was found, and the strike came to a speedy end. For this averting of a grave national disaster, our whole land stands in debt to Alderman Beale and his four colleagues.

In the midst of all his labours, and all the distinctions they brought him, Mr. Beale preserved the quiet, cheerful, unassuming spirit that characterised him. He was a lover of simple things, and a lover of beautiful things. From the stress of civic work he turned for relaxation and refreshment to music, art, and the loveliness of nature. His house, among the mountains of Merionethshire, overlooking the broad estuary of the Mawddach, was an ideal retreat for one who must often have been worn with the heat and burden of the working day. Another great joy he found in flowers, and all these quiet pursuits, as well as the large public interests, were shared by his wife.

The influence of Mr. Beale will live long in Birmingham, and bear its fruits still for years to come. To the generations as they arise he will stand, as he does to this one, as a conspicuous example of civic patriotism, of brilliant ability dedicated to public service. And in saying this one must remember that there is usually another side to the achievements of a great public servant—the acts not publicly recorded, but known to few, the generosity that figures in no subscription list, the help quietly given when the left hand knoweth not what the right hand doeth. And in such deeds his life was rich.

Mr. Beale leaves a widow, two sons and two daughters. He has passed to his rest only a few days after his eldest brother, Mr. James S. Beale, whose death occurred on August 28.

The funeral service at the Church of the Messiah on Wednesday last was of the simplest character. A large congregation assembled, and included the Lord Mayor (Alderman Bowater), the Deputy Lord Mayor (Alderman Sayer), members of the City Council and magistracy, the Principal of the University, members of the Council, Staff, and Students' Guild and Club, and representatives of a large number of other public bodies and institutions. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. W. Austin, and a lesson was read by Sir Oliver Lodge. Mr. A. J. Cotton presided at the organ, and a selected choir from the Festival Choir rendered as an anthem, "Blessed are they that mourn," from Brahms's Requiem. At the close of the service the body was conveyed to the Crematorium at Perry Barr.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

"SANITAS SANITATUM."

SIR JAS. CRICHTON-BROWNE'S address at the twenty-seventh annual conference of the Sanitary Inspectors' Association, held at Sheffield, was entitled "A Plea for Sanitation." While strongly commending the Sanatorium clauses of the Insurance Act, he pointed out that "during the last half-century, without sanatoria, the phthisis mortality had fallen nearly 60 per cent.; that that fall had been secured by sanitation in the widest sense of the term, that it was still going on, and that if it could be maintained, phthisis and the need for sanatorium treatment would have disappeared from amongst us in two or three generations." Referring more specifically to the Act, he continued: "The tuberculosis dispensaries, which are to be established in all large towns, will act as centres of information and receiving houses, and will probably to a large extent supersede the necessity for sanatorium treatment by supplying efficient curative treatment in the initial stage of the disease, when it is most amenable to treatment, without interfering with wage-earning or materially dislocating home life. It is the housing conditions which should largely determine the question of removal to a sanatorium. When these are bad, where the patient cannot have a bedroom to himself and is a source of danger to his family or associates, then the sanatorium is the appropriate refuge."

A COUNTERBLAST TO (SOME) EUGENICS.

Perhaps the most piquant part of an extremely interesting address was the concluding portion, which dealt with some recent eugenist fulminations. "I would as soon question the existence of Sheffield as doubt that alcoholism, one-roomed tenements, back-to-back houses, employment of women in factories, and artificial feeding of infants have not one and all swollen the death-rate, and that a reduction in the amount of any one of these has lessened it. . . "

THE PROBLEM OF FEEBLE-MINDEDNESS.

We are strongly inclined to think, with all due respect to the Eugenists, who, we doubt not, when they have cleared up their own minds, will have something vital to teach us, that wisdom is on the side of Sir Jas. Crichton-Browne in his attitude to some of the most recent eugenist doctrines. "Feeble-mindedness will, I believe, be prevented more expeditiously and on a larger scale by sanitation, by skilled midwifery, by the hygienic rearing of infants and children, by the abolition or restriction of outbreaks of those general diseases that leave so many children blemished for life, by the timely treatment of defects of the senses and of various bodily ailments by expert and discriminating teaching, and the avoidance of the artificial production of stupidity, than by the best regulated segregation colonies. . . Much more precise information than we at present possess as to the transmission of characters is necessary before we can venture to exercise any extensive control over human mating. But even now something may be done by medical men in advising their patients, and by the creation of a moral sentiment in the community that in connection with marriage the welfare of the next and of future generations must always be borne in mind, and that it is discreditable for a man or woman to marry into a bad or diseased stock. Such moral considerations and restraints can only operate in the first instance on the higher and more cultivated section of society, but conventional notions and sentiments adopted by the classes have a way of soaking down into the masses, and something may be done by sanitation to raise the lowest and most debased to meet wholesome moral conceptions. It is by their domestic surroundings that people are greatly influenced in their habits and ways of thought, and practical sanitation in the case of the very poor is followed, except in the very dregs, by improvement not only in their dwellings but in themselves. Enable people to live in conditions of cleanliness, comfort, and decency, and you thereby help them to a higher social and ethical level, and replace recklessness and brutal passion by forethought and human aspirations."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Dean Row and Styal.—On Sunday, August 25, the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas preached his farewell sermons to large congregations, after a ministry of over twelve years. At Dean Row he devoted his sermon mostly, by request of the Provincial Assembly, to the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the Ejection of the 2,000 Clergy, to whom a memorial was erected at Dean Row some years ago. Amongst other things, he spoke of our heritage as handed down from Baxter and the ejected clergy—the principle of religious freedom. That is to say, that no doctrine or set of doctrines shall be made a compulsory bond of union. He pointed out that "though things are nominally, as far as the law is concerned, much as they were in 1662 and 1689, still, really things are very different. Uniformity, humanly speaking, there cannot be; unity there may very well be, and comparatively may very easily be. When we speak of Christendom, we are thinking not of the dividing sectarianisms, but of the uniting bases of conduct. In every church we are united by our hymns. 'As men get on to higher ground,' says Dr. Francis Peabody, 'they not only breathe more easily, but they get together, not by compromise or concession, but because they are attaining unto the perfect man.' The religious life is like climbing a mountain from different sides. Below there is limitation, obstruction, division. One cannot see far, and his neighbour calls to him, and is not heard. 'Follow me,' one says to another, 'I have found the only path.' But meantime the other is pressing up what seems a better way. As each gets higher, however, he sees farther, and the paths converge, and when, at last, each approaches the top he approaches his neighbour, and on the summit it is all one view, and it is a view all round. Gradually, but surely, the nightmare of a hope of uniformity is being dissipated from the minds and hearts of men, and a vision of natural, healthy, and worthy unity is more and more inspiring men." In conclusion Mr. Thomas said: "I have not preached you what is called a farewell sermon. Personally I have no intention of saying farewell to any of you. But as a ministerial farewell and good-bye, I would say what I am sure you would say to me: 'Let us remember that God is "the place of Spirits," that in Him we shall be forever present to each other, in Him for ever united, or in the prayerful words of J. H. Thom, we will say, "When we separate from each other we remain with God. His spirit is the meeting-place of all His children's spirits: our thoughts, our desires, our prayers, our faithful memories are all registered and hid in the bosom of our Father and our God."'" Mr. Thomas's two congregations have united in raising a fund as a parting gift, and as an expression of their affection and regard. In addition to a substantial cheque, they are providing him with a desk for his study; and Mrs. Thomas, to whom they also owe a large debt of gratitude, has received an oak tea table.

Halifax.—For some time the Committee of Northgate End Chapel have had under consideration the subject of the memorial to the late Rev. Francis England Millson, who for so many years ministered in all good things to the Northgate End congregation, and to the people of Halifax. In the town Mr. Millson's work for education in a wide sense has had abiding results. By the ministry of religion he made for himself a unique place in the affections and estimation of his people. It is only right that their regard for him should seek to embody itself in some permanent sign or symbol. The affectionate esteem of one of the members of the Chapel, Mr. R. E. Nicholson, has expressed itself in a beautifully wrought portrait of Mr. Millson, in copper bas-relief (repoussé); the Committee have accepted this kind gift, and decided to embody it in the mural memorial tablet to be placed in the chapel. Mr. H. Mawdsley, another member, has designed the lettering and decorations of the tablet, and the work of completion has been entrusted to the Keswick School of Art. The approximate cost of the tablet will be £50. It has also been felt that, if the contributions allow, it would be a happy thing to print a small selection of Mr. Millson's sermons, or to establish a biographical lecture to perpetuate his name in a subject of which he was intensely fond. But this part of the memorial scheme depends on the response of friends and admirers to our present appeal. Those who would like to join in this act of devotion to Mr. Millson's memory are requested to write to Mr. R. E. Nicholson, 17, Swires-road, Halifax; Mr. Jonas Teal, 25, Hyde Park-gardens, Halifax (wardens); or the Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder, 40, Clifton-road, Halifax (minister).

The Unitarian Van Mission.—Owing to the cold, wet weather during August the work of the Van Mission has been greatly hindered, no less than 27 meetings being completely given up. In Wales and in the Midlands alone 23 meetings were lost, but in London and Yorkshire, while the weather was sufficiently trying, each van was idle only on two nights. In spite of the weather, however, the Mission has held 102 meetings. Over 30,000 people have been present, and the average has passed 300. This gratifying success has been achieved mainly in Wales and in London. In the former district great meetings were held at Tylorstown, Treorchy, Ystrad, and Maesteg, and in London the excellent record was maintained at Leytonstone, Walthamstow, Tottenham, Muswell Hill, and Edmonton. The Midland van did well at Willenhall and at Wolverhampton, but was scarcely as successful at Wellington and Cannock Chase. The Yorkshire van had several good meetings at Hull, where a fortnight was spent; but afterwards it came again into smaller towns like Beverley and Driffield, where it had some difficulty in attracting audiences on several occasions. Yorkshire has been the poorest district during the whole season, except in the quality of its missionaries. It is gratifying to record the assistance given by the Rev. E. H. Reeman in Hull, and the Rev. T. Eric Davies in Treorchy, both of whom are Congregationalists. They have shown that it is possible for men of liberal sympathies to stand on a common platform without any suggestion that they sacrifice their individual proclivities or convictions; and the spirit in which they have done this deserves the fullest recognition. At Maesteg there is a strong Free Progressive Society. A mission was conducted there a few weeks ago by the Pioneer Preachers, and during the visit of the van the President and Secretary of the society invited the Rev. Simon Jones to preach for them on the Sunday, on which occasion there was some talk as to possibilities of closer association between the two societies. The development of this Progressive Society will be watched with fresh interest by the local Unitarian Association. It may be added that it owed its origin in part to a former visit of the van to the district. The visit of the London van to Muswell Hill is of interest, seeing that the London Society have for some time entertained the idea of holding services there. The meetings were largely attended, though a good deal of opposition was encountered from a small section, and the announcement is made that more meetings will be held in the autumn. A promise was also made at the closing meeting at Edmonton that something more would be heard of the Mission on another occasion. All communications respecting the Van Mission should be made and contributions addressed to the Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, at Essex Hall, Essex-street, London, W.C.

The Theistic Church reopens on Sunday, after its usual vacation. In the interim the congregation have had the misfortune to lose by death their venerable and beloved pastor, the Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A. (the founder of the church), for whom a memorial service will be held (at Swallow-street, Piccadilly, W.) to-morrow, Sunday, September 8, at 11 a.m., the preacher being the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, M.A., son of the deceased. For the present, services will be held in the church on Sunday mornings only.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS

THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK IN AUSTRALIA.

The Rev. Frederic Spurr, writing recently in the Christian World on the census returns, which give the number of Protestant "adherents" in Australia as 4,000,000 (1,710,443 of whom belong to the Episcopal Church), says that these figures would seem to indicate that Australia is a very religious nation, whereas the truth is that not 25 per cent. of the people attend church regularly. Moreover, in Australia, as elsewhere, men put themselves down as belonging to the Episcopal Church when they really do not belong, in an effective sense, to any church at all. Mr. James E. Liddiard, whose world-wide travels in connection with the London Missionary Society have given him much experience in regard to religious conditions in other countries, recently stated to a representative of the British Congregationalist that a great wave of indifference to religion, coupled with a love of luxury and ease which does not make for real progress, is passing over Australia. All the churches are having a big fight to contend against the forces of evil, and among the reforms which are most necessary is a reform of the Press. Some of the Australian newspapers, says Mr. Liddiard, are as bad as anything can be, and it cannot be claimed that the rise of the Labour Party has made for the uplifting of the lives of the people. "Men are indifferent to work. They have secured high wages, and the consequence is that by some men anything and everything is allowed to interfere with their work."

* * *

This opinion is endorsed by many acute thinkers who have visited the Australian Commonwealth, and Mr. Liddiard is not the only one who has pointed out that here in England we shall have to guard against a similar state of affairs. Dr. Ambrose Shepherd, of Glasgow, who was interviewed lately by the Christian Commonwealth, also alluded to this danger, and confessed that although he did not complain of the pace at which reform is travelling, his only apprehension was "that changes will come which will find the workers unprepared for their attendant responsibilities and privileges."

... The most dangerous times, as touching our social problems, are the times of reaction, and we have need to guard against the possibility of losing what we gain because we are unfitted ethically and psychologically to use them wisely. My great fear is that social and industrial readjustments will come before the workers are ready for them; ready, I mean, in an ethical sense, and that they will fail to get out of these reforms what they expect."

THE BRITISH MUSEUM REPORT.

The "Return" issued by the British Museum trustees shows that the visitors to the Bloomsbury branch during the hot summer of last year were reduced by 26,000, and those to the great building in Cromwell-road by 40,000. The average of sightseers is, however, still fairly well maintained, and the serious students are increasing in number. Among the new acquisitions to the Library is the fine collection of music from Buckingham Palace, deposited by the King, containing 1,000 MSS. and 3,000 printed books. Among these are 81 volumes in the autograph of Handel, and 41 in the handwriting of his amanuenses, the whole forming "the basis of all scientific study of Handel's music." There is also a volume of anthems and other compositions in the handwriting of Purcell. The list of the 50 volumes which the Museum had the right of choosing under the will of Mr. Alfred Huth from the famous Huth Library is also given in the Return. The trustees bought 28 other volumes at the sale, and acquired also, at different times, 192 English books printed before 1640. The acquisitions of the Natural History Museum are very numerous, and include a fine collection of birds and mammals from Western China, given by the Duke of Bedford; some 25,000 insects from Mexico and Central America, given by Mr. F. D. Godman; and many thousands of birds collected by the late Mr. Boyd Alexander, which have been presented to the Museum by his relatives.

RELIGION IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS.

The Times recently published some interesting letters which have been received by Professor James Mavor, of the University of Toronto, from Mr. Vilhjalmur Stefansson, one of the leaders of the Anglo-American Expedition to the Arctic Seas, who claims to have discovered a long-lost European tribe in Far Northern Canada. Mr. Stefansson, who has been for five years among the Eskimo, has a good deal to say about the appearance and habits of the people whom he has found in areas hitherto regarded as uninhabited, the position of women, vestiges of communism, medicine, and religion. "Of their former religious condition I know little as yet," he says of these people, writing from Shingle Point, Arctic Ocean, in April, 1906, "I merely note their attitude towards Christianity. The Kogmolliks seem to be natural sceptics. The work of the missionary among them seems therefore to be largely destructive. It is easy for him to persuade them that fish are not annually created by a woman of the deep sea, and that songs and dances cannot cure serious diseases or work any tangible results. But when he broaches the Genesis story of Creation and urges the efficacy of prayer he has less success. There are said to be but two converts here, after all the efforts of two Bishops and an energetic missionary for many years. But while they take little interest in the missionary's religious teaching, it is different with his secular instruction. There has been maintained at Herschel Island a school for several winters. This has been attended by men and boys of almost all ages, and a surprisingly large number can read and write a little."

AN AMERICAN ESSAYIST.

Margaret Graham is not a name that is known to many on this side of the Atlantic, but it must be dear to many in the United States, if we may judge from the charming account which is given of this writer by Cordelia Kirkland in the Pacific Unitarian. Mrs. Graham had that wonderful optimism which is characteristic of Americans, in addition to a bright wit which lightened the serious strain naturally to be expected in one of Scotch Calvinistic descent. But her life was not without its difficulties, or its "struggle for bread and jam," and it only ended after a long period of suffering. She could never be induced to furnish more than one scrap of autobiography, but it has in it the gay humour which lights up her piquant "Stories of the Foothills," and later essays.

* * *

"I was born," she says, "in 1850, but that is only hearsay, and I hope exaggerated. I have lived ever since, though I have been half-dead at times. I have lived a good deal, and have found it on the whole interesting. I have lived in California since 1876, and have in consequence no desire to go to heaven. I have been in love and in debt many times, but have always got out. I am afraid of nothing but the newspapers. I have found one thing worth having—friends. And I deeply regret that I have not been able to give the world as much pleasure as it has given me."

A "MUNICIPAL HOUSE CLEANER."

"While other women clean houses," says the Los Angeles Express, "Mrs. Crane cleans entire cities, and does it thoroughly and scientifically. It was while at Kalamazoo, Mich., where she was a Unitarian minister, that Mrs. Crane began her unique career. Noting the conditions of back yards, she quietly had photographs taken, and the object-lesson had its effect on the city. A Civic Betterment League was formed, and back yards, streets, dairies, meat markets, slaughter houses, then the workhouses, asylums and other public institutions were inspected, renovated, and put on a sanitary basis. . . . Hearing of her work, the call came from other cities in Michigan . . . Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Kentucky, New Hampshire and New York, in turn, asked her assistance and advice on their municipal housekeeping problems, and received it. One of her very novel methods is to establish vicinity housekeepers in cities, visiting saving collectors, citizen inspectors of streets, of public buildings, and, in most cases, complete reorganisation of public charities and institutions."

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had a rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International
Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

JULY.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, (M.A., Ph.D.)

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill, (M.A.)
Training. Alma Attwell.
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

VERY FINE 3 in. ASTRONOMICAL
TELESCOPE, by Steward. The object glass is one of Steward's finest make, mounted on portable iron altazimuth stand, fitted with two slow motions of gun-metal and Hook's joints. Cost £12. Price £6 10s.—Rev. H. V. MILLS, Greenside, Kendal.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to Editor, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

WAREHAM.—Rooms to Let in nice modern house; high situation, with a fine view.—Mrs. WOOD, The Gables, Worrett-road, Wareham. Recommended by Rev. H. S. and Mrs. Solly.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

APPLES.—Delicious Dessert Apples, 40 lbs. 7s. 6d., 20 lbs. 4s. Excellent cooking, 40 lbs. 6s., 20 lbs. 3s. 6d. 20 lbs. each 6s. 9d., 10 lbs. 3s. 9d. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Staepole Morden, Royston.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys. Bundle of Big pieces, only 2/6. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE. — Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Autumn Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable, wears for years; scores of beautiful designs; fascinating shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate, Saturday, September 7, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE BIRMINGHAM
CITY, ENGLAND

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3664.
NEW SERIES, No. 768.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

BEST NEW BOOKS

Main Currents of Modern Thought.

A Study of the Spiritual and Intellectual Movements of the Present Day. By RUDOLPH EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Jena (awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1908). Translated by Meyrick Booth, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Jena). Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

There are two main reasons why this book ranks as one of Professor Eucken's most important works. In the first place it is an illuminating study of the great movements which are now shaping the future of the human race, and in the second place it forms an admirable introduction to Rudolph Eucken's own Religious Idealism. The work covers ground of almost universal interest, dealing historically and critically with such vital problems as evolution, monism and dualism, the nature of reality, pragmatism, the true interpretation of history, the meaning of civilisation, socialism and individualism, morality, personality and character, and the function of religion. A point of special interest is the exceedingly penetrating criticism of materialism and naturalism. The book illustrates that tendency to bring philosophy into close contact with the real problems of human life which is so characteristic of all Professor Eucken's works and has so largely contributed towards their immense popularity. It is a book which should appeal not only to the theological or philosophical specialist, but to all who are interested in the deeper questions of the present day. The translator has studied under Professor Eucken at Jena.

By THE SAME AUTHOR.

The Problem of Human Life.

As Viewed by the Great Thinkers from Plato to the Present Time. By RUDOLPH EUCKEN. Translated by W. S. Hough and W. R. Boyce-Gibson. New Edition. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

The Gospel of Freedom.

By the Rev. H. D. A. MAJOR, M.A., Vice-Principal of the Clergy College, Ripon. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. (Inland Postage 3d.)

This volume contains a series of papers on theological readjustment written from the point of view of a Liberal Anglican. The author considers that at present the forces of the Church are being very largely dissipated by the contentions about, and contendings for, its dogmatic, institutional, and miraculous aspects, which have little interest for, and little influence on, the normal, modern man. It is, of course, no easy matter in the Church of England to transfer the emphasis from the dogmatic, institutional, and miraculous to the moral, social, and spiritual, but he urges that this must be done if the Church is to be in the future the centre of light and influence in the nation.

At all Booksellers'.

T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE.

Editors:
HERBERT FISHER, M.A., F.B.A.
PROF. GILBERT MURRAY, D.Litt., LL.D.
PROF. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A.
PROF. WM. T. BREWSTER.

256 pages, Cloth, 1/- net; Leather, 2/6 net.

Each volume is written by an Expert of the very first rank and is entirely new.

THE SIXTH TEN VOLUMES NOW READY.

51. WARFARE IN ENGLAND. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.A. (With Map.)
52. GREAT WRITERS OF AMERICA. By Prof. W. P. TRENT and Prof. J. ERSKINE.
53. THE MAKING OF THE EARTH. By Prof. J. W. GREGORY, F.R.S. (Maps and Figures.)
54. ETHICS. By G. W. MOORE, M.A.
55. MASTER MARINERS. By J. R. SPEARS.
56. THE MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Prof. B. W. BACON, LL.D., D.D.
57. THE HUMAN BODY. By Prof. A. KEITH, M.D. (Illustrated.)
58. ELECTRICITY. By Prof. GILBERT KAPP, D.Eng.
59. POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Prof. S. J. CHAPMAN.
60. MISSIONS: Their Rise and Development. By Mrs. CREIGHTON.

On Sale at all Good Bookshops and Bookstalls.

NEW LIST CONTAINING DETAILS OF UPWARDS OF 100 VOLUMES POST FREE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, W.C.

Elocutionary Entertainments

MR. ALFRED PERRIS is prepared to book engagements for a two hours' Entertainment, consisting of Dramatic and Poetic Recitals, grave and gay, interspersed with Musical items, vocal and instrumental, by Miss MAY PERRIS.—For particulars, terms, &c., address, 135, Padgate-lane, Warrington.

MISS DREWRY hopes to resume her Courses of Lectures, Readings, and Lessons on English Language and Literature early in October. For particulars apply by letter.—143, King Henry's-road, London, N.W.

Mr. G. BOWER CODLING conducts Classes in PUBLIC SPEAKING at Hasluck's Academy, Bedford House, Bedford Street, Strand. Commencing Friday, 4th October. Special Class for Ladies. Assistance given in the preparation and delivery of Speeches for all occasions.—Write for full Syllabus to SAM. L. HASLUCK, Director, 3, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS. —Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate with their own, ages 3 to 13.

The house stands on the edge of Blackheath Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.

They will be assisted by Miss Enid Branson (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.

For illustrated prospectus apply Westminster, Chilworth, Surrey.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, September 15.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. H. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. H. N. CALEY; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, B.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 only, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. J. ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. E. R. FYSON.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Closed till Sept. 22.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. J. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Mr. S. FIELD.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 AMBLESIDE, The Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, 11, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODWELL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. H. VAUGHAN, B.A.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, B.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Mr. A. STEPHEN NOEL.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKE.
 (DEAN Row, 10.45, and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. H. MAISTEE.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BUEBOWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. K. H. BOND.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.; 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. JOHN MOORE.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Mr. PERCIVAL CHAIK.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Mr. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.
 Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.
 Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

MARRIAGES.

FITZSIMMONS—TREMAIN.—On September 9, at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, by Dr. G. F. Beckh, Ph.D., Arthur William Fitzsimmons, son of W. J. Fitzsimmons, Esq., of London, to Annie, eldest daughter of Francis Tremain, of Bristol, formerly of Highgate.

LAVENDER—PARKER.—On August 31, at Manchester College Chapel, by the Rev. Dr. Odgers, Leonard Arthur, son of Mr. George Lavender, of Eastcote, Middlesex, to Olive Janet, daughter of the late Mr. George Parker, Hon. M.A., and of Mrs. Parker, of 47, Chalfont-road, Oxford.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

EXPERIENCED GOVERNESS (young) seeks re-engagement. Usual English subjects, fluent French, German, Music, Botany, Drill, Games; Cyclist. Excellent testimonials.—K. G., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MINISTER'S DAUGHTER (22) seeks post as Companion to elderly lady or as Nursery Governess. French conversation, lessons to beginners in drawing, painting and music.—M. L., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, Capable Nursing Governess for boy and girl, 8 and 9. Age 30, salary £25. Particulars, references and photo.—Mrs. CLARKE, Brooklyn, Wootton Bridge, Isle of Wight.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s. d.
PER QUARTER	1 8
PER HALF-YEAR	3 4
PER YEAR	6 6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£ s. d.
PER PAGE	6 0 0
HALF PAGE	3 0 0
PER COLUMN	2 0 0
INCH IN COLUMN	0 3 6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0 4 6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	611	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		The Origins of Sartor	617	National Conference Union for Social
The Secret of the Lord	612	The Beyond that is Within	618	Service	620
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Literary Notes	618	The Triumph of General Booth	621
Hymns and their Writers.—I.	613	Publications Received	619	The Protestant Mission to the Putumayo	621
An Encounter with Souls	614	FOR THE CHILDREN :—		The Social Movement	621
CORRESPONDENCE :—		Order.—I.	619	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	622
Death and Survival	615	MEMORIAL NOTICE :—		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	623
The Religious Outlook in Australia	617	Captain J. G. Johnson, J.P.	620
Prayers for Children	617

 * All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FROM the point of view of general interest and utility, Mr. Norman Angell's paper on "Economic and Moral Factors in International Polity," was one of the most important read at the meeting of the British Association last week. He pointed out that there has been a shifting of ground in the arguments which the friends of international peace have to meet. Formerly they were accused of being unduly idealistic; now it is admitted that peace coincides with our economic interests, and war is defended on sentimental grounds as an inevitable necessity for men who are guided by motives higher than those of material gain.

MR. ANGELL met this specious line of argument by insisting that it is impossible to separate a problem of interest from a problem of right or morality, as Admiral Mahan and writers of his school attempt to do. "What do we mean," he asked, "when we speak of the money of a nation, or the self-interest of a community? We mean—and in such a discussion as this can mean nothing else—better conditions for the great mass of the people, the fullest possible lives, the abolition or attenuation of poverty and of narrow circumstances; that the millions shall be better housed and clothed and fed, capable of making provision for sickness and old age, with lives prolonged and cheered; and not merely this, but also that they shall be better educated, with character disciplined by steady labour and a better use of leisure—a general social atmosphere which shall make possible family affection, individual dignity and courtesy and the graces of life, not alone among the few but among the many. Now, do these things constitute as a national policy an inspiring aim or not? Yet they are, speaking in terms of communities, pure self-interest—all bound up with economic problems, with money."

AFTER an interesting reference to the disappearance of the religious motive in war, Mr. Angell expressed his belief that the craze for sheer size of territory as a thing deserving immense, incalculable sacrifices would yield in a similar way to the force of events. The practical question which they had to face was this: Were the great moral divisions of the world such that they were likely to find them expressed in one national ideal as against another national ideal? Wherever this question was applied to actual politics no cases were forthcoming. The questions which really divide men—opposing conceptions of government and society, Socialism as against Individualism, &c.—were not French or German or British conceptions, but were ideas common to all these nations. All the factors were actually present which led to the abandonment of military force between the religious groups in Europe three or four centuries ago.

MR. ANGELL'S address closed with a powerful plea for stronger faith in our power to mould public opinion. "The final entrenchment of our critics," he said, "is, of course, that the general realisation by European opinion of the new facts of life which make war morally and materially futile cannot be expected; that the nations are impervious to argument, the public impervious to instruction. Well, suppose that were true, what are we to do? To assume that because men do not readily see the facts, therefore we shall not endeavour to ascertain the facts? To assume that because men are in part guided by temper and passion we shall not try any more to find the truth in these matters? Such a conclusion would imply a fatalism which the Western world simply does not and cannot adopt. We do and must reason and talk about these things with more or less of wisdom; we all do assume that men will listen to reason and are not indifferent to the truth when it is shown them. The fact that we are here talking, that the preachers preach, that men produce books and write in newspapers, implies that they all believe that in the end their preaching and talking and writing and reasoning will go for something and will do something to modify human conduct. "And in the end, of course, that belief will be justified. What we call public opinion is not a thing that descends upon us from the outside, not something outside our acts and volition, but the reflection of those acts; it is not made for us, we make it."

It has been decided that the Memorial to General Booth shall take the form of a Training Institution for Officers, and it is estimated that £200,000 will be required in order to erect and equip the necessary buildings on a simple but adequate scale. In an appeal which he has sent to the press, General Bramwell Booth points out that while the future of the Salvation Army depends more upon the character of its leaders than upon anything else, they require, in these days of education and of doubt, a far fuller qualification for their work than was needed in former times.

THIS question of training is one which the Salvation Army was bound to face before long. Its big experiment will be watched with keen interest by all who realise that the proper method of training for religious work is still one of our unsolved problems. If it can avoid some of the obvious pitfalls and dangers of a highly organised institution it may help to dissipate the atmosphere of scholastic pedantry, which makes the professional training of the minister of religion much less effective for practical purposes than that of the doctor or the lawyer. There is far too little obvious connection between the daily work of the theological college and the actual teaching of religion to ordinary people, with the result that many carefully trained scholars are very inefficient ministers. If the Salvation Army can point out a better way and help us to escape from the conservatism of tradition in these matters we hope that we shall be modest enough to learn. The words of General Bramwell Booth with their strong appeal to experience are in any case of happy augury: "We instruct them not merely in lecture and class rooms, but by daily conflict with the evils they are to attack, and the daily use of the Gospel they proclaim."

* * *

"It would be a pity if the opening of theatres robbed people of devotional exercises, but they who love the stage maintain that it has a power for good, and that the humanity of Shakespeare is helpful rather than inimical to the teachings of Christ." These sensible words of Sir Herbert Tree will receive a large measure of assent from religious people, but we are glad that the actors and actresses, to whom they were addressed at His Majesty's Theatre last Tuesday, did not discover in them a specious argument for the Sunday opening of theatres and music halls. They were strongly of the opposite opinion, and voted almost unanimously against any attempt to interfere with the weekly day of rest, in spite of the plea of one eager member of the profession that "nothing is more tedious than resting."

* * *

WE desire to call special attention to the manifesto of the National Conference Union for Social Service, which we publish to-day. It should be read in the light of the illuminating commentary supplied by Mr. Wicksteed's article on "The churches and industrial and social unrest," which appeared last week. In the common work of social service men find a more stable basis of fellowship than in schemes of theological agreement, because the actual experience of redeeming love is more universal than any doctrine of redemption. Moreover, the discipline of will and the sacrificial view of life, which it involves, link it inevitably with the noblest impulses of religion and make it the best form of consecrated Christian discipleship of which our age is capable. As Mr. Wicksteed said last week: "Can the question, 'What shall I do to be saved,' be separated from that other question, 'What can I do to save?'"

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE SECRET OF THE LORD.

BY THE LATE REV. E. P. BARROW, M.A.

"The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him."—Ps. xxv. 14.

AT the heart of everything hard to do or hard to find there is some secret. It is a word we often use. If you have the secret you have the thing. We speak of the secret of health, the secret of happiness, the secret of success. Every art, every craft, has its secret. New inventions are the discoveries of new secrets. Education is largely the teaching of secrets. We sign articles and serve apprenticeships in order to learn secrets. There is no profession that has not its secrets.

If there were no secrets in life there would be little stimulus. It is the desire to know what still remains to be known that spurs us on; to find the key to things waiting to be solved; to learn the "open sesame" which will make it possible to do hard things easily and well. Where life is without mystery, there life is sluggish and slow. Where no wants are felt but those Nature with open hand and open face supplies, there man is still a savage. Where he obeys the instinct to soar, to penetrate, to steal hidden fire, as the ancients put it, there, and there only, is the civilised man.

Religion has its secret. It would be strange if it were not so; for it has to do with another world beyond the reach of sense, a world which cannot be proved to the satisfaction of sense. Introduction into that world must be a secret, communication from that world must be a secret. The secret of secrets is, and must ever be, the secret of the Lord.

What, then, is the secret of the Lord? How can we tell? It is a secret which cannot be told. Not by one man to another. Intimate intercourse, communion, is always something which cannot be explained. It exists: that is all we can say. We speak of an understanding between two people: friend and friend it may be, parent and child, master and disciple. There is that which is between them, and once was not, and nothing can quite take its place. It is like a presence. It is something that goes with us and guides us. It is something which we can muse upon and rejoice in. What is it? We cannot say: it is a secret. So with the secret of the Lord.

It is of this secret that our psalmist speaks. All he can say is that there is a secret between God and man; some men have it, some have it not. The secret itself is known only to him who has it. He can only tell us under what conditions it is found, not what it is. There is one condition, he says, that is absolutely necessary. To have the secret you must first fear God. The love of God and the fear of God are very close together, much closer than the love of man is to the fear of man. The fear of man is the fear of one whom we cannot quite trust, who may misuse his power, who may fail to do us justice. It is not so with the fear of God. God cannot be variable or vindictive. He is too great to work upon our fears. It is not in His mind to inspire terror. But for all that, being God, He cannot but be feared. There is nothing so awe-inspiring as holiness; nothing so difficult to face as the thought of offended holiness. God does not intimidate, but in His presence all things must be afraid. Perfect love, we are told, casteth out fear, but only the coarser fear which cannot be combined with it. The finer fear is hardly to be parted from love itself. Love shades off into fear. Without fear that love which we call reverence cannot be. Therefore it matters not whether we speak of the love of God or the fear of God. To the Psalmist they are the same. There can be no sweet intercourse, no close communion, where there is abject fear. When, therefore, he says, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," he is thinking of the fear which it is good for a man to feel—without which, indeed, the secret of the Lord cannot be possessed. I want to make this clear, that true religion has at the heart of it a secret, a secret which cannot be communicated, is a matter of individual experience, and finds entrance only into the soul which is prepared to receive it in fear. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," that is to say, that obey Him and serve Him with godly fear.

How true this is, and how true it shows itself to be, when you come to think of it. The secret, the incommunicable part, of religion is not in its written precepts, or its spoken words, or its external acts, nor in rite, or ceremony, or ordinance, or form of admission, or profession of faith, nor in conduct, or feeling or sentiment, or even in the voice of conscience. It is an inner state of assured consciousness of companionship with God. It is described sometimes as a walking with God. The Lord is not in the fire, nor in the earthquake, but in the still, small voice of self-communication. There are signs which show where it speaks. Now and then it is given to us to catch hints and tokens of it in the good lives we know—lives often enough obscure and uneventful and remote. To borrow words from the author of the "Christian Year,"

"They carry music in their heart
Plying their daily task with busier feet,
Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat."

Theirs is the secret.

And this is true not only of individual lives, but of churches also. The worship may be a worship which we cannot approve, the doctrine may be a doctrine which we cannot hold, but the secret may be there. There may be a walking with God, there may be a communion of the soul with its Maker, or the peace which comes with that communion, and ordered life, and strengthening habit, and pure motive, and high aim, and wise discipline, and regulated action. There may be that which is the sole test of vitality, growth in grace, a growth as strong, as silent, as mysterious as the process of natural growth in the springing blade and opening flower. We may point out error and confusion of thought, and false tradition, and wrong interpretation, and delusions and superstitions without number, and yet the secret may be there and at work. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a maxim given to guard us against shallow judgment and hasty conclusions. How patient and tolerant we ought to be! "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." "The Lord knoweth them that are his."

Another caution is necessary. This secret of the Lord must not be confounded with that which we call Truth. It is Truth, but it does not follow that it is the Truth we talk about. I am not sure that we all mean the same thing when we talk of seeking Truth, following where Truth shall lead us, and so on. I am afraid what is often in our minds is only correct opinion, correct ways of thinking, correct views and estimates and definitions of things—of beliefs, of historical facts, of science, of revelation, and the like. It is good to face inquiry, no doubt, and not to be turned aside by any fear of results, but inquiry, after all, may only be intellectual research, and may not bring us to the Truth in any deeply religious and spiritual sense. For the secret of the Lord, I take it, is something which God imparts to us, rather than something which we find out for ourselves. Truth in the sense of absolute certainty will never be ours, and certainty of knowledge would be of little value to us if we had it. "If I have all knowledge," says the apostle, and have not something else, I am nothing. It is not knowledge that we most lack but fidelity to what we know, truthfulness, the truth of the inward parts, not correct opinion about God, but correspondence to His will. This is the pearl of great price which may be ours at once, without further search, if we are willing to pay the price; this is the secret in comparison with which nothing is more worth having, for it holds the answer to the greatest of all questions, which is, not, Where shall Truth be found is greater fulness? but, What is the witness in me to that part of it which has already been found?

We may well ask ourselves whether we are really in possession of the secret of religion. It is easy to wear the outward badges, to conform to outward usages, to satisfy outward standards; but the secret, if we have it, is something between ourselves and God, something cherished, and remembered, and observed every day, a converse, an intimacy, a habit of consultation, which makes itself felt in the hidden life first, and afterwards in that which is seen. We may test ourselves. To have it is to be lifted up above low and base pursuits; above the life of appetite and passion; above self-seeking and self-indulgence; above envy, hatred, malice, pride, uncharitableness; above pretence and deceit; above fraud and over-reaching; above cruelty and tyranny; above moroseness and despair. To walk with God, to commune with Him, to be taught of Him, must surely do that which even the presence of a pure woman or an innocent child will often do—make wrong of many kinds impossible. This, then, is the secret, so far as it can be named, withheld from none, but one which we must first dispose ourselves to learn. The secret of the Lord is with them who humbly and unfeignedly fear Him.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

I.

"We come unto our fathers' God."—T. H. GILL.

SIDE by side in the use of our churches and our homes we have two hymn-books, the ancient Book of Psalms and the modern collection of hymns, whichever it may be that has grown familiar and dear to us through long companionship. The Book of Psalms gathered up the devout utterances of some three centuries of the religion of Israel, inspired by the faith of the prophets and the deep experiences of many times of bitter trial and heart-searching, as well as of calmer, happier days. It became the hymn-book of the Temple at Jerusalem, and a cherished manual of devotion, familiar to Jesus in his boyhood and manhood, and after his day the possession also of the whole Christian Church. And our modern hymn-books, with a still wider range, gather their treasures from many generations of religious life, and from many lands, thus uniting in our aspiration and thanksgiving an ever-growing chorus of voices, from that ancient time, through all the centuries, to our own day.

The Book of Psalms set the standard for the hymnody of the Christian Church. Our first hymn-books, indeed, in the modern sense, were simply singing versions of the psalms in our own tongue, and the change to a wider range of selection, both as to the matter and manner of our hymns, was only very gradually made. The authors of the ancient psalms we do not know. Only from the voice of their thanksgiving, their confession, their trust, and aspiration, do we realise something of their life and the manner of men they must have been. But with modern hymns it is different. We know the great company of the singers, and it gives an added interest and a more living power of appeal, when we can realise more of the immediate personal experience out of which their hymns have sprung. These singers belong to many churches, often widely separated in matters both of theory and doctrine; yet it is one great harmony of praise and aspiration that we hear. In the fellowship of sacred song we find Roman Catholic and Unitarian, Churchman, Methodist and Baptist, and many another, side by side, united in one and the same thing. And we in our worship surrender ourselves to the pure spirit of their song, and forget the divisions of the sects. We no longer hear the noise of theological dispute. We are with men whose faces are all turned to God, rejoicing in His light, trusting in His love. In the sanctuary of praise men forget to argue. We rejoice and thank God together in the great harmony of singing voices in the church universal.

What is proposed in this brief series of articles is to turn to a few well-known modern hymns and to touch upon the personal associations of the writers' lives. And for a beginning let us take that stirring hymn of Thomas Hornblower Gill,

We come unto our fathers' God;
Their Rock is our salvation;
The Eternal Arms, their dear abode,
We make our habitation.
We bring Thee, Lord, the praise they brought,
We seek Thee as thy saints have sought
In every generation.
Their joy unto their Lord we bring;
Their song to us descendeth;
The Spirit who in them did sing
To us His music lendeth.
His song in them, in us, is one;
We raise it high, we send it on—
The song that never endeth!

That is a rich and beautiful utterance of the joy we have in sacred song, the more moving by reason of the tune to which the hymn is habitually sung. It is a joy which unites us to the great company of the singers of every generation, and most intimately in the fellowship of our own church, with the fathers who have gone before us. There is the glad sense of one rejoicing song, swelling to even richer harmony with the deepening experience of life and the confidence and strength of one sure trust, folded in the care of the Eternal. It is a glorious thing to take up the song in a great assembly, to feel that we can so rejoice together in strong confidence, to feel that what we inherit in that joy of faith, in the great communion of earth and heaven, is the supreme gift of the deeper life, the spirit of the Eternal holding us together, giving us our place in the fellowship, calling to us not only to rejoice, but to be brave and true in our day and generation.

That rejoicing faith was characteristic of the author of this hymn. It was written, as he himself recorded, in the autumn of 1868, while the first edition of his "Golden Chain of Praise," the book of his collected hymns, was in the press, and was in time to be included in the volume. Both the hymn and the title of the book very happily express his sense of the unbroken fellowship of the singers of every generation. Gill was an ardent admirer of Isaac Watts, who was the pioneer in the more independent way of English hymnody, and his aspiration was to maintain, not unworthily, the tradition of sacred song thus begun, and gloriously continued by the Wesleys. His endeavour, as he said in the preface to the "Golden Chain" was "after the melodious utterance of inward and spiritual religion in its depth and breadth, as possessing and gladdening the heart, as appropriating and ennobling the outward life, both individual and national." He hoped that his hymns might be made "of some avail for the strengthening and gladdening of other souls, through the grace of the Divine Quickener and Gladdener." That desire has been amply realised. A second edition of the "Golden Chain" was issued in 1894, with many new hymns—making 250 in all—covering a period of nearly fifty years of the writer's life. He died, March 4, 1906, at the age of eighty-seven. The preface to the new edition concluded with the prayer that his hymns might "minister to the maintenance and furtherance of that deep, broad, pure, spiritual Christianity, the unfolding and upholding whereof are the loftiest business of the Teutonic race, the utterance whereof is the glorious office of the English tongue."

Gill was a native of Birmingham, born there, February 10, 1819, a descendant, as he was always proud to remember, of John Spicer, one of the martyrs of Mary's reign, and on his mother's side of Richard Sargeant, one of the ejected ministers of 1662. Thus by inheritance a Puritan of the Puritans, he was brought up as a member of the New Meeting Congregation in Birmingham, to which Dr. Priestley had formerly ministered; but in early manhood, repelled by what he felt to be the dry rationalism then prevalent in Unitarian circles, he was drawn to the broad type of evangelical faith, which finds ardent expression in his hymns. A record of this change he has left in his memoir of Franklin Howarth, of Bury. To the end, however, Unitarians remained among his closest personal friends. To Dr. Martineau he was united by ties of warm admiration and friendship. They had shared the same feeling with regard to the early forms of Unitarian thought and piety, and while Martineau, as a master of religious philosophy, found a different way of deliverance, and became to his Unitarian brethren the prophet of a deeper spiritual faith, they two were very near together in the sympathies and affections of their religious life. Some of Gill's finest hymns were included in Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," and they have an assured place in more recent books.

The day on which "We come unto our fathers' God" was produced, Gill remembered with keen delight. The hymn has altogether seven verses, and it occupied him for the whole day. His story of its origin has often been repeated. "I remember the occasion," he said; "one of my most precious heirlooms is a staff, bearing the date 1692, which belonged to a Puritan ancestor. While handling the staff one Sunday I became filled with the thought which forthwith took shape in the hymn; with a lively sense of fellowship with our fathers, in their aspiration and endeavours, their sorrows and their joys."

The glow of that sense of fellowship is felt throughout the hymn, and not least in the concluding verse, which turns from the thought of the present communion to the time to come, in which our children, and those who come after them, must be the inheritors of our joy, and still maintain the glad song of faith

Ye saints to come, take up the strain—

The same sweet theme endeavour!

Unbroken be the Golden Chain!

Keep on the song for ever!

Safe in the same dear dwelling-place,

Rich in the same eternal grace,

Bless the same boundless Giver!

There are not a few of the hymns of Thomas Hornbower Gill which strike that brave, true note of rejoicing and victorious faith. Among the singers of these latter days we are glad to remember him, with his passion for freedom and simplicity of spiritual faith. Our worship is enriched by the songs which he has given us.

V. D. D.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH SOULS.

I HAVE no story to tell of solitary wanderings, where one meets with picturesque tramps and a convenient public-house in the vicinity. Still, the "plain unvarnished tale" I would deliver may not be without interest to some, and contains its problem for to-day.

It happened a week or so ago that I was making a short journey by rail in a southern county to fulfil a preaching engagement. It was Sunday morning, and I had the compartment to myself until just before starting time, when five labourers, probably platelayers, got in. They began to smoke, and so did I. Then conversation among themselves ensued; the chief speaker, who was busy stowing away a quarter of a pound of roll tobacco in two tin boxes, making many shrewd and sensible remarks. I could not help but listen, and I noticed that every noun he used was qualified by one and the same adjective, employed alone or in conjunction with another word. The same treatment was often meted out to the verbs. I cannot mention the word, for editors will not allow it to appear in print, but it was neither confounded nor blessed, the epithets apparently dear to Mr. Harold Johnson's tramp.

Now the use of this word is lamentably frequent in certain large sections of society. Wherever men congregate together it is difficult to escape from it. For many years I have acutely felt this abuse of language.

The question arose in my mind, shall I interfere? On other occasions I have felt tempted to, but discretion or timidity prevailed. But now the debate was clamorous within.

"Here is an obnoxious practice amongst your countrymen. It has been going on for years, and seems to spread. Such men as you see before you never enter the churches. How is a better state of things to be brought about unless some steps are taken to prevent it? You, of course, can't do much, but you can do something!"

Then came the other voice. "Be sure of what you are about! You know your objection to all kinds of cant. What would you feel if some one spoke to you in terms of moral or spiritual exhortation in a public place?"

"Yes, but," came the response, "this is no case of religious propaganda. It is a question of our national speech and its abuse. And it is being used offensively in a public vehicle. Are you a coward? You are brave enough to mount a pulpit and preach to sympathetic ears without fear of contradiction. But are you ready to stand up for the highest against odds? This opportunity is yours, you may not have another."

Upon this hint I spoke.

Turning to the chief spokesman, I said: "Excuse me, I cannot help listening to your conversation, and I notice that everything you mention you describe by a certain adjective. Now, I am accustomed to think of the meaning of the words I hear, and therefore I see the man you are talking about, his kit, your pipe, and everything else you have mentioned, covered with gore. It is not a pleasant vision; you cannot mean it. Why do you use the word?"

There was dead silence, but the man in the opposite corner smiled in quiet fun, as if to say, "That's a caulker."

To justify my interference, I continued, "I am speaking for the sake of our English language. Suppose a foreigner had heard you and then looked in the dictionary for the meaning of the word. What would he think?"

Still silence from the chief offender. But another who had spoken saw an opening, and said, "Well I reckon, mister, them foreigners has a word which takes its place." To this I demurred so far as my acquaintance with foreign tongues permitted me; but he rejoined, "Well, I reckon they have." "But," I said, "what meaning do you attach to the word? It's an offensive word, and you can't mean it in its proper sense." To this there was no response. And the train soon stopped at the station, where we separated.

I do not know whether I did any good, but I can't help thinking that they will never use the word again without recalling the incident, and perhaps they will ask themselves what they do mean, for it is quite certain that as yet they do not know. Anyhow, I felt satisfied at having spoken. I had no personal object, and had met them on equal terms.

Then as I walked away I began moralising: these men that I have been speaking to are types of a large class. They represent the bone and sinew of the nation. We cannot do without them. They bore our tunnels, build our bridges, lay permanent ways, man our army and navy, face death in various ways as part of the duty of life. Surely a religion that does not appeal to them has something wrong about it. And when we consider how more and more the modern world is passing religion by, does not the whole position require the most careful reviewing? Hitherto religion has claimed not to be of the world, while leaning upon the world for material subsistence. What if the point of view has been totally wrong? If, instead of starting from the supernatural, we should consciously begin with the natural and work to something higher? If, instead of the priests of God being a separate class, they should be the elect ones of the earth? Perhaps Nietzsche's doctrine of the Superman may be right though many of his conclusions be wrong, and as we believe man has been evolved out of the lowest animals, so man should seek consciously to evolve into something higher than himself? Anyhow, the religion that would make a division between itself and the world has small prospect of a future.

Then, again, what is the philosophy behind this strong language, unconscious though it be? And I recalled words I had often heard—"I have a — good mind to give you a — clout on the head." Paraphrase this by substituting, "Take care, I feel sorely tempted to give you a swinging blow on the head," and one immediately perceives the weakness and lack of directness. Other words may, of course, be substituted, but probably will prove equally unsatisfactory. What the uncultured Englishman seeks, then, is a word by which he can make his remarks emphatic, and he has chosen one which signifies life. We want leaders, therefore, who can enter into this unconscious thought of the people and lead them to a higher expression without loss of virility.

Let my last words be of respect and love for those whose language I have been criticising. I know the good heart that lies dormant within. How often do they show one little deeds of kindness in the city streets! And were I to say, "Mates, I am starving; give me something to buy a crust with," there would be a readier response from them than in many quarters I wot of.

E. C.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

SIR,—With that vigorous, masculine common-sense so distinctive of him, Huxley somewhere remarks that there is only one thing he abominates more than the dogmatism of orthodoxy, and that is the dogmatism of heterodoxy. Assuredly he would have discerned an apt illustration of what he was meaning in the first letter under the above heading that appears in the correspondence columns of your to-day's issue. I have no liking for newspaper controversy; least of all for controversy upon questions of the magnitude of the one here discussed. But I think it worth while to enter a protest, and a determined protest, against the shallow argumentation, characterised, as it is, by a tone of infallibility the Pope of Rome could hardly rival, exhibited in the letter to which I refer. Suffer me to examine very briefly the mode of reasoning, on the strength of which we are peremptorily bidden to dismiss our interest in one of the most momentous problems of human thought.

(1) We cannot, it is contended, obtain a scrap of evidence in support of the belief in the survival of human personality after death, but we can trace the way in which that belief originated. And, since the belief arose in consequence of "an erroneous interpretation of sleep, dreams," and other phenomena, psychical and physical, therefore, if we still adhere to the belief, our "stupidity" exceeds the "stupidity" of the savage, since we retain his conclusion whilst discarding the premisses on which he rested it. That is the argument, and a more flagrant violation of one of the most elementary rules of logical inference it would be well-nigh impossible to find. The validity of a conception is one thing, the origin or genesis of that conception is quite another; and when you are inquiring as to the truth or falsity of a belief, it is totally irrelevant and beside the point to begin talking about the manner in which it arose. The latter may be an interesting historical question, but it decides absolutely nothing in regard to the former. For example, in the early days of science, the earth was not only believed to be flat; it was believed by many persons to be round, and some very crude, and, to us, ridiculous reasons were given in support of that belief. But the crude ideas that gave rise to it militate in no way against the truth of the belief, and, even if he had no demonstrative proof in its favour, no self-respecting scientist would reject the theory of the earth's rotundity because of the fallacious reasons that led his ancestors to accept it. Science would be, indeed, in a sorry predicament if the mode of reasoning adopted by your correspondent formed the basis of its procedure.

(2) How the belief in a future life arose and whether its origin among different peoples is to be traced to similar causes are matters in regard to which anthropologists are by no means agreed. The investigation is one of extreme delicacy and difficulty, and, although the outcome of it is "perfectly clear" to your correspondent, it is far from being so to the investigators themselves. With that, however, I am not at present concerned. I note only the extraordinary assertion of its being on account of "original mental defect" that savages and primitive man come to believe in the survival of the soul. Does your correspondent, then, really imagine that savages and primitive men are virtually insane, and ought to be looked upon as lunatics? It would be a strange view of evolution that would follow from such an assumption. So far from indicating "want of intelligence," the circumstance of the savage being driven to reflection on the phenomena of dreams, faints, hysteria, death, and the like, is a sure sign of the awakening of intelligence. Phenomena such as these naturally and inevitably induce every rational mind to seek their explanation; only the dull sensuous consciousness is indifferent to them. That early thought should make mistakes in its interpretation is not to be wondered at; mature thought has made, and is making, not a few. But to ascribe the mistakes to "stupidity" is absurd. The savage would have been infinitely more "stupid" if he had not troubled himself to offer any interpretation. Plato maintained that the sun and other heavenly bodies are animate beings, possessed of souls. Was he, too, mentally defective, because he accepted, in this instance, the conclusion of his primitive ancestors, whilst advancing other grounds in support of it? Well, if so, I for one am not ashamed to share with him his "mental defect," and to shock the sanity of your correspondent by the confession that, so far as I can see, it is by no means so certain that Plato may not have been right after all.

(3) The subject of immortality, we are informed, has been debated for thousands of years, but "we always come out at the same door at which we went in." Therefore, "there can be no profit in continuing the fruitless discussion." Once more, the argument is a vicious non sequitur. Two thousand years ago and more Democritus and his followers were discussing the structure of the ultimate particles of matter, and from that time to this no absolutely demonstrative evidence on the subject has been secured. Sir J. J. Thomson and his fellow physicists are still speculating on the constitution of the atom and trying to devise means to put their speculations to the test. So it is with respect to most of the fundamental problems of science—the nature of space, of energy or force, of life, and so on. These are ancient themes, and no ultimate solution of them is within sight. And yet what scientific man ever dreams on that account of giving up the quest, or of turning away from it as "fruitless"?

(4) Finally, it is alleged that "there is no evidence whatever to support the belief" we are considering. That is a sweeping generalisation, and it is simply unwarranted. What kind of "evidence" is it the absence of which your correspondent proclaims with such unbounded confidence? Does he mean that no dead body has been known to rise from the tomb, that no departed spirit has been proved to come back to earth and to communicate its experience in spoken language, that no telescope has revealed the existence of what we, vaguely enough, call "heaven"? There are thousands of able and conscientious men who would dispute the first two of these propositions; for my part, however, I am willing to concede all three. But what then? Why, then, in the first place, the kind of evidence these statements exemplify is a kind of evidence we have no justification for expecting would, in any case, be forthcoming; in the second place, it is a kind of evidence which, even if we had it, would be in no way conclusive; and, in the third place, it is very far indeed from being the only kind of evidence upon which, either in this or in countless other matters of serious import, we, as rational beings, are wont to rely. I confine myself to the last point. Evidence of a sensuous kind can be furnished for no single proposition of mathematics, for no single principle of ethics, for no single fact of psychology. No microscope will unfold to us the secret of a mother's love, and we have no reason whatever for anticipating the invention of any other instrument that will. The supremacy of the moral law is not written in the sky, nor is the beauty of the starlit firmament to be demonstrated on mechanical or chemical grounds. Evidence of these things we possess notwithstanding, and possess in abundance. And evidence similar in kind to this latter we possess also for the belief in immortality. I am not now going to present it in detail; I do not claim, by any manner of means, that it is conclusive—of conclusive evidence for anything we possess comparatively very little; I am content only to remark that it is evidence which has been sufficient to convince many of the greatest and most impartial intellects of the world, including Plato, Kant, Brown, and Martineau. Now, it is open to any man candidly to express his doubts as to the cogency of this evidence; to doubts so expressed, and to the reasons urged for them, every genuine thinker will be ready and willing to give consideration. But to pronounce without more ado that there is no evidence, and that those who imagine there is are either mentally defective or stupid, is not argument; it is a form of narrow-minded bigotry.

Plain speaking is here called for. Dogmatism, such as that of which I am complaining, has done and is doing irretrievable harm to the cause of liberal thought in religion. It is repelling, and has repelled, numbers of earnest truth-seekers from a rationalism which, as thus represented, seems to them to belie its name. They feel, and feel rightly, that the great beliefs and aspirations which have made our humanity what it is, are not thus arrogantly to be brushed aside; that, on the contrary, they demand altogether different treatment at the hands of "reason."—Yours, &c.,

G. DAWES HICKS.

Cambridge, September 7, 1912.

SIR,—If by "direct evidence" is meant evidence palpable to the senses, Mr. E. J. Hunt may possibly be right in saying that of the survival of consciousness after death there is none. That would bar out all the alleged evidence of the spiritualist séance; and I should be willing, in this discussion, to set aside also the accumulated instances of psychical research, which are cited as showing that persons whose bodily life is at an end have yet distinctly communicated with friends still here, and thus demonstrate their continued existence. But supposing Mr. Hunt's contention to be true, that is a very different thing from saying that there is no ground for the conviction that personal life persists after the dissolution of the mortal body. He himself, at the conclusion of his article, pointed to the direction in which we rightly look for glimpses into that greater life in which we have a share, and which is not subject to the law of bodily death. I am not sure that I understand all that he means by his reference to a "more extended personality" and a "cosmic consciousness," but it is undoubtedly in realising more of what our personal life now is, enfolded and upheld as it is by the Universal Life, that we are brought to the quiet wisdom that is not afraid of death, and to the conviction that beyond the shadows of mortality, we, as personal, conscious beings, are destined to more perfect vision, new opportunities of service, and richer fulness of life.

This attitude of mind is surely more sensible than Mr. O. A. Shrubsole's contemptuous brushing aside of the whole question. The discussion may be fruitless as he states the problem in his letter of last week, but that is simply because what he offers is a grotesque mis-statement of the matter under consideration. If we are wise, we do not "smile at the stupidity of the savage," but neither do we measure the truth of our thought of God, or of the meaning of our life, by his crude imaginations, and the curious practices to which they may give rise. Our life has indeed arisen, on the physical side, out of the animal and savage, and still contains plenty of those elements, but a deeper, purer spirit has entered into it, and is, as we trust, ever moulding it to nobler issues. It is the highest intelligence, reverent and humble before the mystery of life, yet gathering to itself all the rich spiritual experience of the race, that has the best right to judge.

The persistence of our life, personal and conscious, I cannot regard as resting on any metaphysical necessity. Mr. Hunt, in the earlier portion of his article, says that "continued existence implies pre-existence." But is not that a pure assumption? That which endures from eternity to eternity is the one Universal Life, God alone, in whom we live and move, and have our being. Our individual, personal, conscious life He has given us. What we know is that it is not of ourselves, and that we simply rest in Him and accept his gift. And the more we realise of the capacity and possibilities of this life, with all the marvel of brain mechanism and the unsolved mystery of the connection between thought and affection and the bodily life, the more deeply are we convinced that we are more than the body, which is the instrument we use here and the vesture we lay aside when the time is come, and that for us what we call death cannot be the end. We do not know how it will be, but there is no reason for us to despair of continued knowledge and abiding fellowship, because here or hereafter it is life with the Eternal, by His grace, in the fellowship of our Father's house, to which we are called. An arid rationalism may mock at such a conviction, as a survival of savage ignorance and superstition, but the Spirit of Life bids us be wiser and humbler, and of a better heart.—Yours, &c.,

V. D. DAVIS.

Bournemouth, September 11, 1912.

SIR,—I read with great interest the article of Mr. E. J. Hunt on this subject. In considering such a momentous and absorbing subject, I think one should attempt to define consciousness in the concrete and the consciousness that persists, or survives: I faintly assume that Mr. Hunt differentiates in this respect, although I see much difficulty, and I am not sure that any such division has occurred to him. I take it that the latter form of consciousness is a substitution for what in Christianity is called soul or spirit or life—words used to translate the Greek ψυχή and πνεῦμα; or to use another illustration, consciousness stands for mind, mental power, the power to conceive and perceive, will, memory. If so there will be considerable difficulty, at least so it seems to me, in limiting where it begins. Is the consciousness of the savage on the same level in this respect as that of the educated man—what about that of the new-born babe or of the idiot? Then, evolution teaches us that this mental power is a matter of degree only, and is not the product of any faculty specially planted in the human race alone, but is capable of development. Mr. Hunt holds that it must have existed previous to the development of the most elementary form of brain structure: he refers to the conservation of energy, and says it is impossible to conceive of anything being utterly destroyed—he asks whether consciousness endures in such a form as to secure the preservation of the personal identity of the individual. Most perplexing questions are here raised. Although consciousness and "personal consciousness" are used in the article, I can see no difference between the two, nor between consciousness in the concrete and consciousness that survives: yet I am open to correction. If this consciousness is limited to the human race, why so? If so, at what stage of the human race did it begin to attain such a degree of development, that it would be "translated to a different plane"? I raise these questions, not out of idle curiosity, but to point out that they are inquiries which are bound to come to the surface; and if they cannot be answered, only serve to make our ignorance yet plainer. Mr. Hunt postulates that "continued existence implies pre-existence." Although I feel a bit doubtful about the meaning attached to "continued existence," nevertheless, I cannot admit it is the result of pre-existence. This appears to be a leaning towards the doctrine of re-incarnation, and the statement would require elaborating.

A great difficulty is that, so far as our knowledge goes, we have no experience, and no conception of consciousness, or of ego, without the environment of matter. The brain in the animal world, something akin to it in the nucleus of the protozoa, and something we have not yet discovered in the vegetable world, are the dwelling places of that wonderful will power, which is variously called life, volition, soul, spirit, consciousness, and ego. The connecting line, or the so-called missing link, between man and the ape next to him, was so fine or gradual, that it is not yet, and possibly never will be, found out. If the consciousness of the speechless brute, half man and half gorilla, who roamed over the primeval forest, was not worthy of survival (does not persist), why that of the Tasmanian savage of the last century, or the African pigmy of the present age?

Mr. Hunt says that if the personal identity be lost, death for all practical purposes spells annihilation; and a few lines on, "it becomes difficult to see how memory of present conditions could be serviceable in another existence where conditions might be totally different." It seems to me there could not be "personal identity" without "memory of present conditions." What but present conditions (that is this life) will there be to remember, and this must include personal identity? So if the future without personal identity spells annihilation, and if memory of present conditions would not be serviceable, Mr. Hunt's arguments would point to a non-belief in a future.

"Another existence where conditions might be totally different!" I have often considered, living as we do on a planet, which is going we know not whither, formed we know not why, and is part of a solar system, separated by almost inconceivable distances from any other bodies or systems, that the conditions, the place, and the object or purpose of survival after death (if such there be) are so transcendent in their majesty of silence, and so incomprehensible in their conception of reality, that faith, belief, cosmic consciousness, or human knowledge of any kind must stand appalled in utter ignorance, because they cannot afford us the slightest inkling or the most fleeting phantasy about these riddles of riddles. Of direct evidence Mr. Hunt admits there is none. On the other hand, I am not aware that science states more than that she does not know whether there is anything after death. Some of us may be agnostic on this enthralling question: none the less do we approach it reverently.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED HOWARD.

*St. Margaret's-on-Thames,
September 5, 1912.*

THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK IN AUSTRALIA.

SIR,—Allow me to take exception to the tenour of your "Notes and Jottings" on this head in the current issue of THE INQUIRER. It would be better if "acute thinkers" and others who visit the Commonwealth and then come home and talk would first take the beam out of their own eye, for then would they see clearly the mote that is in their brother's eye. There is no more indifference to religion in Australia than at home; nor is there any greater love of luxury and ease. The people of Australia are as clean living, as just dealing, and as industrious as we here at home. They have all our virtues and all our vices, including that of "putting themselves down as belonging to the Episcopal Church when they do not belong, in an effective sense, to any church at all." With, however, one exception: they do not come home, glance round, and go back lamenting our "sinful behaviour." What is true in this matter is that a great wave of indifference to what is commonly called religion is passing over Australia, and a good job, too. But Pure Religion and undefiled is all right.

So with the Press. It needs reform just as much as, and no more than, our own Press; and just as much as, and no more than, say, the pulpit. How does Robert Louis Stevenson put the matter? Something like this:—"There is so much that is good in the worst of us, and so much that is bad in the best of us, that it ill becomes any of us to talk about the rest of us." Let us clear our minds of cant and pay no heed to Faint-Hearts. "God's in his heaven. All's right with"—Australia. Whomsoever the cap fits, let him put it on.

All these remarks apply equally to New Zealand, Canada, and the United States. The Mother Country has no reason to be anxious about, much less ashamed of, her children overseas. The great Commonwealths that have sprung from our loins are heading all right. I do not pretend to be an "acute thinker." I am merely an ordinary journalist who has studied the question on the spot.

And when it is said that the Labour party has not made for the "uplifting" of the people, and that we in England have to guard against a similar state of affairs, I venture to observe that our people whether overseas or at home are not freeing themselves from one sort of shackles merely. But on this point it is sufficient to recommend the gentlemen whose views you quote with apparent approval to read carefully an article by "P. H. W." in THE INQUIRER for September 7, entitled "The Churches and Industrial and Social Unrest."

I am sorry that Dr. Ambrose Shepherd should be fearful that "social and industrial readjustments will come before the workers are ready for them." If that should happen, it will be the first time such a thing has happened. But Dr. Shepherd and others may be assured that it is not the workers who are unready for such social and industrial readjustments as are at present in sight. Amongst those who toil not, neither do they spin, there may be some who are not quite ready for them. The workers, however, are more than ready, are, indeed, getting a little tired of waiting for them—so that it would be wise not to delay them a moment longer than is absolutely necessary.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD RYLETT.

Tenterden, Kent, September 9, 1912.

PRAYERS FOR CHILDREN.

SIR,—I have read the different articles and many of the little verses with interest and sympathy. I am certain, indeed, I know, that such little verses, learnt in early childhood, may be of help all through life, the full heart of the grown-up or aged man or woman often finding its best expression in words endeared and hallowed by memories of the sacred moments of childhood. Therefore, I think we ought to choose the verses we teach our children with great care and thoughtfulness. For the child itself it matters, as far as my experience goes very little what the words are, it is the solemnity of the moment that impresses itself on its mind. I would not write simply to say this, what I want to say is: I think it altogether a mistake to try to teach children to pray. What we ought to aim at is to lead them to pray.

Therefore, if now I had to guide a little child in this respect I would make it learn those little verses by heart, and then at night I would sing them, always I think the same ones, together with it, and either before or after the singing, I would say my prayers aloud before the little child, making it feel what prayer is to me. Personally, I think, I would always choose the Lord's Prayer, because I think that the prayer into which I could most easily at all times put my heart. I would occasionally tell the child what praying is to me, and ask it to remember this, but I would never ask the child to pray while I sat silently listening. I may be quite wrong, but I feel so certain that I am right that I cannot refrain from speaking out.—Yours, &c.

MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

Folehave, Denmark.

[With this letter by Miss Westenholz this correspondence may fitly close.—ED. of INQ.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE ORIGINS OF SARTOR.

Thomas Carlyle: a Study of his Literary Apprenticeship, 1814-1831. By William Savage Johnson. Oxford: At the University Press 4s. 6d. net.

It would seem to be almost inevitable that the public estimate of a great writer should undergo three more or less clearly defined stages: the stage of exaggerated eulogy, that of reactionary depreciation, and, lastly, that of well-balanced recognition. The second or depreciatory stage usually bears some sort of relation to the stage of eulogy that precedes it; for example, in the case of a writer whose superlative merits have only been acknowledged very gradually, and who, maybe, has not attained any widespread reputation among his contemporaries, there will naturally be less chance of those extreme reversals of judgment which, in the case of a more immediately successful author, we have learnt to expect. And, perhaps, few writers of the first rank have had to pay a larger penalty for the unstinted applause of their own day and generation than has Thomas Carlyle. But already there are signs that the stage of depreciation in Carlyle's case has been more than reached, and thinking people who have watched recent developments in literary criticism and in philosophical speculation can hardly fail to recognise the stress that is once more being laid upon those fundamental principles of man's spiritual life which the seer of Chelsea asserted. Let it be freely admitted that a portion of Carlyle's teaching is the outcome of a somewhat limited and biased vision; that the passion for detailed analysis, using this word in our modern scientific sense, was lacking in him. But, when all has been said, the permanent truths underlying such genuinely prophetic writings as "Sartor Resartus" and "Past and Present," combined with that rugged splendour of diction which is peculiar to their author, constitute an imperishable legacy to mankind.

Several studies of Carlyle have recently appeared, and, among these, the little book by Professor William Savage Johnson is noteworthy, as dealing with that highly important formative period of the great man's life, 1814 to 1831, during which he served his "literary apprenticeship." These investigations in literary and mental development were, the author tells us, the result of certain lectures on Carlyle which were delivered in Yale University and elsewhere: a "primary aim" of the volume has been "to render clearer to general readers the meaning and origin of 'Sartor.'" Very interesting is the sketch of early influences presented in the "Introduction": we there see the youthful genius pursuing his studies, until, in 1817, the reading of Mme. de Staël's "Germany" set his thoughts in the fruitful direction of German literature. We have, also, glimpses of him at work on various essays dealing with such authors as Goethe, Novalis, Schiller, &c.; and we follow him at length, after a time of struggle and doubt, into the region of assured conviction. The "things that are not seen" draw him:

human life, he declares, is "but a Shadow and a Show"—we must look "beyond" for its "Substance and Truth."

The chapter on "Philosophy and Religion" brings out very clearly the indebtedness of Carlyle to Kant and the German Transcendentalists; on two of their doctrines does he lay special emphasis, viz., the doctrine of "Primitive Truth" (intuition—not sense—he regards as the basis from which philosophy must build), and the doctrine of "subordination of the Understanding to the Reason" (the poetical and ethical "Reason" is, he maintains, higher than the merely logical and argumentative "Understanding"). Any man or any system that ignores the Mystery that is inherent in all existence, stands condemned. Passage after passage in "Sartor Resartus" could be quoted to illustrate the same mystical standpoint. Here, too, we are reminded that Carlyle is unwilling to identify Religion with any of its forms; he distinguishes between the unchanging "spirit or reality" and those "forms or phenomena" which are in a continual state of flux. The essence of the Christian Religion is found in its "spirit of humility, reverence, and self-denial"; all Books, Revelations, and Traditions are quite subsidiary.

Space will not allow more than the briefest allusion to the chapter on "Theories of Poetry" (Carlyle did not sufficiently recognise the value of technique in poetry), and to the chapter entitled: "Spiritual History" (emphasis on the spiritual aspect of individual men led to a particular "biographical method"). In chapter VI. ("The Times") Professor Johnson points out that, from the very beginning Carlyle was no mere dreamer or spinner of mental cobwebs, but was chiefly concerned with the actual needs of his own day; it was because he saw in the environment of those early-to-mid-nineteenth-century decades a pitiful lack of that "dynamic" force which has been at the root of all great social and individual movements in human history, that he drew the attention of his contemporaries to the antidote to "materialism" which German literature and thought offered. Every great age had been an "age of Faith," and here was an age of Machinery and of Negation. Now, the religion of external authority might be dead, but the religion of "reason and intuition" that Kant and other German teachers indicated, was impregnable; herein it was possible to renew the springs of human endeavour and achievement. While thus laying stress upon the spiritual bases of life, Carlyle was, perhaps, too impatient of schemes for social reorganisation, but his message as to the moral dynamic needful for Society and Individual alike, may well be re-enforced to-day, when we are in some danger of treating the outer framework or mechanism as an end in itself. The final chapters ("Sartor Resartus" and "Conclusion") deal with the sources (Goethe, Fichte, &c.) that lie behind Teufelsdröck's "Philosophy of Clothes," and with "Sartor" as the culmination of this formative period in the seer's life.

It is worth noting that a good deal is said throughout the volume on the subject of that comparatively little-known philosophical romance, "Wotton Reinfred"

(1827-28). This unfinished effort is entered, along with many other writings by and about Carlyle, in the useful bibliographical list given at the end of the book. Lovers of Carlyle are strongly recommended to read for themselves this most suggestive little work.

JONATHAN NIELD.

THE BEYOND THAT IS WITHIN. By Émile Boutroux. Translated by Jonathan Nield. London: Duckworth & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

THE recently quickened activity of philosophic thought in France is one of the most pleasant facts we can contemplate; and there ought to be a ready welcome for such careful work as M. Boutroux gives us in these three lectures. Amidst so much widespread doubt as to the value of intellectualism, and even of intellect, it is a useful task for a philosopher to set himself to present a steady view of the relation between philosophy and science; for any radical breach between the two must, for modern men, spell disaster. The problem is thus stated: How, if we rely upon science, are we to think philosophically; and how, if we aim at satisfying needs that she ignores, can we still adhere to the scientific standpoint? Our confidence in the author's method is strengthened at the outset by his recognition of what we might, perhaps, call the weightiest result hitherto of the world's intellectual experience—that, on the one hand, the human mind thinks under the solicitation of acts; and, on the other hand, that it understands facts in proportion as its philosophic thought progresses. The first lecture, which gives its title to the book, while reminding us of Bergson in its presentation of the life of thought as for ever endeavouring to outstrip itself, has just that something more positive that we miss in Bergson. The Inner Beyond of which we are conscious is shown to be the condition of essential elements of human life, for without it we could not act, or will, or perceive. Another powerful lecture shows that morality rests for its validity upon religious postulates.

LITERARY NOTES.

"THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LIFE OF FATHER TYRRELL," on which Miss Maud Petre has been engaged for some considerable time, will be published this autumn by Mr. Edward Arnold in two volumes. The first volume, which is autobiographical, will cover the period from George Tyrrell's birth in 1861 to the year 1885, including an account of his family, his childhood, school-days, and youth in Dublin; his conversion from Agnosticism, through a phase of High Church Protestantism to Catholicism; his experiences in Cyprus and Malta, where he lived as a probationer before entering the Society of Jesus; his early life as a Jesuit, with his novitiate and first studies in scholastic philosophy and Thomism. This autobiography, written in 1901, ends just before the death of his mother, and was not carried any farther. It is edited with notes and supplements to each chapter by Miss Petre. The second volume, which takes up the story where the first ends, deals chiefly with the storm and stress period of his later years. Large use is made of his own notes, and of his letters, of which a great number have been lent by correspondents of all shades of thought. Various documents of importance figure in this later volume, in which the editor aims at making the history as complete and objective as possible. Incidentally some account is given of the general movement of thought known as "Modernism," but the chief aim of the writer has been to describe the part which Father Tyrrell himself played in this movement, and the successive stages of his mental development as he brought his scholastic training to bear on the modern problems that confronted him. The work ends with his death on July 15, 1909, and the events immediately subsequent to his death.

* * *

"A SURVEY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, 1780-1830," by Professor Oliver Elton, is also announced by the same firm. This book is not so much a history as a critical review in an historical setting, a series of personal impressions and valuations of artists and of their works, and it deals with the half century of English literature which opens with the first work of Blake and Cowper and closes with the last years of Scott.

* * *

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD will also publish "Discipline and National Efficiency," by the late Major-General Sir F. Maurice, K.C.B., with a Memoir by his son, Major F. Maurice. The memoir describes Sir Frederick Maurice's early life, the influence upon him of his father, Frederick Denison Maurice, his part in the small wars of the Victorian era, his efforts to assist his friend Lord Wolseley with pen and voice in the reform of our national defences, his work as a military historian and educationalist, and his efforts in the cause of national physical improvement.

* * *

"THROUGH FACTS TO FAITH," by the Rev. J. M. Thompson, is another interesting announcement by Mr. Edward Arnold. It contains the substance of a course of lectures delivered at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, in Lent of the present year. Without retracting a word of his former contentions, Mr. Thompson tries to show that the essence of the Christian faith is not weakened, but strengthened, by accepting the conclusions of historical and scientific criticism.

* * *

DR. ALBERT SCHWEITZER has written a sequel to "The Quest of the Historical Jesus" entitled "Paul and his Interpreters: A Critical History," which has been translated by W. Montgomery, B.A., B.D., and will be published shortly by Messrs. A. & C. Black. It is the duty, the author thinks, of anyone who offers a new reading of the life of Jesus, not to leave it standing isolated, but to show how it connects with the history of doctrine. Here Paul is the crux. How is he related on the one hand to the primitive Christian community and on the other to the early Greek theology? Dr. Schweitzer's work is in form a history—and a very useful history—of German Pauline scholarships, but he uses the history in order to show how the problems have developed organically, as it were, in the natural course of the study of the subject, and in his account of the various writers criticism keeps pace with exposition.

* * *

A NEW book, dealing with the British aristocracy, by Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M.P., author of "The Camel and the Needle's Eye," is announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin for publication later in the year. Mr. Ponsonby attempts to analyse the present position of the governing class in this country, noting their continued social ascendancy, combined with a decline in their political power, and criticising the training of their children in the public schools and at the Universities.

* * *

THOSE who have read Mr. James Bryce's delightful "Impressions of South Africa" will welcome the announcement of a new book by him entitled "South America: Observations and Reflections," which Messrs. Macmillan will publish this month. The volume is the product of a journey made by the author through South America, and records his impressions regarding scenery, social and economic phenomena, the people, and the prospects for the development of industry and commerce in Panama, Peru, Bolivia, Chili, Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. Mr. Bryce also deals with the relics of prehistoric civilisation, the native Indian population, and the conditions of political life in the Republics.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will also publish "George Frederick Watts: the Annals of an Artist's Life," by Mrs. Watts, and a new book by Mr. Frederic Harrison, entitled "Among my Books, and Other Reviews and Essays." Six of Mr. Harrison's essays have already appeared in the English Review.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. DENT & SONS:—Poésies: A. Chenier. 1s. net.
MR. H. FROWDE:—Truths or Truisms: W. Stebbing. Part ii. 4s. net.
MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—A Chinese St. Francis, or the Life of Brother Mao: C. C. Brown. 2s. 6d. net. Catch-My-Pal: The Rev. R. J. Patterson, LL.B. 2s. net.
THE PATH PUBLISHING CO.:—Fellowship in Work: A. L. Pogosky. 6d. net.
MESSRS. PUTNAM'S SONS:—The Promise of the Christ Age in Recent Literature: W. E. Mosher, Ph.D. 5s. net. The Historic Jesus: C. S. Lester. 10s. 6d. net.
MESSRS. H. RAWSON & CO.:—The Immanence of God and the Individuality of Man: Sir H. Jones, LL.D., D.Litt. 6d. net.
MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE:—Home University Library: Electricity, Prof. Gisbert Kapp; Great Writers of America, Prof. W. P.

Trent and Prof. J. Erskine; Ethics, G. W. Moore, M.A.; The Human Body, Prof. A. Keith, M.D.; The Making of the Earth, Prof. J. W. Gregory; Political Economy, Prof. S. J. Chapman; Missions, their Rise and Development, Mrs. Creighton; The Making of the New Testament, Prof. B. W. Bacon; Warfare in England, Hilaire Belloc; Master Mariners, J. R. Spears. 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Review of Theology and Philosophy. Cænobium.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ORDER.

I.

MORE than two hundred years ago an English poet, named Pope, said,

"Order is Heaven's first law."

And quite lately a well-known English thinker said about education, that the first habit we ought to learn by practice is Obedience; the second, Order; and the third, Consideration for others. The three things are really a good deal bound up in one another. Whoever is orderly will probably be obedient and thoughtful also.

We discussed Obedience not long ago here, so we may go on to think a bit about Order. Perhaps people will say, "Oh! but that is such a tiny little mite of a duty. Just keeping things in their places, and not being late, and so on. The Order that poet of yours meant, he says, is about Heaven; probably the stars and things like that. If you want to preach to us, preach about truth-telling, or courage, or generosity. But just Order . . .!"

All the same, Order is a pretty important thing; and not alone for one's self. (Indeed, when you come to think of it, scarcely anything is, just only for one's self!)

Try to realise first what it means in the small things of life, whether people are orderly or not. Look at the discomfort caused in a household by untidy ways. Books, papers, thrown anyhow; chairs let stand awry, just as the last sitters stood up from them; muddy boot-marks on the floor. . . . What confusion, what extra trouble these bits of want-of-order make for mother or maid, both probably with their hands full of really unavoidable work. Then, unpunctuality—the happy-go-lucky people for whom the dinner-bell rings in vain—who never worry about being late! Unfortunately, neither do they worry about the vexation they cause to others by this want of manners. Good breeding maintains good Order. We cannot begin too young to practise politeness; and, therefore, the habits of Order which go to the making of gentle-folk must begin soon, too. As the Germans say, "What little Jack didn't do, Big John can't do!"

But besides its effect upon others, the lack of Order is very bad for one's self. Once I read a story of a very poor boy whose mother heard with joy of a place her son could fill, and there earn money for them both. It was a good way off, and he was to present himself there to be inspected on a certain day, at a certain hour. The mother carefully washed and mended his poor clothes, and contrived also to get him a pair of new shoes. The boy was greatly excited by all this. When he went to bed, the last night at home, he laid the new shoes beside him on the floor; but he forgot to put them right and left as his mother had taught him to do. Then he overslept himself, so that the following morning, rising before daylight, and being rather flustered, he put the new shoes on wrong. But in his hurry and agitation he never noticed the mistake till he was on his way.

Forth he fared. The sun rose; grew very hot; his feet began to ache. But he was too anxious about being in time to stop to change the offending shoes. He persevered, till he could bear the pain no longer. He sat down, and took off the shoes. How swollen and blistered were his feet! He bathed them in a pool by the wayside, and the sweet, cool water refreshed him and soothed the pain. He felt quite comforted as he stood up to go on again, this time having the right shoe on the right foot, and the left one ditto. But the relief did not last. The shoes pressed on his tired feet still. Soon the pain was as bad as ever. He could scarcely limp along, and went so slowly! And how the time was going by! The sun was right overhead now; he would be late. He would lose the place. He began to cry, partly with the agony of his feet, partly because he was so weary, but still more because he was afraid the master would not take him at all; and then, what would become of him and all the fine hopes his mother had had?

In despair, he took off the shoes, and started to run barefoot the rest of the way. It was probably the best thing he could have done. Still, what a pitiable little figure he was when he reached the end of that weary way! Fancy him—barefoot and with rumpled hair that his mother had combed so smoothly for him only a few hours before, and tracks where the tears had coursed down his dusty poor little face, not to speak of his being two hours behind the appointed time! What master would care to take such a silly, feckless little fellow into his employment?

In the story that one mistake spoiled his whole life. But I choose to make a different ending to it. I think it more likely that the master's wife took pity on the child. She may have had a little son about the same age as our careless boy. So she probably took him in hand, and bathed and dressed his feet with ointment, and gave him food and drink; and then the little lad took courage, and explained things; and the master overlooked that first fault; and the boy never again let the want of Order interfere with what he had undertaken to do.

I say my ending is quite probable, and far more pleasant than the one I used to read. But you can see how such things can happen, and how a very small bit of carelessness may mar a fine chance in life. This little boy, we may well believe, got a lesson that he never forgot; so that, beyond the discomfort he brought upon himself, not to speak of the agony of doubt and misgivings he had to endure, while painfully hurrying along to his appointment, the want of Order of which he had been guilty did not seem to matter so much. He had his lesson, and he profited by it.

The worst of it is, that so often we do these careless little things, and nothing happens; or rather, at the time nothing seems to happen.

"The worst of it?" you say, with wonder. Yes! for then we don't get the lesson we so badly need. And we go on doing the careless things till they grow into a habit; and Habit, it has been said, makes Character; and Character makes Destiny.

What a lot about just a pair of shoes! Ah, yes; but it's the little things that count. You know the lines about

"Little drops of water Little grains of sand."

That is said about the things we see, the visible world about us. But far more wonderful, far more important are the things we don't see, and which also depend on Order for the effect they are to have upon us. Order is "Heaven's first law," and rules the things which are not seen, but which are eternal. This may seem like talking about things that are away out of our reach. Not so! Heaven and Happiness are about us; we can all do something towards making them part of daily life, for ourselves as well as for others. And one of the best means of doing this is by keeping Order in our hearts and minds, as well as in our outer acts; by restraining our tongues and our tempers, and taking heed to our ways.

K. F. P.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

CAPTAIN J. G. JOHNSON, J.P.

WE regret to announce the death of Captain John Goode Johnson, J.P., which took place at Brinnington House, Stockport, on Tuesday, Sept. 3, at the age of 81. Mr. Johnson's retirement from public life, owing to ill-health, four years ago, was deeply regretted by his colleagues labouring in the many spheres of useful work with which he had been associated, and to those who had noticed his increasing feebleness his death was not altogether unexpected. His public life was a long and honourable one. In comparatively early life he came to the front as an earnest and energetic Liberal, devoted to the progressive policy of the party, and staunch to the principle of Free Trade. From 1877 to 1883 he was vice-president of the Stockport Reform Association; 1883 to 1902 vice-president of the Liberal Association; 1884 to 1897, and 1901 to 1903, vice-president; and 1898 to 1903 president of the Stockport Reform Club. Whilst a member of the Town Council, which he entered in 1883, he rendered very valuable services in the interests of the ratepayers, and took a high place in important debates, his principal efforts being associated with his chairmanship of the Highways and Sewers Committee. During a portion of this period Captain Johnson was also a member of the Stockport Board of Guardians.

In 1893 he was appointed a magistrate, and until illness prevented him he was a regular attender on the Bench. In his earlier days he was an enthusiastic supporter of the Volunteer (now Territorial) movement, and he manifested a keen interest in it up to the time of his death. For many years he was chairman of the Palmer Mills Co., Ltd., Stockport, and was largely responsible for its successful career. He was also a Governor of the Pendlebury Charity and of the Stockport Grammar School; member of the Stockport Infirmary Board; former chairman of the Stockport Institution for the Blind, the Deaf, and the Dumb; hon. treasurer of the Stockport Police Aided Association, of which he was one of the founders; and many other local institutions having for their object the welfare of the poor and other charities.

In religion he was a Unitarian, and along with the members of his family was a strong supporter of the Stockport Unitarian Church, which has suffered a severe blow by his death. He was elected a warden in 1869, and in 1878 was appointed treasurer, a position which he held up to the time of his death, with his son, Mr. L. B. Johnson, as his assistant. Captain Johnson was twice married, and leaves a widow, five daughters, and seven sons. The funeral took place on Sept. 7 at the Stockport Borough Cemetery, when a large number of relatives, friends, and representatives of the various public institutions of the town were present. The first portion of the service, conducted by the Rev. H. E. Perry, was held in the Unitarian Church, St. Petersgate, and the interment took place subsequently at the Borough Cemetery.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE. APPEAL TO THE CHURCHES.

THE following appeal to the congregations belonging to the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches has been sent to us for publication:—

The Committee of the National Conference Union for Social Service commend to the earnest attention of the churches the new forward policy which the Union has decided to inaugurate this autumn.

Recently there was held at Swanwick a very remarkable conference of all the Social Service Unions connected with the Christian churches of our land. This conference, in the opinion of many, marks a new era in the life of the churches and their attitude to social questions. For the first time since the Reformation a way has been found wherein all Christians may unite, as churches, in a common work. Much good we are sure will result from this reunion, and one immediate gain has been to put new heart into the several existing Social Service Unions. It has given fresh meaning and importance to our own organisation. During the six years of its existence the National Conference Union for Social Service has done excellent work in spite of its small membership and narrow resources. But we want to extend its usefulness and see whether before the next Interdenominational Conference is held in 1913 we cannot largely increase our membership and renew the social witness of our churches on behalf of national and civic righteousness. Many members of our congregations, we know, are already active patriotic citizens doing their national and civic duties. But their efforts would be greatly strengthened were they also active members of our Social Service Union. We want to bring these very people together and into touch with the young growing life of our congregations, so that we may have the help of their experience and the stimulus of their personality. Were this accomplished in any large way we should have in our National Union an organ of the collective consciences of our community, and be able by its means to make one voice audible to the conscience of the nation.

At present, as churches, we are taking no conspicuous part in the great movement on behalf of social betterment. This is partly due to the fact that we are divided as to the causes and the remedies for our social diseases, but still more because we are not banded together to share in this work of redemption. Our Union can help the members of our churches to remedy both these defects. In the study circles the various problems can at least be investigated and some common opinions arrived at, and in the association of men and women intent on so serious a purpose a common enthusiasm will be generated which would conserve and direct our activities to fruitful issues. Impelled by this belief we have decided to initiate a vigorous movement this winter to increase our effective membership and also to attempt the formation of a Social Study and Service group in each one of our churches. For this purpose we have invited and secured the voluntary help of a number of our ministers, who will visit the churches in their particular districts and lay the claims of this important work before the notice of the congregations. We shall try to have every church consulted before Christmas, and we appeal to our congregations to give these ministers a welcome and sympathetic hearing. We trust that the result of this campaign will be that no church will be satisfied until it has a strong group at work and is co-operating through our National Conference Union and the Interdenominational Conference of all the Unions, in the great crusade of our age against immorality, injustice and poverty, and for the furtherance of God's kingdom of love, joy and peace.

Signed on behalf of the Committee:—

Chairman—J. M. LLOYD THOMAS,
131, Pershore-road, Birmingham.

Secretaries—

CATHERINE GITTINS,
6, Salisbury-road, Leicester,

J. S. BURGESS,

38, Lodge-lane, Flowery Field, Hyde.
Treasurer—C. WEISS,
Kronengarten, Rickmansworth.

THE TRIUMPH OF GENERAL BOOTH.

THE REV. F. H. VAUGHAN ON THE SECRET OF HIS INFLUENCE.

THE Rev. F. H. Vaughan was one of the speakers at a united service in memory of the late General Booth which was held in the Grand Theatre, Mansfield, on September 1. All denominations were represented, and the hall was crowded. "Never" was the word which was wrung out of the heart of Mrs. Booth at the great crisis in the life of your General," said Mr. Vaughan, "and it is, I think, the one word that is most impressed upon us as we think of the life of this great man who has now passed to his glory. 'Never'—he was one who never doubted God. 'I will never forsake thee.' That seemed to be the note in which he continued his work all through his life. He never doubted Jesus Christ. Great sayings of our Lord, such as 'He that cometh unto Me shall never thirst,' were deep down in his heart, and it was because he never doubted Christ that he made us believe more in Jesus. He never doubted himself, and that was a part of the secret of his influence. I am told that at a very early age he believed in a committee of one, with himself as chairman, and he justified that at every stage in the expansion of his schemes, and in every difficulty over which he triumphed. His confidence in himself was great because he had greater confidence in the God Who sent him. He never doubted human nature; or that the deepest-dyed sinner could be saved, and we know the miracles he worked through that faith. General Booth came at a time that was providential in the history of England. He came in an age of doubt, when Huxley and the sceptical school was triumphant, saying that Christianity was played out. He came when everybody believed in committees, through which, they said, the work of the world was going to be done. He showed that one strong man convinced of his message could do more than a thousand committees. He proved also that Christianity is alive; that the cross of Christ is still a power to save men to-day. It is alive, and will live for ever. That was the message which General Booth gave. He played Christianity in when people said it was played out. He played it in on tambourines and bands of singing men and women, and showed its power on the life of the people. It convinced England, and it has done us good to be stirred out of apathy and indifference. While we were fumbling for reasons why Christianity was true, he showed in countless lives the power of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. We are thankful for the example and witness of General Booth. He defied the law, and won freedom of speech in the streets of the land. He was pelted with refuse, and led by secret ways to avoid unnecessary disturbances, and yet he was afterwards received by kings and emperors. He brought colour and joy into the people's hearts. We were getting too dull, too dingy in religion then, and General Booth said, 'Let us have some joy in our faith; God is our Father, and Christ is our Saviour and Master; let us rejoice in it.' He showed us we can laugh and sing and rejoice in Christ. This was a message worth giving, and England was all the better for it. Every church and chapel has felt the influence of the great spirit of the General. Long live your new General. You have never doubted your first General—never doubt your second. Unite under his banner, and be loyal to him, and carry on this great work, for I believe that in your army lies a great possibility in England of uniting two things which must be united—on the one hand religion, and on the other social reform. Those two things must be united. We are going in for all sorts of schemes of social betterment, but it is going to be a kingdom of the devil unless we have religion in men's hearts. We want to unite the two, and the Army has showed the way. By the power of faith we can uplift humanity, not only the wastrel, but we all want saving from the temptations and the lusts that beset us as luxury increases, and the power of enjoying ourselves is brought to our doors. We all want faith in God. We want to unite faith and social reform, and bring the churches together in this good work. We want to stand shoulder to shoulder; the churches can do it together, and the Army can help us. If I may venture on one plea, it is this: never become respectable. There is the danger of the Army being taken up by the great ones of the land, and forgetting the outcast of the streets."

Mr. Vaughan concluded with an exhortation to all present to continue the bold propaganda, praying that the great spirit of him who had now gone hence might still go forth in the great work of redemption, rescuing men and women from sin, degradation, and despair.

THE PROTESTANT MISSION TO THE PUTUMAYO.

We are informed that the appeal for £10,000 made a short time ago has met with a most encouraging response. Already £1,387 has been given and £1,599 promised, making a grand total of £2,986.

A public meeting will be held early in October, when the Mission will be definitely launched and fuller details announced. Notwithstanding the continuous effort to discount the proposal, there is strong evidence of the need of a Protestant Mission. Among the urgent reasons is the necessity of skilled medical assistance, and the Protestant Mission will be composed of seasoned men who know Peru, and will include a fully qualified medical man. £7,000 is still required for the purchase of a hospital boat for the necessary medical equipment. The Rev. Edward T. Reid has consented to give his services in connection with the Secretarial work of the Mission, and may be addressed, 8-9, Essex-street, Strand.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

LIVERPOOL AND THE TREATMENT OF CONSUMPTION.

LIVERPOOL'S Medical Officer of Health, Dr. E. W. Hope, through whose efforts the city has made such immense advances in sanitation and care for the public health, has drafted an interesting scheme for the more complete co-ordination under his department of all agencies for the treatment of tuberculosis. The aim is to establish a unified system of dispensaries and sanatoria, with arrangements for the oversight and control by one authority of all cases which come within the scope of public treatment. Such work as is already in operation will be improved and strengthened by the provision of a "permanent tuberculosis committee," through which all public bodies that deal with this particular malady will in future act. Under the new scheme the Consultative Committee of the Corporation will be combined with a sub-committee of the local insurance committee to form a consultative body which will have charge of the tuberculosis department. There are to be three dispensaries, to each of which a medical officer will be attached.

RESEARCH AND SANATORIA.

The scheme has also other noteworthy features. Besides providing for sanatoria and allowing extended facilities for bacteriological research, it is also so constructed as to utilise the co-operation of existing voluntary institutions. The chief tuberculosis officer will be responsible for the general working of the scheme. The dispensary officers will consider cases which come to the dispensary for the first time, and decide what treatment is necessary. It will be part of their duty to report insanitary dwellings to the Public Health Committee, to give personal instruction and distribute printed information to patients and others. Lastly, it is expected that advanced medical students will avail themselves of the dispensaries as affording facilities for study and giving experience in the diagnosis and treatment of tuberculosis.

* * *

SCHOOLBOYS AND SOCIAL SERVICE.

The boys of Clayesmore School, Pangbourne, have recently erected at the Pangbourne Weir Pool a new bathing-house, which they have presented for the use of the people of the neighbourhood. The building provides excellent accommodation for swimmers, with compartments for men and women, diving boards, and every convenience. Besides bearing the actual cost of materials, the boys have done all the carpentry work and painting, and the headmaster and the authorities at the school have expressed their gratitude to Lord Desborough and the Council of the Thames Conservancy Board for their sympathetic co-operation and for affording them this means of benefiting the members of the school by this act of service for the common good.

* * *

GLASGOW AND CHILD WELFARE.

From a recent number of the British Medical Journal we learn that a Council for Child Welfare, similar to the one already existing in Edinburgh and other large centres, has now been formed in Glasgow. Following what appears to be the best line of advance at the moment, those responsible for the formation of the council have had in view the co-ordination of public and private, official and voluntary effort. A committee of 21 members has been formed, which includes representatives of existing agencies, the city sanitary and health department, with private societies, the Parish Council and School Board, as well as voluntary organisations interested in problems of child life and health. Co-operation between these existing institutions, the interchange of knowledge and experience, and the reaction of one body upon another cannot be otherwise than salutary and lead to the prevention of much wasteful overlapping and a far more effective grappling with the problems of child life in a city like Glasgow.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Billingshurst.—Special services, celebrating the 147th anniversary of the General Baptist Chapel and the opening and dedication of the new organ, were held on Sunday and Monday last; and pleasant meetings were held. The interior of the building has been thoroughly cleaned and painted. On Sunday the services were conducted by the Rev. D. Davis, and the congregation at each service was most encouraging. On Monday a tea was held in the library-room, and after tea the new organ, recently purchased by the congregation with the aid of many friends, was formally opened, and a selection of music played on it by G. F. Brockless, Esq., F.R.C.O. At the subsequent evening service the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, of London, preached. An unusually large congregation was present. The service was closed by prayer and benediction by the Rev. J. Toye.

Bridgwater: Christ Church.—On Sunday, September 1, and Thursday, September 5, special services were held on re-opening this ancient building after its thorough cleansing and repair. The services on Sunday, conducted by the minister, the Rev. Clement E. Pike, were well attended, and much satisfaction was expressed with the result of the work. The massive pillars which support the roof have been scraped, revealing the good Bath stone of which they are made after the removal of many coats of paint. On Thursday a social meeting was held in the schoolroom, attended by the Mayor of Bridgwater, Alderman William Thompson, Alderman Thomas Manchip, the Rev. D. Lloyd, Congregationalist minister, North Petherton; the Rev. J. S. Trewuke, United Methodist minister, Bridgwater; the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, and T. Graham, of Bristol; the Rev. R. Davis, Gloucester, friends from Taunton, and others. Mr. Charles Badger presided. The minister, on behalf of Christ Church, moved a resolution, heartily welcoming the Mayor, and other guests. Mrs. Broadrick seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation, and responded to by the Mayor, and the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, R. Davis, D. Lloyd, and Mr. Philpott, of Taunton. The meeting was followed by a service in the renovated church, conducted by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, when an address on Nonconformity was preached by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford to a large congregation.

Carlisle.—The Unitarian congregation have succeeded in obtaining a suitable place for their services in the assembly room behind the Great Central Hotel. Opening services were held on Sunday, September 8, the preacher both morning and evening being the Rev. Henry Williamson, of Dundee.

Dundee.—A special conference, under the auspices of the Scottish Unitarian Association, was held at Dundee on Saturday, September 7. Dr. John K. Wood, President of the S.U.A., presided over a representative gathering. Delegates were present from all the Unitarian churches in Scotland, and included all the ministers on the active list. The Rev. Dr. S. M. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., was the principal guest. After the conference a public meeting was held. Dr. Wood again presided, and Dr. Crothers was the principal speaker. In opening the meeting the chairman referred specially to Professor Schaefer's presidential address delivered to the British Association. Dr. Crothers gave an address on religious education, in which he laid particular emphasis on the need of education in citizenship. A vote of thanks to Dr. Crothers was proposed by the Rev. H. Williamson. The Rev. Lucking Tavener proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, after which the proceedings terminated.

Hinckley.—Extensive alterations have recently been carried out at the Great Meeting. Oak panelling has been placed on the interior walls in memory of Mr. Hugh Atkins by his relatives. With a similar object in view, the members of the congregation have carried out the following renovations: body of chapel re-seated with handsome oak pews, height of pulpit lowered, a Communion rail erected, an additional entrance made at north-east corner, a new flooring put in, and all the aisles made of block wood. The re-opening services were held on Sundays, September 1 and 8, the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and Henry Gow being the special preachers.

Islington.—The Islington branch of the League of Liberal Christianity will open its rooms at 11, Loraine-road, Holloway, on Thursday evening, the 19th inst., when the Revs. Dr. W. E. Orchard, of Enfield, and Dr. W. Tudor Jones will deliver addresses. As accommodation is limited, friends who desire to be present are requested to kindly send a stamped envelope for admission card to the President, L.C.L., 11, Loraine-road, Holloway, N. Besides the usual weekly conference upon some religious, philosophical, social, or economic topic, there will be Sunday evening services conducted by men and women who feel they have a message to deliver untrammelled by creed.

London District Unitarian Society.—The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., of Wandsworth, will be the preacher at the united service to be held at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, on Sunday evening, October 20. The devotional portion of the service will be conducted by the Rev. J. A. Pearson.

Richmond Free Church: The Farrington Memorial.—It has been arranged that the memorial to the Rev. Silas Farrington shall take the form of five stained glass windows, to be placed in the apse of the church, and a memorial tablet to be placed on the north-east wall. There will be figures on the windows representing "The Sower" in the centre light, and on either hand the figures of Faith, Hope, Charity, and Liberty. The work of designing and constructing the windows has been entrusted to Messrs. Morris & Co., Merton Abbey, the well-known artists in glass. Arrangements will be made later with regard to the unveiling ceremony.

Scarborough: Westborough Church.—A sale of work in aid of the church funds was opened on Tuesday, September 3, by Mrs. Tattersfield, of Whitby. The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, presided, and in his address recalled the opening ceremony of the church thirty-five years ago, at which he was present. The sale was re-opened on Wednesday by Mrs. A. N. Booth, under the presidency of Miss E.

D. Gibb. The receipts from the sale and donations exceeded £167.

Unitarian Van Mission.—Many inspiring meetings have been held during the last fortnight, only eight having been lost owing to the weather. In Wales, at Bridgend, the missionary, the Rev. D. J. Evans, was "commanded" to come off his van by an opponent, and was also challenged to a six nights' discussion on the Christianity that he defended so well. At Aberavon, where Mr. Lawrence Redfern, son of the Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, conducted the meetings, the local people said that the mission had not got the best site, but as the meetings were running to 500 and 600 a night, the missionaries professed themselves satisfied, and remained where they were. In the Midlands Coseley was revisited, and the meetings, which were mainly in the hands of Councillor Cameron, the lay-missioner, were a source of much gratification to the local friends, who have sent a vote of thanks to headquarters expressive of their appreciation. At Wednesbury there were good meetings, with some show of spirit in the opposition to the trenchant addresses of the Rev. H. B. Smith. In London the van has been at Enfield, where Mrs. W. T. Davies, of Wakefield, delivered telling addresses to good audiences. She was assisted by her husband, the Rev. W. T. Davies. Good meetings were also held at Wood Green, where the van went when it was found that the visit to Barnet would have brought the van into the midst of the fair at that place. This change of route has led to a further modification, and the van will now visit East Finchley next week, Kilburn the week after, and Kentish Town in the first week of October. The Yorkshire van spent its time at Bridlington, where some nice meetings were held, conducted by the Revs. H. B. Smith in the first week and W. Holmshaw in the second. There has been a successful Progressive League here, and its members seem anxious that the Yorkshire Union should give them some attention. The matter has accordingly been brought under the notice of the officials of the Union. The following are the particulars of the Mission:—No. 1 Van, Wales: August 26 to September 1, Bridgend, the Rev. D. J. Evans; September 2 to 8, Aberavon, Mr. Lawrence Redfern, H.M. College. No. 2 Van, Midlands: August 26 to September 1, Coseley, Mr. J. R. Cameron, lay-missioner, the Rev. J. A. Shaw, Mr. W. L. Teasdale; September 2 to 8, Wednesbury, the Rev. H. B. Smith, Mr. W. L. Teasdale. No. 3 Van, London: August 26 to September 1, Enfield, the Rev. W. T. Davies and Mrs. Davies; September 2 to 8, Wood Green, Chairman the Rev. J. Wilson. No. 4 Van, Yorkshire: August 20 to September 8, Bridlington, the Rev. H. B. Smith, the Rev. W. Holmshaw. All communications should be addressed to the Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Walthamstow.—The Rev. Douglas Hoole has resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian Church. He leaves Walthamstow with the deep regret of the congregation, and their earnest hope that he may soon be restored to health and able to resume active work in the ministry.

Warrington.—On Sunday, September 8, the Nonconformist congregations of Warrington celebrated the 250th Anniversary of the Ejection of 1662. Their method was, as far as we know, quite unprecedented. During the day special sermons dealing with the Ejection were preached by the various ministers in their own chapels, and in the evening a united service of all Nonconformist congregations was held in the Cairo-street Chapel, which was established by one of the ejected clergy, Robert Yates, minister of Warrington Parish Church. Such a united service has never before been held in a chapel commonly known as "Unitarian," at least in Warrington, and the record of such services in any part of the country must be very small. Almost it may be said to have constituted a unique event, and may even have historic significance. The old chapel was filled to overflowing with representatives of practically every Nonconformist body in Warrington, and the following denominations were actually joined in the persons of ministers taking part in the service: Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian, Independent Methodist, and Unitarian. Had but the Wesleyan ministers responded to the call the gathering would have been as complete as possible. It is the sincere hope of those who organised the service that other services of similar character may be held, and something more may be done towards bridging over the divisions of denominationalism.

Warwick.—The Rev. Gardner Preston has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of High-street Chapel.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE 40,000TH ISSUE OF "THE TIMES."

The special number of The Times, published on Tuesday, September 10, to commemorate the 40,000th issue is a remarkable achievement. It extends to 44 pages, and gives a valuable and interesting summary of the history of printing, the history of newspapers, and the history of The Times itself. This great newspaper, which has exercised such an immense and continuous influence on the development of modern journalism, owes its origin neither to a man of letters nor to an expert in the typographical art, but to the inventor of the Logographic process of printing—a capable and honourable business man of the City of London, John Walter by name, who became bankrupt in 1780 through no fault of his own, and had to start afresh when half his life was over. "Judge what must be my sensations," he wrote in an autobiographical fragment, "twenty-six years in the prime of life passed away; all the fortune I had acquired by a studious attention to business sunk by hasty strides; and the world to begin afresh, with the daily introduction to my view of a wife and six children unprovided for and dependent upon me for support. Feeling hearts may sympathise at the relation, but none but parents can conceive the anxiety of my mind in such a state of uncertainty and suspense." This gives a little touch of pathos to the story of the founding of The Times, at first known as the Daily Universal Register, which lends additional interest to the record of its steady growth from a modest pamphlet to one of the most important newspapers in the world.

THE LITERATURE OF GREATER BRITAIN.

We are indebted to Mr. St. John Adcock for his interesting survey in the Bookman of the literary output of the overseas Dominions, which disproves the general idea that the Colonies have not yet produced any poets or novelists of note. It may be true that they are only at the beginning of things, with the world before them and a great future still to make; but the extraordinary thing is that, even in the midst of the pioneer work that marks the settling of new countries, such a number of men and women should have found the inspiration and opportunity already "to produce literatures that, besides being amazingly varied and plenteous, do add something that is new and intrinsically good to the glorious literature that is the common inheritance of the English race." The habit of labelling every Colonial author as if he were a copy of some English writer is, however, a real hardship. Adam Lindsay Gordon is called the Australian Burns, Kendall the Australian Shelley, and so on, while "there are enough Australian, Canadian and South African Kiplings to people a small town."

THE ORIGIN OF MOVING PICTURES.

Moving pictures, it appears, are older than photography, and their progenitor, according to Mr. F. Irving Anderson in the New York Tribune, was the diorama, a trick mechanical spectacle devised by Daguerre and Bouton in Paris in 1832, which proved immensely popular. It consisted of a series of paintings on gauze, arranged on a succession of "drops"; the scenes were shown in a darkened auditorium, the effects being produced by varying the direction, intensity, and colour of the lights. Daguerre hit upon the scheme of using the camera obscura, invented in the sixteenth century, to provide him with scenes. He was the original moving-picture man, because, when he watched the sheep and cattle and people upside down running across his oiled paper screen, he dreamed of the day when some miracle would enable him to throw these images direct on the curtain in his diorama and give his audience the real thing. How his subsequent experiments and repeated disappointments resulted in the birth of photography forms an interesting chapter in the story of invention.

A BIRD SANCTUARY.

The Council of the Royal Society for Protection of Birds has acquired the "shooting rights" of the promontory in the neighbourhood of Weston-super-Mare, known as Bream Down, for the purpose of making a bird sanctuary of it. Bream Down is about one and a half miles long, and half a mile across, and is visited by many uncommon birds such as ravens, peregrines, whimbrel, sheldrake, rock-pipits and ring-ousels. The sanctuary will be in charge of a watcher, who will see that the wild creatures and their eggs are in no danger from thoughtless people who rob nests and shoot birds. Other watchers are at work in Kent, North Wales, Somerset, Cornwall, Cumberland, the Isle of Wight, the Hebrides, and the Scottish Highlands, and the Society is doing admirable work in preserving from extermination many rare species which are now spreading to new haunts.

HELP FOR THE NEGLECTED CHILD IN AUSTRALIA.

Sir Charles Mackellar, President of the State Children Relief Board of New South Wales, who has just visited this country, is now in Europe on a Commission to inquire into the treatment of delinquent and neglected children in Europe and America. Whatever measures he considers might with advantage be introduced into the State of New South Wales will be recommended. Sir Charles Mackellar has written an interesting little book, "The Child, the Law, and the State," which was published in Sydney in 1907, dealing specially with Juvenile Courts. He has much to say on the important question of changing the environment of a child offender, or at least ameliorating the home conditions out of which the offence so frequently arises.

THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN.

According to Professor Keith, who gave an address on "Modern Problems relating to the Antiquity of Man" at Dundee on Monday, the evidence which has accumulated in recent years makes it probable that man was old enough to have co-existed at least with the Siberian mammoth. The whole problem is not yet solved, and "orthodox" and "heterodox" opinions are held in regard to it. It might be taken as the orthodox opinion that the dawn of the very earliest form of humanity lay 400,000 years behind us, and in that time man, as he is now known, had been evolved from a crude—almost prehistoric—form. Taking the view of M. Rutot as representative of modern orthodoxy, Professor Keith pointed out that if his claim to have traced man by means of his eolithic culture through the long Pliocene and Miocene periods, and even into the Oligocene period, were admitted, on the estimates of Professor Sollas, which were disputed by M. Rutot, the antiquity of man must be placed at over 3,000,000 years. The usually accepted opinion was that man made his appearance in a definitely human form about the commencement of the Pleistocene period, but there were those who referred his evolution to a much earlier period of geological history.

THE ZIONIST CONFERENCE.

A four days' sitting of the conference of the Central Committee of the Zionist organisation has just been completed at Berlin. There were over sixty delegates present, representing the local federations in England, France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Holland, Belgium, South Africa, and the United States. The discussions turned largely on politics, colonisation, culture, and finance, the present situation in the Near East being regarded by Dr. Victor Jacobson, vice-chairman of the central executive, as favourable to the movement. Interesting reports of the work of colonisation in Palestine were given in the course of addresses by Herr N. Sokolow; Professor Otto Warburg, the well-known authority on tropical botany; and Dr. E. W. Tschlenow, of Moscow, who pointed out some of the difficulties in connection with land transactions, lack of credit for selling, and lack of money for buying. There was, he said, an ample supply of technical and higher grade schools, but an insufficiency of elementary schools. There must be an alteration, however, of their town-planning in the future. The creation of a separate Jewish quarter as at Jaffa was favourable to the development of a Jewish milieu, but it sundered the Jews from the Arabs, and thus jeopardised their aspiration to attain the intellectual dominance in the country.

The International Correspondence Schools

will be pleased to send you a 100-page book, free, describing the system of education which carries practical, profitable knowledge to thousands who can afford neither the time nor the money to go to school or college.

The I.C.S. work is threefold: Teaching employed persons their trades or professions; preparing misplaced and dissatisfied people for congenial or better-paying work; giving young unemployed persons the training necessary to enable them to start at good salaries in chosen vocations.

DISTINCTIVE FEATURES of the I.C.S. System.

1. Courses of Instruction for particular occupations, in which are taught only the facts, processes, and principles necessary to qualify the student to advance himself in position and earnings.

2. Instruction Papers prepared for each Course: principles applied in examples of practical value; frequent revisions to keep pace with the latest developments and most modern methods.

3. Thorough examination and correction of the written work of students, and full, clear, and exact explanations of all difficulties met with by students.

REMARKABLE SUCCESSES through the I.C.S. Methods.

During 1911 over 5,500 I.C.S. students wrote thanking us for bettering their positions. The average increase in salaries was 56 per cent., or over 10/- in the £1. The average of unemployed I.C.S. Students is only one in 10,000.

Here is a "finger-post" to success. After receiving wage-advances of 140 per cent. and 70 per cent., this student writes:—

"As I wished for a varied experience I secured a situation about twelve months later with a further increase in salary of 10 per cent., and have since had a rise at the same firm of another 10 per cent., so that I am now earning nearly 400 per cent. more than when I first joined the Schools about three years ago."

GEORGE W. GROSSMITH, Bedford.

Do not worry about your present limitations; or about the fees, books, time allowed for each lesson, how your present work will be affected, how you can get a better job. Get the free information we will send you—let that answer your questions. Let us refer you to students in your own district.

RESPONSIBILITY & PERMANENCY

The growth of the I.C.S. has been world-wide and continuous since their foundation 21 years ago. No other correspondence schools have the experience, system, or the capital to provide such training as is afforded by the I.C.S., and all ambitious men and women are invited to write for the General Prospectus, which gives details of the I.C.S. Salary-Raising Education; it is sent, post free, to any part of the world on application to

The International Correspondence Schools, Ltd

Dept. B45, International Buildings,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

September 7th issue contains the following articles:—

The Churches and Industrial and Social Unrest. By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED.

"William Robertson Smith." By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS.

The Care of the Feeble Minded. By Miss MARY DENDY.

"The Painter." By F. J. GOULD.

&c., &c., &c.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION,

22, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE Society offers to send an efficient Lecturer free of charge to League Meetings, Debating Societies, &c. Autumn and winter engagements should be booked at once.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LADY'S comfortably - furnished COTTAGE to Let, 25 miles from London. Two sitting-rooms, three bedrooms, good garden.—Cottage, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

APPLES.—Delicious Dessert Apples, 40 lbs. 7s. 6d., 20 lbs. 4s. Excellent cooking, 40 lbs. 6s., 20 lbs. 3s. 6d. 20 lbs. each 6s. 9d., 10 lbs. 3s. 9d. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys. Bundle of Big pieces, only 2/6. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE. — Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Autumn Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Light, cool, washable, wears for years; scores of beautiful designs; fascinating shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH. — We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing. —WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, September 14, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3665.
NEW SERIES, No. 769.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

The Inquirer.

September 14th issue contains the following:—

"The Secret of the Lord." By the late E. P. BARROW, M.A.

"Hymns and their Writers." By Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

"Death and Survival." By Prof. G. DAWES HICKS.

"The Origins of Sartor." By JONATHAN NIELD.

&c., &c., &c.

To be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

Modern Handbooks of Religion

Crown 8vo. 2/- each net.

The Jewish Religion in the Time of Jesus. By Dr. G. HOLLMAN, of Halle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 150 pp.

The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 176 pp.

Paul: A Study of his Life and Thought. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. 200 pp.

The Apostolic Age. By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. 144 pp.

Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma. By Prof. Dr. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg. Translated by V. D. DAVIS, B.A. 160 pp.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

The Services will be resumed on Sunday, September 22.

PREACHERS:

Sept. 22.—Rev. FRANCIS H. JONES.

" 29.—Rev. FRANCIS H. JONES.

(On these two Sundays there will be Morning Service only at 11.15, no Evening Service.)

Oct. 6.—Morning 11.15, Evening 7.0. Rev. J. M. CONNELL, of Lewes.

TWO LADY ARTISTS (painters of Parisian School) would receive in their comfortable refined country home near Baden-Baden (Black Forest) one or two ladies, desirous to spend the winter in mild climate, to practise German or to study Art (private lessons in Painting, Drawing, Water Colours, Etching). Beautiful old garden, fancy farm, delightful scenery.—Terms and photo. of place from Miss SCHULTZEN-ASTEN, Obersasbach-in-Baden. References given and taken.

NOW READY.

42 pp. Fcap. 8vo.

The Provincial Assembly Lecture for 1912.

"The Immanence of God and the Individuality of Man,"

BY

SIR HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt.

6d. net. By post 7d. Quantities 6d. each plus postage.

Messrs. RAWSON & CO., 16, New Brown St., Manchester.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY

A COURSE OF FOUR LECTURES on "Life in Palestine at the time of Jesus" will be given by Dr. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford) at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Thursdays, October 3, 10, 17, and 24, at 8 p.m.

Tickets for the course, price 1s., can be obtained at Essex Hall.

R. ASQUITH WOODING, Hon. Sec.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.

LIVERPOOL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A PUBLIC MEETING

WILL BE HELD IN THE

Domestic Mission, Mill Street, Liverpool,

ON

Wednesday, September 25, at 8 p.m.

Chairman: Rev. T. LLOYD JONES.

Speakers: Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A., Miss HARRIET M. JOHNSON, and others.

Conference and Refreshments, 7 to 8 p.m.

Elocutionary Entertainments

MR. ALFRED PERRIS is prepared to book engagements for a two hours' Entertainment, consisting of Dramatic and Poetic Recitals, grave and gay, interspersed with Musical items, vocal and instrumental, by Miss MAY PERRIS.—For particulars, terms, &c., address, 135, Padgate-lane, Warrington.

MISS DREWRY hopes to resume her Courses of Lectures, Readings, and Lessons on English Language and Literature early in October. For particulars apply by letter.—143, King Henry's-road, London, N.W.

Mr. G. BOWER CODLING

conducts Classes in

PUBLIC SPEAKING

at Hasluck's Academy, Bedford House, Bedford Street, Strand. Commencing Friday, 4th October. Special Class for Ladies. Assistance given in the preparation and delivery of Speeches for all occasions.—Write for full Syllabus to SAM. L. HASLUCK, Director, 3, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL,

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TIAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Next Term begins September 19.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H.

WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate with their own, ages 3 to 13.

The house stands on the edge of Blackheath Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.

They will be assisted by Miss Enid Branson (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.

For illustrated prospectus apply Westminster, Chilworth, Surrey.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, September 22.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAFLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. GEO. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. H. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. W. HOLLOWAY.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTAM LISTER, B.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 Ilford, High-road. Harvest Festival, 11, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.; 7, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 only, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. H. N. CALEY; 6.30, Rev. J. ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Morning service only. 11.15, Rev. F. H. JONES. No evening service.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. J. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. SIMON JONES, B.A.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, B.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. P. PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. O. JENKINS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BROOK.
 {DEAN Row, 10.45, and
 {STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVEE.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. H. MAISTER.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Totteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, M.A.; 6.30, Rev. W. SHORT, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. L. P. JACKS, D.D.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TBAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAS, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Mr. PERCIVAL CHALK.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

DEATH.

GASKELL.—On September 15, at 5, The Grove, Highgate, Roger Gaskell, aged 66.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

EXPERIENCED GOVERNESS (young) seeks re-engagement. Usual English subjects, fluent French, German, Music, Botany, Drill, Games; Cyclist. Excellent testimonials.—K. G., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MINISTER'S DAUGHTER (22) seeks post as Companion to elderly lady or as Nursery Governess. French conversation, lessons to beginners in drawing, painting and music.—M. L., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, Lady to attend on elderly Lady. Light duties and comfortable home. Small salary.—L. B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LADY with dancing classes in London requires a girl (refined) with some aptitude for dancing, age 14 to 18. Tuition free in return for slight help in classes.—D. A., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

FRENCH YOUNG LADY wishes for situation au pair for two months from October in respectable family, in or near London.—Apply, Mdle. GAYTE, Fairville, Oxtou, Birkenhead.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s. d.
PER QUARTER	1 8
PER HALF-YEAR	3 4
PER YEAR	6 6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.
 Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£ s. d.
PER PAGE	6 0 0
HALF PAGE	3 0 0
PER COLUMN	2 0 0
INCH IN COLUMN	0 3 6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0 4 6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	627	CORRESPONDENCE :—		MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
VERSES: What is Life?	628	Death and Survival	634	A Referendum on Religion	637
THE WONDER OF LIFE	629	The Abuse of Language	635	National Home-Reading Union	637
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		John Pounds' Home	635	The Temperance Movement	638
Hymns and their Writers.—II.	630	The Guild Movement	635	The Care of the Feeble-Minded	638
The Moral Education Congress	631	Literary Notes	635	The Social Movement	638
"As Snow in Summer, as Rain in Harvest" 632		Publications Received	636	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	638
LITERARY STUDIES :—		FOR THE CHILDREN :—		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	639
Acontius: An Elizabethan Protester		Order.—II.	636
against the Narrowness of Creeds.	633

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE amount of interest which has been aroused by the suicide of Count Nogi, and the sense of amazement with which the news has been received, are indications of the great gulf which is still fixed between the mind of Japan and that of the Western World. Count Nogi took his life on the day of the Mikado's funeral as a solemn act of homage to the memory of his dead sovereign. He was a man of disciplined life, with a stern sense of duty and an unbounded confidence in the future of his country. As a valiant soldier he did more than any other man to draw the eyes of Europe to Japan, and to arouse feelings of wonder and admiration at the rapidity of its emergence from obscurity and its power of quick adaptation to new conditions. The manner of his death reveals the persistence of the traditional temper and the inexorable power of inherited moral standards in spite of striking changes in the machinery of life.

PERHAPS this most conspicuous suicide of recent years, which almost elamours for our admiration and still leaves us cold, will help to recall hasty observers to a sense of the fundamental qualities which separate one civilisation from another. Under the monotonous discipline of commerce men tend to wear the same clothes and to use telephones and typewriters, but the religious sentiments and the moral habits are modified much more slowly. An age of enlightenment may spread the veneer of a common civilisation over the surface of life, but we do not really understand one another till we admire the same excellence and accept the same duties and strike our roots deep into the soil of a common faith. The Western and the Eastern mind touch one another at many more points than they used to do, but they are still very far from a mutual understanding; and we can only help this understanding to grow by the exercise of an infinite patience and by learning to think not in years but in centuries.

THE National Conference of Brotherhoods has been held in Manchester during the past week. It represents one of the most promising religious movements of the present day on unconventional lines, and its numerical success is a fact which none of the older churches beset by the menace of diminishing congregations can wisely ignore. Its very loose connection with church organisations has left it untrammelled by credal tests and denominational divisions and the traditional "proprieties"; while it has availed itself to the full of the religious passion for social betterment and insisted upon its embodiment in daily acts of mutual help and goodwill. In an enthusiastic article upon the Brotherhood Movement, which appeared in the Daily News and Leader last Saturday, the Rev. C. Silvester Horne describes it in the following terms:—"Theological and credal tests have never been imposed. Ecclesiastical distinctions are unknown. None say, 'I am of Paul' or 'I of Apollos.' We are too busy to quarrel; too exalted with the sense of a high citizenship for righteousness and faith to be troubled about petty dignities. Within my own experience Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Free Churchmen, and multitudes of the great denomination of No-Churchmen and of almost every nationality—French, German, Austrian, Russian, and the rest—have existed in closest intimacy in one Brotherhood organisation."

SUCCESS of this kind and the presence of high ideals may well put captious criticism to silence. But when it is said that all this means not despair of the churches, but wistfulness for primitive Christianity, it seems natural to ask one or two questions. Religion must always overflow with practical kindness, but the kindness needs the strength and inspiration of a spiritual faith. Christianity did not conquer simply because it was practical and kind. It appealed with insistent power to the instincts of worship and reverence in the presence of the mysteries of God. Moreover, it spoke on equal terms to men and women and children and united them in its assemblies. How much of its spiritual fascination would have been lost if it had organised meetings for men only, with women admitted once a month! From the religious point of view this separation of men and women is an undesirable feature in the Brotherhood Movement, which may prove a source of disintegrating weakness as time goes on. In all the essential parts of religion the interests of men and women are identical and their worship should be together, in the same place and the same company.

PASTOR TRAUB, of Dortmund, is widely known as one of the bravest and most enlightened men among the Protestant clergy of Germany. He was marked out clearly for the official displeasure, which has now fallen upon him in the harshest form. After a fruitless appeal to the highest ecclesiastical court he has been dismissed from his office with every possible indignity, including the loss of his title and legal status as a clergyman. On their own finding it would have been open to the members of the court to pass a more lenient sentence and to grant him a pension, but they have chosen deliberately to mete out to him the extreme form of punishment reserved for those who have been found guilty of grave immorality. It is the vindictive triumph of officialdom over the strong man whom it fears.

* * *

It is not for heresy that Traub has been tried and found guilty, but for offences against ecclesiastical discipline and the tame submissiveness of the clerical mind to its superiors. His case differs in this respect from that of Jatho, though the motives were probably the same. It was easier to assail Traub on the side of his public activity and his outspoken criticism of the tyranny and effete orthodoxy of the official mind. His condemnation strikes at the freedom of the clergy to take part in public affairs, to write in the newspapers, or even to edit a journal in which articles distasteful to ecclesiastical authority are allowed to appear. All the vital principles of the Reformation are rejected and trodden under foot, and in their place there is a bureaucratic régime with power to regulate the whole life and activity of the clergy, indistinguishable from the Vatican in its hatred of freedom

* * *

If any one wishes to understand the death-in-life of German Protestantism at the present time, and the alienation from its teaching of the masses of the people, he cannot do better than read the long and dreary official document in which the charges against Traub are examined and the reasons for his condemnation set forth. Numerous passages, which do not pass beyond the bounds of legitimate public criticism, are cited from Christliche Freiheit, and as editor he is held responsible for every expression of opinion which has appeared in its columns. But his chief ground of offence was clearly his brave championship of Jatho and his outspoken censure of the hard legality of the church courts. Traub has been deprived but he has not been silenced. He has a large measure of public sympathy behind him. His democratic fervour has made him a popular figure. In a position of freedom he may do an even greater work and prove a still more formidable champion of religious liberty. The harshness of his condemnation is only equalled by its blind stupidity.

WHAT IS LIFE?

THE first two lips that met in love together,
The first two hands that joining could not part,
The first sweet tears that broke a human heart;
These learned life's secret in all winds and weather,
Deep founts wherefrom the streams eternal start.
It rests within Truth's young and ancient story,
And never knew the gray laboratory.

The flower, that blooms a day and seems so mortal,
And mingleth with the cosmic pulse and pain,
Earth's joyful, sad, and everlasting strain;
Yet enters in it, though by death's dim portal,
With all its colour and dew to rise again.
It feels the larger hope, the loftier calling,
The resurrection of an upward falling.

Yea, and the worm, as surely as the blossom,
Hath the one endless moment of its trust,
No less than the high mountain's heavenward thrust;
It lies within the cradle of that Bosom,
Which gathers to it Deity and dust.
It shares with God His shadow and His being,
And tells us life is (but by sorrow) seeing.

Life's riddle is no riddle to the lover,
Nor to that soul in whom the mysteries dwell—
Uncuffed yet by Science in a cell;
When breast to breast is married, we discover
Life without love is worse than any hell.
We prove it in the hour of dissolution,
The bud's fresh birth, a planet's evolution.

It owns no bounds and never had beginning;
No protoplasmic synthesis of slime
Hath prisoned it a speck in space or time;
Before love shaped a cosmos, life was winning
Its triumphs in some hypercosmic clime.
Time, in its first rude sky's weak baby scrabble
Scrawled it, and breathed it on the wind's first babble.

In the world's levers and those giant forces
Life works the engine's awful piston rod,
Through that dark road the centuries dimly trod;
The infant's cradle and sepulchral sources,
They are alike one life, one death, one God.
We only gain our Quest's desire in losses,
The power that lasts, and rules the world on crosses.

Grim silence and sad gloom they guard its treasure,
That stands in stars, and hides in heat and cold,
While laughing down beneath the burial mould;
And every little tomb can span its measure,
The dreadful sweep no Infinite can hold.
All through the generations and the ages,
Life did but end to start on broader stages.

First learn what love is, then alone shall living
Lead every step and burn within thy breast,
And be the passion that is perfect rest;
Ah, not by getting but by divinely giving
Will life and God and all be manifest.
Life in its cradle grave yet daily lieth,
Daily is born because it daily dieth.

F. W. ORDE WARD.

THE WONDER OF LIFE.

SCIENCE is often supposed to be concerned merely with the things that can be understood; poetry and religion to be concerned with the things that cannot be understood. That is a false antithesis. It would be more true to say that science ends in mystery, and that poetry and religion begin with it. No scientific man who talks as if everything were clear is to be trusted.

In many scientific works of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century you find a preface or conclusion pointing out the divine wisdom of the arrangements and principles which are being expounded. The writer has no feeling of 'mystery'. He is explaining the maker of the Universe or of the human body, and he thinks it incumbent on him to assert that everything he describes is just what Religion requires. Science in those days was a kind of moral tale, on the lines of Miss EDGEWORTH'S stories, where everything happened exactly as it ought to do. As we read some of those old vindications of GOD, based on a more or less accurate description of the laws of the Universe and the way in which it works, we feel sometimes an element of unreality and childishness. There is no element of wonder in these men's souls. They see the world of humanity as a great and complex mechanism, and they think they understand it through and through. But in accordance with the religious conventions of the time they feel compelled to maintain that it is all perfectly right and good—just what a religious view of life demands.

The attitude of our scientific men to-day is very different. For the most part they are concerned simply with describing things as they are. They do not trouble themselves about religion. You find no comfortable preface or conclusion, pointing the moral, and justifying the ways of GOD to man. Indeed, there is a good deal of scientific writing which goes to the opposite extreme, pointing out, more or less clearly, the incompatibility of the facts and principles discovered with an all-wise, all-good Creative Power. Expressed or implied, there is a considerable amount of scientific writing which is materialistic in this sense, that it suggests there is no need for GOD at all, nothing which overwhelms us with a sense of mystery, nothing which cannot be explained by the intellect, nothing which could not have happened if there was no unfathomable Wisdom and Goodness behind.

I do not call that science materialistic in temper which concerns itself merely with outward and visible facts, which investigates the laws of matter and of life, and which never mentions GOD. Materialism comes in when men are entirely satisfied with their discoveries, when they think they can or might conceivably explain everything, when the laws and facts they observe fill them with no sense of wonder, when they do not look out beyond and upwards into an infinite mystery.

It is not the discoveries of science, whatever they may be, which are to be feared by religion; it is the materialistic temper, which does not find any cause for wonder, which is entirely satisfied with the intellect, and which expects to explain everything in the heavens above and on the earth beneath by a formula.

There has been a good deal of discussion aroused lately by the recent address of the President of the British Association on the origin of Life. Religion, in the person of some of its representatives, has been rather frightened and considerably disturbed. It has been said that this Presidential Address has been the most outspoken attack on religion since Professor TYNDALL'S Belfast Address in 1874. Now, the materialism of the Address is not due to any theory of the origin of life. In asserting his belief that what we call organic matter has arisen by ordinary laws of evolution out of inorganic matter, Professor SCHÄFER may be too dogmatic, but he is not necessarily attacking religion. Life is not for him a special creation at a particular period of the world's history by the hand of GOD. It must have come about naturally through some kind of chemical combination among inorganic substances, and is probably still taking place in our midst to-day, though we cannot observe the process going on. The first forms of life are probably quite invisible even to the strongest microscope. We must not expect to observe them, or to watch their emergence from the inorganic into the organic. He laughs at those investigators who, having sterilised an organic mixture and sealed it up, proclaim triumphantly that no life henceforth is ever discovered within it. That is to him no proof that life cannot be formed out of chemical combinations. In the first place, he urges that we should not be able to observe it even if it were there, since it would be almost infinitely minute; and in the second place, such a sterilised artificial mixture is the last place where we should expect life to be naturally created. But he believes that in the crucible of Nature, under the ordinary conditions not interfered with by man, the inorganic is continually passing into the organic, life coming from the lifeless, and preparing to evolve by imperceptible stages into ever higher and higher forms.

This theory may or may not be true. It is certainly not proved by scientific observation, and some humility and doubt are desirable in speaking of such a theory. But that the so-called organic can evolve out of the so-called inorganic, that life can come from what is known as lifeless, that GOD did not suddenly intervene in the midst of the evolution of the world and create life by a fiat of His will, this theory is not incompatible with religion, or with a reverence for life, or with a belief in the reality of spiritual things. There is no reason for religious men and women to feel as if the foundations of faith in GOD were threatened. It presents no greater difficulty for religion than the belief that man has evolved from the ape; or than the fact that any man, with all his love and thought and will, begins his physical existence as a fertilised ovum. It would simply mean, if proved, that what we call the inorganic or matter is a great deal more wonderful and full of potentialities than we had supposed. Latent in what we sometimes call dead matter was all this complex, marvellous, infinitely varying life which we see about us in the world to-day. It does not make life less wonderful to say that it evolves out of the inorganic. It makes what we call the inorganic more wonderful. It makes us feel that from the beginning, in what seemed most lifeless, most material, most inert, there was something more than matter. It fills the Universe with life, instead of confining life to one place or period, and calling in GOD to rectify an omission or to supply a want.

That which is to be disliked in the Presidential Address of Professor SCHÄFER, apart from an excessive dogmatism, is not his theory of the origin of life, but a certain materialistic temper. There is no sense of wonder, no perception of the presence of a Power beyond our capacity to understand, no deep feeling of mystery. We must go to physicists like Sir OLIVER LODGE, or Lord KELVIN, or Professor THOMPSON, if we would be made to feel the mystery of matter. The biologist, like Professor SCHÄFER, starts with the conception of matter as something dead and understood; and then, out of combinations of that uninteresting and commonplace substance he thinks he finds the origin of life. The great physicists know that what we call matter is not commonplace or uninteresting, or completely understood. He feels it is infinitely wonderful, that there is something within and behind it which passes his comprehension. Matter to such men has in it an element of the spiritual and the divine. To tell him that life comes from matter does not degrade life. It merely adds to the mystery of matter, and to his sense of the wonder and the greatness of the Universe.

There are some, no doubt, who feel what perhaps Professor SCHÄFER suggests, that if three dead atoms coming together produce life, then life is nothing, or at any rate only a momentary result of a fortuitous combination. BROWNING replies to this scepticism in another connection when he wrote of Music in "Abt Vogler":—

But here is the finger of GOD, a flash of the will that can,

Existent behind all laws, that made them and lo they are :
 And I know not if save in this such gift
 be allowed to man,
 That out of three sounds he forms not a fourth sound, but a star.

If the theory of life arising out of chemical combinations be true, then we have what BROWNING wrote of with regard to music. Out of the combination of three atoms emerges not a fourth atom, but a star, a something new, a something in which they find their fulfilment; and as BROWNING in his mystical and noble way believed in the permanence and reality of that star of music created out of the combination of sounds, so in a deeper, fuller way we may believe in the permanence and reality of that star of life arising out of fulfilling the purposes of the causes which were necessary for its emergence. The causes become more wonderful the more you realise what they are able to produce. The creation itself does not become one whit less wonderful because you realise the conditions under which it arises. No musician's joy or reverence is in the least disturbed by recognising the physical conditions of the music. He may cry with BENEDICT, "Is it not strange that sheep's guts should hale souls out of men's bodies?" But the very strangeness of the fact deepens his sense of awe and mystery.

Religion need not be afraid of any facts or explanations. Science has nothing to say, and can have nothing to say, which will destroy the realities of the spirit. Rather we ought to welcome with joy and confidence all sincere pursuit of truth, all delicate observation, all wise thought and patient investigation and careful reasoning. The more we know of the Universe, the more wonderful it grows in its least as in its largest parts. That which Religion has to condemn is the materialistic temper which thinks it understands everything, which finds no cause for infinite wonder, and which imagines in its folly that it has banished mystery from life. The more the wise man knows the more he wonders. He feels himself through his increasing knowledge ever moving into deeper and grander mysteries. Wonder is very different from bewilderment. The bewildered man is in confusion, and has no confidence in the meaning of life. The man who wonders does not understand, but simply feels that the things beyond his understanding are great and divine.

There is a fine sentence in one of Lady GREGORY's stories of old Irish legends in "Gods and Fighting Men." One of the heroes, in whose presence strange things are happening, says, "I think I could find good sense in your meanings if I could understand them." The hero, whether in science or in life, finds himself in the presence of many marvels which he doesn't understand. He observes and reasons to the uttermost, but he feels there is something which his observation and his reason cannot explain; and, at the same time, through his wonder he feels that "there is good sense in your meanings if I could understand them." They are not foolish tricks, they are not mean, petty, and sordid arrangements. That is the confidence which springs out of a deep feeling of the mystery of things, that is the soul of the mystic. I don't understand it all. The more I observe and reason, the more convinced I become that much is beyond me, that life, and thought, and the Universe cannot be completely explained. The more I explain the more remains to be explained. Wonder grows with knowledge; but if I could understand I should find good meanings, better and more sublime, the more I penetrate into the reality of things.

Science rightly treated is not the enemy of religion, it is one aspect of religion. It is the patient, selfless, devoted search for truth in the spirit of a trusting, wondering child. It grows more reverential towards the Universe the more it knows and feels. It ends, as the old physician and mystic, Sir THOMAS BROWNE, used to say he loved to end, in an "O Altitudo!" "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God. How unsearchable are his judgments, and His ways past finding out." H. G.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

II.

"O Love that wilt not let me go."

—George Matheson.

GEORGE MATHESON wrote many hymns and many books, but it is not unlikely that, when all else that he wrote is forgotten, he will be remembered in the communion of the Christian Church for this one hymn, which stands unmistakably among the best and most beautiful of modern times for the depth of its feeling and its lyric utterance of a genuine religious experience.

Matheson was essentially a modern man, as thinker and as teacher in the church. A native of Glasgow, the child of parents who came from the Highlands, born into the fellowship of the Church of Scotland in 1842, the year before the disruption, he gave himself to its ministry, and when he came to his full maturity gained for himself a position of real eminence as a progressive and enlightened teacher.

"Broad positive" is the phrase used by his biographer to describe his position. Early in his ministry he broke away from the strict orthodoxy of his bringing up, and passed through deep waters of doubt and unbelief, but then through the new interpretation of a spiritual philosophy found his way back to firm foundations and the essential truths of the Christian faith.

It was an astonishment to many who were familiar with his writings, and even to many when for the first time they heard him preach, to learn that Matheson from the beginning of his ministry was practically a blind man, and so remained to the end. From boyhood his sight had been defective, and it gradually failed, so that by the time he went to college he was dependent on others for all his reading. He was no stranger to the glory and beauty of the world, but the vision gradually faded from his outward sight, till all that was left him was the power to distinguish between darkness and light. He was practically blind and had to be led about. When he preached he had to know the hymns and lessons by heart, and his sermons too, until early in his career he gave up writing sermons, and in preparation only made a few notes and then preached freely and straight from the heart. It was a bitter struggle he went through when, as a young man, he realised that his sight could not be saved, for he had an eager zest for life and a poet's joy in all beautiful things; but he went through the conflict and found his peace simply in submission to the fact that it was God's will for him.

Matheson was a brilliant boy at school and college, especially in his essays and speeches in debate, and when he began to preach he quickly made his mark; with the utmost courage and perseverance he faced all the difficulties inherent in his lack of sight, and proved himself an indefatigable pastor as well as preacher; and he was always a student, doing his reading and writing through the help of secretaries and other friends. He had the happiness of the life-long companionship and devoted care of an elder sister. After a year as assistant in the city church in Glasgow, in which he had been brought up, he became in 1863 minister of Inellan, a beautiful summer resort on the western shore of the Firth of Clyde, on the mainland north of Rothesay and Bute. It was to a dependent church that he went, included in the parish of Dunoon; but under his ministry it so prospered that in a few years Inellan was made into an independent parish. In the autumn of 1885 he preached before Queen Victoria in Crathie Church, and next year removed to Edinburgh, where at St. Bernard's he ministered for another thirteen years, until his retirement from active service. He had still eight years to live, and to the end continued his work as a writer of books. His first publication was in 1874, after he had been six years at Inellan, a volume entitled "Aids to the study of German Theology," and three years later came two large volumes on the "Growth of the Spirit of Christianity," for which he received the degree of D.D. from Edinburgh University. "Natural Elements of Revealed Theology"; "Can the Old Faith live with the New? The Problem of Evolution and Revelation"; "The Spiritual Development of St. Paul"; "Studies of the Portrait of Christ," in two volumes—these are the titles of some of the chief of his books, and he was also the author of a number of very popular books of devotion, "Words by the Wayside," "Thoughts for Life's Journey," and others, as well as of many articles in the magazines.

"His face was turned with eager welcome towards the new light," writes his biographer, "and his strong brain was busy in the work of reconstruction and reconciliation." His work, while fundamentally evangelical, was "modern, liberal, and original." One article of his appeared in the Modern Review under Armstrong's editorship. Matheson undoubtedly had in his own generation a far-reaching influence for good, by no means expended yet. It was in 1906 that he died.

Such was the author of the hymn, "O Love that wilt not let me go." It was written in 1882, when he was forty years of age, in the year of the publication of his first devotional book. He himself told the story of its origin:—

"My hymn was composed in the manse of Inellan on the evening of June 6, 1882. I was at that time alone. It was the day of my sister's marriage, and the rest of the family were staying over night in Glasgow. Something had happened to me, which was known only to myself, and which caused me the most severe mental suffering. The hymn was the fruit of that suffering. It was the quickest piece of work I ever did in my life. I had the impression rather of having it dictated to me by some inward voice than of working it out myself. I am quite sure that the whole work was completed in five minutes, and equally sure that it never received at my hands any retouching or correction; The Hymnal Committee of the Church of Scotland desired the change of one word. I had written originally: 'I climbed the rainbow in the rain.' They objected to the word 'climb' and I put 'trace.'"

Thus, except for the alteration of that one word, the hymn was born spontaneously, as it were, out of Matheson's heart, in that hour of painful stress. We do not know what the thing was that had happened to him, but these verses remain to testify to the habitual spirit of his life, which could thus find expression in the trust and love which overcame the pain.

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in Thee;
I give Thee back the life I owe,
That in Thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

The man, who is a living soul, is compassed about by the Ocean of life, the waves of which flow over him and penetrate his being, not to overwhelm, but to renew and sustain; it is for new birth into fuller life and deeper trust. He knows that his life is not his own. He has made the great surrender to that other Power that upholds him, and becomes aware of the tenderness of the enfolding Presence. His weariness he rests on that other Strength; his pain he can endure, and submitting to privation and suffering, finds beneath it all the growing sense of peace and the deeper blessedness. It is God who holds him in life, God, who is Love Eternal. So there comes to him something of that vision which was granted to George Fox, when knowledge of all the evil in the world threatened to overwhelm his soul, and he saw that while there was indeed an ocean of darkness and death, there was yet an infinite ocean of light and love, that flowed over the ocean of darkness.

O Light, that followest all my way,
I yield my flickering torch to Thee,
My heart restores its borrowed ray,
That in Thy sunshine's blaze its day
May brighter, fairer be.

The light of that vision is there to refresh his heart, to renew his courage and hope. God, in His perfect love, is the light upon his way; and the trustful heart knows that whatever may have to be endured, there must come the dawning of the perfect day. The suffering and surrendered will knows the promise, for love suffers willingly for others, and proves itself stronger than death. We cannot choose the pain, but we can trust the Divine purpose in it.

A man will give his life for his friend, and through the shadow of death, and the storm that beats upon the soul, he will see the light breaking in glorious joy. That is the secret of the diviner life.

O Joy that seekest me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to Thee;
I trace the rainbow through the rain,
And feel the promise is not vain
That morn shall tearless be.

O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms
red
Life that shall endless be.

The suffering is accepted, in fellowship with Christ's sufferings, and in his spirit of surrender, of which the great symbol is the cross. Whatever was the desire or the hope in the glory of life, it is given up and the pain is endured, because that is God's will, and in that surrender His love is proved to be all-sufficient for the richer, fuller life. Matheson's hymn has the greater power of appeal from the mystic touch of the imagery of the last verse. The old thought of the blood of the sacrifice passes into the poet's vision of perfect love, given in self-sacrifice, the emblem of which, as we see it in the pictures of Rossetti and Burne Jones, is the red blossom of lovely flowers. Whatever is grievous in the cross is covered over with these emblems of love and life. The love that we know, and know most perfectly in pure self-sacrifice, rises for us out of the ocean depths of the exhaustless life and love of God.

V. D. D.

THE MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS.

Some Impressions of the Meetings at The Hague.

MR. F. J. GOULD has already contributed to these columns an article summarising in graphic form the proceedings of the Second International Moral Education Congress held at The Hague at the end of last month. Looking back upon the Congress from a little distance I propose to endeavour to convey the main impressions it has left upon my mind.

In the first place, since the ultimate aim of these Congresses, is, I take it, the unification of the whole human race, and since the faith upon which they repose is that such unification is ultimately capable of accomplishment, no more fitting "local habitation" could have been discovered for this Second Congress than the Dutch city of the "House in the Wood" where the Peace Palace is now rapidly nearing completion. Indeed, these Congresses deal with the question of International Peace in a subtler way than is usual in the procedure of Arbitration Courts, and endeavour to discover and reveal the bond which shall yet make all the "continents indissoluble."

It was excellent stage-craft, therefore, on the part of the Dutch Executive that the first speaker should have been a Mohammedan in the person of the Egyptian Minister of Public Instruction, whose El Salam Alaikom—"Peace be unto you"—fell upon the Congress as its first benediction. This appears to me to have been a fitter introduction to the Congress than even the finely-wrought and pregnant paper of Vice-Chancellor Sadler, which is given the first place in the printed volumes, and assigns to the Christian tradition of life and thought a unique place as a factor in Moral Education. For a Christian this is a tremendous fact: for a Mohammedan it has little relevancy.

Another significant fact of this Congress was that it was not a Christian who made the deepest impression on the audience but a Hindoo in the person of the Hon. Dr. Sarvadhikary, of the University of Calcutta. When Christians began expounding their conflicting aims and doctrines he rose and rebuked them. He had come to learn, he told us, lessons which he might carry back with him to his own countrymen. Our demarcations into the various sects of the Scribes and the Pharisees would help him not at all. This speaker received an ovation. The audience insisted on hearing him again at a later stage in the debates, and, finally, elected him the first Oriental member of the permanent executive.

There were dramatic moments. When the Hindoo rose and spake was one of them. Another was when M. Ferdinand Buisson, of the école laïque, in a fighting speech stated, without mincing matters, the generally prevailing conception in France of the lay school. The audience made it clear while his speech was in progress what wide gulfs yet remain to be bridged. However, the Belgian cleric had no less his turn on the platform, and no less his say, and, on the whole, it is remarkable that such diverse expressions of thought should have been so frankly set forward and that one should have been conscious all the time of a general good feeling prevailing.

But the Congress was passing through a crisis, nevertheless. It has passed through it successfully. After the First Congress at London in 1908 there were murmurings of the extremists of the lay school that it had been captured by the clericals. At a later stage, when The Hague was chosen as the seat of the Second Congress, the murmurs almost became a roar. A clerical party was in power in Holland. The clericals would have it all their own way! Il n'en était rien. Every school of thought found expression in the volumes of papers. Every kind of orator found his way to the platform. The utmost impartiality prevailed. There was no capturing either by the one side or by the other. And I think the net result of this Second Congress is that all have learned that there is much more common ground for us to co-operate on than we deemed, and that we all have a greater desire to co-operate in future than we had before. It would have been a calamity had the lay school captured the Congress. It would have been an even greater calamity had the clericals captured it. It was necessary in the highest interests of the Congress that what I call roughly here the clericals and the lay should hold together. They have held. The victory is won.

On the whole, however, it should be stated that the lay point of view as exposed at this Congress met with a far more favourable acceptance than had been expected by the lay party itself. Indeed, I think it could be justly said to the credit of these Congresses that the lay party, by rubbing shoulders with the better representatives among the clericals, has lost a good deal of its crudity. And the clericals are learning, too. One expected the Dutch Calvinist, for example, a very rigid type, to have been much to the fore. He was well represented in the audience. But he put in very few appearances on the platform. I asked for some explanation of this remarkable phenomenon from my Dutch friends. They informed me that in the first place the Dutchman is reticent on religious matters in public debate. But they added that he was also somewhat taken off his feet by witnessing the novel spectacle of Rationalists no less serious and convinced than he was himself. It was a revelation to him. The puzzling psychology of this situation contributed largely, I understand, to keep him tongue-tied. If this be so, how large a lesson of charity the Congress must have conveyed to this particular type of mind peculiarly impenetrable to new ideas in the religious realm.

The Congress numbered some 900 members. Some 400 of these were Dutch, 150 French, 130 English, the other members hailing from Germany, Belgium, Austria, Hungary, Russia (over 50 from Russia), the United States of America, Scandinavia, Spain, Japan, China, India, Algeria, Egypt, and Peru. There are four published volumes of papers covering over 1,000 pages. Among the English contributors are Dr. Sadler, Professor Mackenzie, Professor Adamson, Dr. Saleeby, Dr. Stanton Coit, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, Dr. Hayward, Mr. F. J. Gould, and Mr. Gustav Spiller. Among contributors abroad the French are admirably represented by MM. Bouteux, Buisson, Delvelvé, Séailles, Bureau, Bonet-Maury and others. The five first were present at the Congress. Mr. F. J. Gould also gave a Demonstration Moral Lesson to a class of English children before a crowded audience of members of many nationalities, and probably proved thereby—if one is to judge by the splendid reception the Lesson obtained—more than all the debates that “one touch of nature makes the whole world kin.”

May I conclude my article with the two closing sentences of my own contribution to the papers at the Congress—“The child will in the long run prove to be our Reconciler. It is written that Christ set a little child in the midst of his wrangling disciples. If we of this Congress go and do likewise and consider the child's needs rather than what in an inferior sense are our own, we shall have attained the Kingdom.”

HARROLD JOHNSON.

“AS SNOW IN SUMMER, AS RAIN IN HARVEST.”

I HAD asked him for something for our Harvest Festival. Last year he had given two beautiful sheaves of corn, and they had stood to the worshippers like two splendid poems fraught with a thousand suggestions of the wonder of God's world. One was of red wheat, a rich fawn; the other of the colour of the hair of the Blessed Damozel. The sloping field had been divided between these two cereals, and often as I glanced through my study window, my eyes had followed the path of the wandering wind as it swept over the waving plain, until plain and sky were lost in a haze of dream.

A glance at that field had seldom failed to awaken the racial memory of a myriad summers hidden in some unexplored crypt of my being, and fill me with ineffable emotions. And though I had kept my love secret, on the day of thanksgiving, two sheaves from the valley standing thick with corn had challenged my harvest message and made it a vain mouthing.

This year my farming acquaintance came empty-handed. No, not quite empty handed. In his hand were two stalks of wheat. And as he laid them on my desk his hand twitched in a nervous manner, unusual with him, and his mouth was set grimly. As I took up the two ears of wheat to examine them, he watched me closely. Out of every grain had shot a green shoot, and suspended to the base was a white rootlet covered with down. The cut corn had been so long in the fields awaiting dry days for the stacking, the rain had been so continuous and steadfast, that every seed had germinated. The gathering-in, the thrashing in the barn, the roasting, the miller's grindstone, the housewife's baking had all been made impossible. There was no bread in this corn. Man's need had been overleapt by the insistent call for growth. The cupboard may be empty, but Nature's endless process must go on. Those two disappointing ears were a symbol of the wretched summer season. They summed up the tragedy of farming. Luxuriant growth, full ears, bountifulness—but no fine weather for the harvesting. Hay rotting on the flooded meadows; potatoes honeycombed with slugs and wire worms; and the grain that was to be bread for the eater and seed for the sower, foiling the rational expectations of the patient and industrious husbandman. I looked up to my visitor's face. He had not yet spoken. His eyes had wandered to a page of “Hymns Ancient and Modern” that stood open on the small organ that solaces my hours of depression, and he was reading, under the motto, “Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness,” the following verse:—

To Thee, O Lord, our hearts we raise
In hymns of adoration,
To Thee bring sacrifice of praise
With shouts of exultation;
Bright robes of gold the fields adorn,
The hills with joy are ringing,
The valleys stand so thick with corn
That even they are singing.

A sarcastic smile made folds in his features. I had seen the look before. When Farmer Hopkin wants to be very nasty to the parson, he says “Your God.” The look that usually accompanies that expression now occupied his brow, mingled with a suggestion of bitter triumph. For I still held in my hand the blasted ears. Blasted? They were too painfully eloquent of a virile life; they shouted out their indecent message that next year's crops were assured. But what of this year? Farmer Hopkin has on several occasions arraigned my philosophy of life. He has not always been a farmer. He spent many years on the sea, saving every florin, for he meant to retire early, preferring terra firma to the marine poetry of motion and the “unploughed main.” But on the eve of realising his life's ambition, a building society in which he had invested all his earnings smashed up, and he lost everything. From that day he had ceased to believe in the goodness of God. He feels that all his abstinences, his asceticisms, his sacrifices were repudiated by Providence, laughed at and made before all men a scorn and a derision.

Abandoning the sea, instead of a life of leisure and rose-culture, he had to begin another life of hard labour on the soil. His vigour, his energy, his robust manliness remain with him as the reward of those years of self-denial. The parson makes tentative reference to these things when the two “spar and argufy.” It is the farmer who always begins. Beneath all his scepticism there is a real profound faith, the existence of which he would never acknowledge even to himself. But it manifests itself in the desire to put the parson on his mettle, in forcing him to vindicate “his God.” And to-day, the army of droughts, diseases, pests, moulds and noxious bacteria, which conclusively prove a devil to Spink, the boot-maker of our village, had an ally in Farmer Hopkin's wasted cornfield. The two comrades in unfaith were present at the harvest service. I felt something of the exhilaration of a prisoner on trial making his defence. The sermon can be put in a nutshell, Epictetus said it long ago: “This man invokes the gods to set him free from some troubles; let it be your petition that your mind may never put you upon such a wish. Another is very devout to prevent the loss of his son. But I would have you pray rather against the fear of losing him. Let this be the rule of your devotions.”

One lesson of a bad harvest may be the demonstration how easily the heroic mind can rise above loss and calamity, and how no vicissitude may be feared if severe enough to bid one thank the gods for his unconquerable soul. The stoic in Farmer Hopkin came out to meet this appeal, but Spink wagged his head in a superior way. When next I meet him, a new set of difficulties will have to be faced. Upon the window sill of his workshop he keeps a few stalks of wheat in a glass bottle, "Answer that!" he will demand, pointing with a boot toward the sprouting ears, and I shall have to plead for time and leave the reply to next year's harvest. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? J. T. D.

LITERARY STUDIES.

ACONTIUS:

An Elizabethan Protester against the Narrowness of Creeds.

I.

HIS LIFE.

A CREED every man must have, a living belief by which he directs his path, the inward principle which is his life-force. But in giving expression to it, his creed tends to become hardened into forms that can no longer grow with himself, but become dead armour, which will press out his life unless he can throw them off.

The Sixteenth Century in Europe was a time of intensest energy, bursting through the outward forms of other days, in the effort to live a life of its own. In Protestantism it found visible expression, the very name being evidence of its determination to live life in its own way. But as soon as the energy began to die away and the consequent hardening of thought to set in once more, creeds of all kinds became the order of the day, with disastrous results both civil and religious. Devastating wars were the outcome of the clash of creed with creed, and intellectual and spiritual stagnation followed in their wake.

Here and there a voice crying in the wilderness was raised against this fatal tendency. One of the clearest and most forceful of these was that of Giacomo Aconzio, or as his name was latinised according to the custom of the day, Jacobus Acontius. He was born at Trent in the Tyrol about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and was educated for the law. He seems to have spent some years at an Italian Court; but owing to his religious views, was compelled to take refuge at Bâle in 1557, from whence, two years later, he found his way to England, a great rallying-place for Continental heretics at that time. Here his talents as an engineer were brought into play, and he seems to have been prolific in inventions of machines and furnaces of various kinds. For these he received in 1560 an annuity of £60 from the Government, as a set-off for the refusal to give him a patent for his inventions. He was made an English citizen in 1561, and undertook some important reclamation works in connection with low-lying lands along the Thames. In 1564 he dedicated to the Earl of Leicester a treatise on the use and study of history, which is still in manuscript at the Record Office. While in London he naturally belonged to the Strangers' Church in Austin Friars; but, together with its minister, Andrew Hamstedius, he was expelled by Bishop Grindall, and forbidden the sacrament, on a charge of heresy.

In 1565 he published the book which made him famous, the "Stratagemata Satanae," which was printed at Bâle by his old Italian publisher and friend, Peter Perna. The last notice of him is in connection with a letter written by him as a reply to a charge of Sabellianism, which is dated June 6, 1566. He probably died shortly after this date, and some years later the Queen's Master of Italian published one of his remains on "The Fear of God."

II.

HIS INFLUENCE.

His great work, "Satan's Stratagems," had a curious history and a wide influence in its day, though now long forgotten. It does not seem to have attracted much attention for some generations after its appearance; but during the reign of Charles I. it appears to have powerfully influenced men of the first rank. An Oxford edition of the original Latin was published in 1631. Cheynell (so famous for the way in which he officiated at Chillingworth's funeral) asserts "that Acontius was new printed in Oxford by Doctour Potter's bookbinder, Creature I might say, if I did affect the language of the times." He thinks they might as well have printed Bonsinius, for they were "both sneaking Socinians, they followed Socinus just as Nicodemus followed Christ, by stealth and in the dark." "Acontius and the Socinians," he says, "thought nothing else Fundamental but obedience to Christ's precepts; men might deny the Godhead of Jesus Christ, and almost any Article of the Christian Faith, and yet be Christians good enough in their conceit." He thinks Acontius' book might well be called the Stratagems of Satan; but, he adds, "Sorry I am that Doctour Potter should be thought to have a hand in publishing of it, that it was known in Oxford by the name of Doctour Potter's Stratagems." Dr. Potter was the Provost of Queen's College from 1626 to the triumph of the Parliament, and was Vice-Chancellor of the University in 1640. He became involved in a controversy with the Jesuit Knott, which Chillingworth undertook for him. In connection with this dispute, Chillingworth wrote his famous book, "The Religion of Protestants."

Chillingworth appears to have been powerfully influenced by the liberal tone of Acontius' book. In his celebrated denunciation of the creeds which men imposed on their fellows, "under the equal penalty of death and damnation," and the "persecuting, burning, cursing, damning of men for not subscribing to the words of men as the words of God," he says, "This perswasion is no singularity of mine, but the doctrine which I have learn't from Divines of great learning and judgment. Let the reader be pleased to peruse the seaventh booke of Acontius de Stratag. Satanae, and Zanchius his last Oration delivered by him after the composing of the discord between him and Amerbachius, and he shall confess as much." Thus Potter, Chillingworth, and Acontius' "Stratagems" were evidently closely interwoven in their influences.

Another edition of the 1631 impression was issued at Oxford in 1650. But as Oxford was then under the full sway of the Parliamentarians, and with Cheynell's curses on the book ringing in their ears, it is strange that a second edition should have been required. It shows what a great hold it had gained on the Oxford mind.

But a learned audience was found insufficient, and an English translation of the first four books by the celebrated John Goodwin was published in London in 1648 under the title of "Satan's Stratagems, or the Devil's Cabinet Councel Discovered." Cheynell came into very close touch with this book, and has left a curious account of the manner in which it was treated by the Westminster Assembly, of which he was a member. In his energetic search after heresy, he brought Goodwin's book to the notice of this body, and a Committee was chosen to read it and report upon it. The Committee quickly "admired" that a member of the Assembly, in the person of Mr. Dury, should have recommended it in a letter which opens the book. Dury praises Acontius as an "excellent man," whose "excellency did lie in the depth and solidity of his judgment in everything; and in the piety and moderation of his spirit in Matters of Religion." He further points to the subtlety of Satan, who makes every truth a matter of strife; but Acontius had discovered his aim, and had warned his generation faithfully. A book of this nature would be very useful in such troubled times, when it was so hard to fight against the whole current of the age, "and that strongly and irresistibly (as in his age Acontius did)." He therefore thanks the translator for the pains he had taken in rendering into English "this excellent piece of Learning."

According to Cheynell, the Committee asked that Dury should be added to their number, but according to the Minutes of the Assembly, he was on it from the beginning, and the Committee was enlarged some days later by the addition of four more names. When Dury was brought face to face with his fellow-members, he does not appear to have fought against the current of the age quite as bravely as Acontius, for he immediately promised a retraction as public as the recommendation he had given, alleging as his excuse that "he clearly saw that they had practised upon his passionate love of peace." Upon this the Committee reported to the Assembly through Cheynell, who informs us that he "discoursed somewhat affectionately and freely, according to the weight and moment of the Point in Question." The finding of the Assembly was colourless, for it resolved that "The Assembly do return thanks to the Committee, particularly to the reverend brother for the pains taken therein, and that if he himself or any other of the Committee shall as from themselves publish any [thing] for the vindication of the truth and discovering the danger in that book, it will be acceptable to the Assembly," upon which they proceeded to debate proofs of the Shorter Catechism. From the terms of the resolution, it would seem to have been almost a Committee of one, and the Assembly was evidently not prepared to take the responsibility of anything written on the subject, knowing probably that Cheynell would rush immediately into print over the matter.

Dury's letter, which accompanies John Goodwin's as a preface to the English translation, is addressed to Samuel Hartlib. Hartlib was a great friend of Milton. He was the son of a Polish merchant in Prussia, who married the daughter of an English merchant at Dantzic. Though nominally himself a merchant, he was really a philanthropist and educational expert, and to him Milton dedicated his Treatise on Education. Dury seems to suggest that Hartlib was in some way responsible for the translation of Acontius' work, as Dury intreats him to convey his "love and service," together with his thanks, to the friends who had taken the profitable pains to translate it into English. Thus Milton also, as a friend of Hartlib, would seem likely to have come within the charmed circle of Acontius' influence.

In the article on Acontius in Wallace's "Antitrinitarian Biography," a writer is quoted who affirms "that some of the finest passages of Milton's 'Areopagitica' may be traced to Acontius." This is somewhat exaggerated, if literally meant, but the spirit of the "Areopagitica" is very similar to that of "Satan's Stratagems." Both were in favour of freedom, the Elizabethan engineer of the easing of the conscience from the bonds of fettering creeds, and the Puritan poet of the releasing of the world of letters from the weight of a literary despotism. Their aim was one, and as Milton may well have been familiar with Acontius' book, as every well-educated Englishman of the time would be, it is quite possible that some of his inspiration may have come from that source. For instance, in Milton's well-known description of London as the armoury of liberty, he scorns "these fantastic terrors of sect and schism." What some lamented he rejoiced at, and rather praised men for taking once more into their own hands the care of their religion. "A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to joyn and unite in one generall and brotherly search after Truth, could we but foregoe this Prelaticall tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men." In the same strain the older man had said (adopting Goodwin's translation): "Let us abandon bad language, scoffs, contempt; so wil it certainly fall out, that such as err shal at length be brought to acknowledg the Truth. . . Do but consider when as our Lord says, Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I wil give you ease; Shal any man be so fool-hardy, as to dare to pul him that is coming, and of his own head say to him: Oh! do you hear, it wil be in vain for you to go unto Christ, who do not believe this or that point? Who art thou that wilt hinder another man's servant from coming at his Master's call? With what confidence takest thou upon thee to divine at the wil of God, not being very clearly manifested unto thee."

Again Milton gives the good advice that "if the men be erroneous who appear to be the leading schismatics, what withholds us but our sloth, our self-will, and distrust in the right cause, that we do not give them gentle meetings and gentle dismissions, that we debate not and examin the matter throughly with liberrall and frequent audience?" This prime requisite of the rational spirit Acontius had already emphasised, when he said, "Neither shalt thou ever be able to any purpose to weaken a false assertion, unless thou first understand what it is; now he that does not with attention and patience listen, that does not suspend his judgment til the defendant have finished his discourse, cannot sufficiently understand what it is which he affirms, but whiles at every word spoke, he wil be divining at the other's meaning, and suffers his judgment to out-run his adversarie's words, he shal not confute his arguments, but those which by his own rashness and false interpretation he hath feigned to himself."

J. H. M. NOLAN.

(To be continued next week.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

SIR,—As the longest letter in last week's INQUIRER charges me with dogmatism, I desire to say a few words on that subject.

The charge is really extraordinary, for two reasons; one being that I did not offer any opinion on the subject at issue! The other is that your correspondent's letter is a flagrant example of that dogmatism which I deprecate. I probably said that, in the present state of our knowledge, we have no evidence for the dogma of the endless survival of human consciousness. In that case I was but quoting what THE INQUIRER had already said.

And what does your correspondent do to grapple with the question? He dismisses three rather promising lines of investigation. He says that he has a fourth method, but he does not disclose it! He vaguely hints that it is something like "the secret of a mother's love." But that secret is revealed to us by direct observation. It is involved in species-preservation; as when a blackbird attacks a cat, or a polar bear dies in defence of her cubs. But this method, as applied to endless duration, presents obvious difficulties; and, as your correspondent says, "I do not claim by any manner of means that it is conclusive." Yet he asserts the dogma with much unnecessary warmth. If that be not dogmatism, what is it? I may add that his remarks about the insanity of early man are not mine. Dogmatism is a mental defect, but it is not insanity.—Yours, &c.,

O. A. SHRUBSOLE.

Reading, September 16, 1912.

SIR,—I always read with great interest the discourses and discussions published in THE INQUIRER on the future life. The strong reasons which inspire our longing for and hope of a survival beyond the tomb are ably set forth, but insufficient notice is taken of another side of the question. The chief cause of the growing disbelief in immortality is to be found in closer attention to the facts, or appearances, which point to a possible extinction of the soul. We have all observed cases in which physical accidents, disease, old age have more or less obliterated the mind. Our church in Brussels has just lost by death its oldest member. For several years his mind had been gradually failing, till at last only a very small spark remained, and during the final days unconsciousness was complete. What had the soul become? Questions of this sort often turn would-be believers into sorrowful doubters; and many would be very grateful to those who could help them seriously to overcome this difficulty. I confess I am among those who need help rather than among the helpers.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HOCART.

Brussels, September 15, 1912.

SIR,—Mr. Howard concludes his letter published in your last issue with the salutary reminder that in discussing this question we are in the presence of problems so vast, in a universe so limitless and full of mysteries, that it behoves the inquirer to adopt a tone of reverence whether he can claim to hold a definite belief or not. We are, indeed, faced by tremendous difficulties and possibilities which only men and women of supreme faith and spiritual insight have ever been able to confront with any degree of confidence, but in considering this subject it should be remembered that, as Professor James pointed out, the evidence of the genius and the mystic, even when they exhibit signs of what seems to us abnormality, is just as valuable as that of the scientist who argues cautiously from observed facts and a materialistic basis. Some might even consider it more valuable, if Bergson is right about intuition, and if the genius and the mystic represent the highest level of human development, and are really mounting the last rung of the ladder of achievement which we slowly climb as our latent faculties, mental and spiritual, are gradually evolved and brought into play. This, of course, widens the field of discussion, and makes it impossible to avoid all those grounds for belief in a future life which are dealt with, for instance, in Myers' "Human Personality." I understand, though I have not read the book, that Prof. McDougall, in "Body and Mind," also throws considerable light on the problem of the soul, and arrives at conclusions which are of supreme importance, as coming from the scientific side, in support of the religious attitude which he did not set out to defend. In this connection I should like to mention Mrs. Besant's suggestive little book, "Theosophy and the New Psychology," which might almost be called a footnote to Professor James's great work on religious experiences. It sets up—in a manner the reverse of dogmatic—certain hypotheses which many may be unable to accept, such as the debateable one of pre-existence to which some of your correspondents have referred more or less indirectly; but the fabric of knowledge rests on hypotheses, after all, and some of us desire nothing more earnestly than that those which are dealt with in this and other books on similar lines should be given the widest publicity, in order that they may be judged on their own merits like other theories, and treated with the respectful consideration which is usually accorded to the theories of scientific men. Whether they are endorsed or repudiated by the enlightened among us, it will be all to the good that those who hold them should learn how to defend them intelligently, and that those who do not may at least weigh the value of beliefs which are proving full of help and solace to many people.—Yours, &c.,

LAURA G. ACKROYD.

Brondesbury Park, N.W.,
September 17, 1912.

THE ABUSE OF LANGUAGE.

SIR,—Surely there must be philologists among your readers, who, acquainted not merely with the important highways of their province, but with its pleasant and quaint by-ways as well, could explain the origin of the constant interjection of that senseless word into low speech which was the topic of a short article in your issue of last week. I call it senseless because it is not merely not confined to “strong language,” but from the very frequency with which it is uttered, if from no other reason, is devoid of all strength, whilst the inappropriateness of its application suffices to show that it was not introduced with any regard for its expressiveness. Being senseless it is equally, and as a matter of simple consequence, harmless too, save in as much as it is an indication of lowliness comparable to the omission of the aspirate, which, fortunately one or two degrees less offensive to the ear and imagination, is characteristic of the same class of speakers and of a much larger class besides. Moreover, the insertion of the one being well nigh as frequent as the omission of the other, it is equally unnoticeable to the ears of those who are accustomed to such speech. I can remember, as I suppose many others can remember who were boys some thirty years ago, how a word to be placed at random before the name of any object, just as senseless as that one, though happily of a sound more innocent, acquired a temporary vogue at school. A somewhat similar symptom of youth or undeveloped intellect is recourse to slang, and the choice of comically inappropriate words which have gained a recognised value in the dialect of girls as well as boys—such as “awful” and “ripping.” It would be deplorable indeed if such undignified language were to usurp the place of noble speech among all grown men and women of the land—and, indeed, it seems to have been winning toleration in unexpected places during the past ten or fifteen years, so that one reads, for instance, in a School History of England “written for all boys and girls who are interested in the story of Great Britain and her Empire,” of a claimant to the throne being “quietly shoved aside”; but most boys and girls come to recognise it as one of the experiments that fail, and discontinue it as such under the refining influences of advancing years. Taste is a thing that does not belong to birth; it can be acquired only by intercourse with those who are already cultured, whether in life or in their literature or art.—Yours, &c.,

EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Cairncastle, September 16, 1912.

JOHN POUNDS' HOME.

AN APPEAL BY THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

SIR,—It is now fourteen years since the work of caring for and training the orphan and neglected children of Portsmouth streets, so nobly begun a century ago by John Pounds, was taken up in the same spirit of self-sacrificing devotion by Mary Rogers. The teaching of the three R's to ragged urchins was, on the part of the glorious old cobbler, a labour of love; and no less is this the case with the training of friendless girls in the duties of the home, now carried on in St. Simon's-road, Southsea, by Mrs. Rogers. An institution of this kind would seem to be especially needed in a town like Portsmouth, where there is great poverty among the families of the casual labourers at the docks, and constant distress in the homes; and yet where girls on leaving school have no wage-earning employment open to them, and are at the same time exposed to all the dangers unhappily abounding in a port, and a garrison town. It is just then that a helping hand held out may save them from these threatening evils; and when the helping hand can also enable them to learn the beauty and the use of “ordered household ways,” and so prepare them for womanly service in their own or others' homes, it is surely a work that claims our sympathy, and demands our help.

The call comes especially in this case to the members of our own group of Liberal Christian Churches, for Mrs. Rogers, being a Unitarian, like John Pounds, cannot unfortunately look for much support from orthodox sources. Her reports show that many of those belonging to our household of faith are already subscribers, or give help in other ways, without which the success attained would not be possible; but there must be many others who would be glad to join in this good work did they realise its needs. At the present moment there is a special need for extra help, as, after the wear and tear of years; the house requires repainting, the linen replenishing, &c.; and donations for this purpose are asked for by Mrs. Rogers; while further subscriptions would enable her to extend the work, which, valuable as it is, only touches the fringe of the great existing need.

The Committee feel that this definite piece of actual Social Service is one which may be commended to the members of the Union, and all other sympathisers, in the confident hope that each will make some effort, however small, to answer the appeal. The address of Mrs. Rogers is: John Pounds' House, St. Simon's-road, Southsea.

We are, on behalf of the Committee,
J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, Chairman.
CATHERINE GITTINS, } Joint
JOHN S. BURGESS, } Hon. Secs.

THE GUILD MOVEMENT.

SIR,—Permit us, through your columns, to call the attention of our ministerial brethren and the Churches generally to the Guild Movement at the beginning of another season for indoor work. From our experiences, and from the reports presented to our annual meetings, we know that the Guild has proved one of the most valuable agencies of our Church life, exercising an active and vitalising influence on all the other agencies. It organises the benevolent and philanthropic forces that ought to be found in every living Church. It unites its members in a common cause, and inspires them to kindly deeds and Christian graces. By providing a mid-week meeting it brings the members of our Churches into living sympathy with each other, while its devotional meetings, conducted usually by the members, fosters the religious spirit and leads to the realisation of our motto, “For God and the Good Life.” Inquiries continue to be made respecting the formation of a Guild and the aims and objects of Guild meetings. In response thereto we desire to say that the Council of our Guilds' Union will most gladly afford every help and assistance within its power in this direction by sending speakers to explain the principles and working of a Guild. As we say in our Triennial Report, the Guilds' Union may be compared to a bureau of information, and we invite inquiries and calls for service that may result in the organising of our young people more especially, and the utilising of all the energies and aspirations that make for the Christian ideal.—We are, in bonds of Christian fellowship,

W. H. LAMBELLE, President.

C. M. WRIGHT, Hon. Sec.

JOSEPH WOOD } Vice-Presidents.

J. J. WRIGHT }

H. P. GREG, Treasurer.

September 19, 1912.

LITERARY NOTES.

A NEW volume of theological essays by various members of the University of Oxford, edited by the Rev. B. H. Streeter, will be issued shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. It will be called “Foundations,” and is described as an attempt to state the essentials of Christianity in the terms of contemporary thought. The contributors will include the Rev. William Temple, Headmaster of Repton, the Rev. N. S. Talbot, Fellow of Balliol, the Rev. R. Brooke, Fellow of Merton, the Rev. R. G. Parsons, Principal of Wells Theological College, the Rev. A. E. J. Rawlinson, Tutor of Keble College, and Mr. W. H. Moberly, Fellow of Lincoln College.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will also publish a Life of Francis Paget, D.D., the late Bishop of Oxford, by Stephen Paget and the Rev. J. M. C. Crum; Six Lectures on the Inns of Court and of Chancery, delivered in the Middle Temple Hall, which will include two lectures by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C.; a new edition thoroughly revised of Sir F. G. Kenyon's Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament; "The Immanence of God in Rabbinical Literature," by Dr. Abelson; the second series of Dr. Bernard Bosanquet's Gifford Lectures on "The Value and Destiny of the Individual"; and "Economic and Ethic," translated from the Italian of Benedetto Croce, being the second of the three volumes of Croce's "Philosophy of the Spirit."

* * *

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON announce among their forthcoming theological books "St Paul's Hymn of Love," by Prof. Harnack; "St. Paul in the Light of Religious and Social History," by Prof. Adolf Deissmann; "Puritanism in England," by Canon Hensley Henson; "The Psychology of the New Testament," by Mr. M. Scott Fletcher, with an introduction by Canon Rashdall; "The Principle of Authority in Relation to Certainty, Sanctity, and Society," by Principal Forsyth; and "The Preacher, his Life and Work," by the Rev. J. H. Jowett.

* * *

AMONG MESSRS. Hodder and Stoughton's other books are "Margaret Ethel Macdonald: a Memoir," by J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P.; "Among Books Old and New, a Study of the Struggle between Paganism and Spiritual Idealism," by Dr. John Kelman, and "The Papyri Discovered at Elephantine," records of a Jewish Community in the Persian period, by Dr. Edward Meyer.

* * *

THE Oxford University Press announce a new edition of the late Canon Bigg's Bampton Lectures on "The Christian Platonists of Alexandria," edited by the Rev. F. E. Brightman. They will also issue in the Oxford English Texts Donne's Poetical Works, edited by H. J. C. Grierson, and the elaborate edition of Coleridge's Poetical Works which Mr. E. H. Coleridge has been preparing for a considerable time.

* * *

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK's new books include "The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ," by Professor H. R. Mackintosh—a new volume of the "International Theological Library"; "Eternal Life: A Study of its Implications and Applications," by Baron von Hügel; "The Sources of Religious Insight," by Professor Josiah Royce; "Primitive Christianity and its non-Jewish Sources," by Professor Carl Clemen, of Bonn; and the fifth volume of the "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics," which will bring the work down to Fichte.

* * *

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS have in preparation a translation of Reinhart Dozy's "Histoire des Musalmans d'Espagne." The work has been carefully revised and annotated by Mr. F. G. Stokes, and where necessary relevant passages have been cited from more recent writers. They will also publish "The Poem-Book of the Gael," selected and edited by Miss Eleanor Hull. The volume will be adorned with initial letters and designs from Irish manuscripts, and most of the translations are in English verse—many of them in the metre of the original poems.

* * *

IN "The Voice of One Crying," shortly to be published by A. & C. Black, Mrs. Gibson Cheyne, the author of many small volumes of lyric verse, has, for a time, put off her singing robes, and assumed the rough garb of the prophet. Not in her own person, but in that of an imaginary Son of Man, a servant of the Lord, she surveys the different classes of mankind, and seeks to stir up the dull and encourage the down-cast. The pieces in the volume are in lines of irregular length, and are poetry rather in spirit than in form. The rules of metre and rhyme would have hindered that unsparring veracity which is essential to prophecy.

* * *

PROF. T. K. CHEYNE's new book "Mines of Isaiah Re-explored," which Messrs. A. & C. Black are publishing, is an original contribution to the study of the "Later Isaiah." It is shown that the current views of the "Liberation of the Jewish exiles need much rectification," and that the "Liberator" was not the Persian King Cyrus, but a successful North Arabian adventurer.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK:—A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and Jonah: H. G. Mitchell, D.D., J. M. P. Smith, Ph.D., Julius A. Bewer, Ph.D. 12s.

MESSRS. CASSELL & CO., LTD.:—Morals and Brain: Sir Thomas Clouston, M.D., LL.D. 6d. net. Religion and Race Regeneration: The Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D. 6d. net. Literature, the Word of Life or Death: Canon Barry, D.D. 6d. net.

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & CO.:—Parallel Paths, a Study of Biology, Ethics, and Art: T. W. Rolleston. 2s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. DENT & SONS:—Everyman Library. 1s. net:—Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, P. M. Roget, vols. i. ii.; Three Comedies, Björnstjerne Björnson; The Life and Adventures of Audubon the Naturalist, R. Buchanan; Poems and Translations, Dante Gabriel Rossetti; Apologia Pro Vita Sua, J. H. Newman; Divine Love and Wisdom, E. Swedenborg; Anna Karenina, Count Leo Tolstoi, vols. i. ii.; Letters from an American Farmer, H. St. John Crevecoeur; A Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology, M. Edwards and L. Spence; Cobbett's Rural Rides, edited by Edward Thomas, vols. i. ii.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Cambridge Bible, Ecclesiasticus. 6s. net.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD.:—O Soul of Mine! James Rhoades. 1s. net.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY:—More Golden than Gold.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—Marriage, its Ethic and Religion: The Rev. Principal P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D. 2s. 6d. net. The Mind of a Master Builder: The Rev. H. B. Durrant, M.A. 2s. 6d. net. The Psychology of the New Testament: M. Scott Fletcher, M.A., B.Litt. 6s.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.:—Civilisation at the Cross Roads: J. N. Figgis. 5s. net.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS:—Love and Ethic: Ellen Key. 1s. net.

MR. FISHER UNWIN:—Malta and the Mediterranean Race: R. N. Bradley. 8s. 6d. net.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ORDER.

II.

ONCE upon a time, many years ago, two little sisters were sitting, subdued and lonesome, on a winter's evening in what was known as the Big Parlour of their country home. They were quite alone. Father was away on business; there was a new cook with whom they were shy; and Mother was upstairs with baby, who was very ill. There were no hospital nurses to be had then; when anyone fell sick there was just Mother to mind them. It was a matter of course for these little girls to be left to mind, not only themselves, but the house, too, for Mother. To be sure, Ruth must have been seven then—quite responsible, Betty, who was younger, thought.

Upstairs the Mother, too, was lonely as well as weary and sad. Father was to return that evening. It would be a melancholy house if she could not leave Baby to have some kind of welcome ready for him. But that seemed out of the question.

I must tell you what the Big Parlour was like; a big, bare room, with just the necessary furniture and no more; no photographs or extras of any kind. Pleasant, very, of a sunshiny morning, and very cosy at night; that is, when Father and Mother were there. But now, with just those two little white-pinafores figures . . . ! And the only light was from two heavy old silver branches, holding candles of home manufacture; no lamps, let alone gas or electric light. The candles illuminated the big mahogany table upon which they were placed, but left the corners of the room dim and shadowy. Outside, snow was falling and making the world a very eerie place indeed.

The children had their supper, and then the things were carried away, and there seemed nothing more to do. They had played with their dolls, and pasted pictures in scrap-books, but were tired of both. And such a litter as there was. Cut papers, paste and scissors; dolls and their clothes lying about everywhere! Betty sat on the hearthrug and began knocking with the poker at the turf fire. The sparks flew merrily up the wide chimney, and looked bright and cheery. But it also caused the white ashes to drop about the hearth.

"That's making a mess!" said Ruth.

Betty dropped the poker and began to cry!

"It's so lonely!" she said, "I wish Mother would come down!" Ruth wished that too, but she said nothing for a bit. She was looking round the room with its air of neglect, everything slipshod. A bright idea struck her.

"Mother can't leave Baby," she said, "but I'll tell you what, Betty! Let's play that she is coming down, and let's just think what she'd like to see when she came in. I know! She hates seeing this room in a litter . . . Let's tidy up. . . ." "Yes, let's!" said Betty, who, indeed, almost always agreed with what Ruth said.

So the little girls set to work very briskly. They pushed the heavy horse-hair covered chairs back against the wall into their places. They closed the shutters and drew the thick crimson curtains quite across the windows, so as to shut out even the idea of the cold, silent snow. They cleared away everything they had had of doll-ware and scrap-book treasures. They swept the hearth quite clean of the fluffy ashes that Betty had scattered there. They . . . but you'll have to imagine for yourselves all the other things Ruth and Betty did! I can't remember any more. And then they went softly upstairs and washed faces and hands, and tidied their hair. It was the fashion then to wear it in plaits, one at each side, tied with ribbon; Ruth thought the play would be more real if they took out their Sunday ribbons, they were blue, and very pretty. So busy were they, and so careful, speaking only in whispers, that they never heard sounds that might have warned them! To be sure, the wheels were deadened by the snow as Father drove up to the door. But neither did they hear the swish-swish of soft skirts that meant Mother running down herself to let Father in. And he and she had just gone into the Big Parlour, and were standing by the fire, and it was, . . . "You must be very cold, dear!" and then, "What matter, if the child is better."

"Yes, yes! he's in such a sound sleep, that I just left him to see you. . ."

And then in crept the little sisters, still very careful to make no noise.

Well, what a surprise it was! What a play they had had, and here it had come true! Mother had come down, and not only that, but Father was there . . . and they expecting nothing but the empty room they had just left.

They almost screamed with joy, as they rushed forward. In a moment Betty was on Father's broad shoulders, hugging him and petting his cold face. And Ruth was in Mother's arms, close to her tender heart.

"My good little girls!" Mother said. "What put it into your heads to do all this? Nothing forgotten that I meant to do myself. . . Father's slipper toasting for him . . . and my chair and the comfy footstool ready."

"Sit in it, Mother, do!" begged Ruth; and that was done, and Ruth wasn't a bit too big to be taken on Mother's lap. Then Mother had to tell again about Baby and how much better he was, so that she could leave him with Nurse. . . How happy they all were, in that old, shabby Big Parlour. And why?

Well, of course, the main thing to be thankful for was that Baby was better! But, in addition, Mother's heart was gladdened by the signs she saw of the loving thought of her little daughters. She was very orderly herself; and now, exhausted as she was, body, and mind, by the days and nights of anxious watching by Baby, it was like comfort to her to have that neat, cosy Big Parlour to rest in. She sighed with satisfaction as she saw, too, that the children had made themselves tidy as well as the room. Ruth and Betty never forgot that evening, and the pleasure their efforts after Order had given to the dear Mother.

This is only a very little story to tell, you will say! Yes, but as I reminded you before, it is the little things that matter. Tidiness is only a small virtue, you think, but to practise it means getting a habit that will help you very much. No one can tell the extra work people have who are not orderly in their ways; the lost papers, the mislaid gloves and pins. It is endless, the confusion that is caused by the want of this small virtue.

But besides this, Order really is Heaven's first law. Nothing, to one who does not know, could seem more irregular than the stars that shine in their countless myriads down upon our earth. Yet each has its appointed place, and time to rise and set. Nothing in God's world is without rule. Music, beautiful and varied as it is, obeys strict laws. And we, too, have laws which we should regard if we wish to be true children of the Father who placed us here, and has given us these laws for our help and guidance.

K. F. P.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

A REFERENDUM ON RELIGION.

AN INTERNATIONAL SYMPOSIUM.

THE editorial board of the Cænobium, the able international Review devoted to the interests of the liberal movement in religion, is conducting an interesting inquiry into religious experience and belief by means of a referendum. The following Questionnaire has been issued, and we have been requested to submit it to the consideration of our readers. If any of them desire to take part in the Symposium by replying to all or some of the questions answers should be forwarded without delay to the Cænobium, Lugano, Switzerland.

LIST OF QUERIES.

(1) Do you distinguish between religion and religions, between the religious spirit common to all mankind in various degrees, and the denominational spirit which is confined to the dogmas of a particular creed? In which of these two senses will you use the word religion in your contribution to this inquiry?

(2) Does God occupy a place in your thoughts? If so, how do you conceive God? What does this word correspond to in your mind? What do you think about prayer?

(3) What do you understand by religious sentiment? If you consider it necessary, or at least useful, what means do you think most indicated or best adapted to promote it, strengthen it, keep it pure? Under what circumstances have you experienced religious emotions, and to what categories or what degrees of emotion do you think the word religious most particularly applies?

(4) Does the problem of a future life occupy your mind? Do you conceive a survival of personality after death? If so, do you understand it in the figurative sense of the repercussion of your deeds, or in the metaphysical sense of a reality beyond the grave?

(5) What relation is there, according to you, between religion and dogma? Is the one the condition of the other? And what do you understand by dogma?

(6) Can belief and science be reconciled? If so, how do you conceive such a conciliation?

(7) Do you consider morality independent of religion, or not? What place has the idea of a sanction in your moral life? Do you admit the terms sin and redemption? Are you convinced of the reality of evil in the sense of a power opposed to good? Do you believe in necessity and the possibility of conquering evil by our own efforts or by the help of others?

(8) Do you think that a school without God can truly fulfil its educational purpose? Is the lay school—or, which is practically the same, the school without confessionistic inspiration—not as well fitted for its educational mission as the denominational school? In this case, what would you substitute for the missing religious element? And if, on the other hand, you consider a religious spirit necessary, or at least useful, to what minimum do you think religious forms could be reduced, so that religious inspiration was not made too vague or insufficient?

(9) Have you preserved undiminished the faith of your childhood? If not, at what age and under what circumstances have you cut yourself off from the traditional religious confession, which we presume was that of your youth? What effect has this severance had on your sentiments, on your thoughts, on your conduct?

(10) Do you approve of relations between State and Church, and what do you conceive these should be?

NATIONAL HOME-READING UNION.

THE following statement of the aims of the National Home-Reading Union, and its opportunities of study during the coming season, has been issued by the Bishop of Hereford, Chairman of the Council, and Mr. J. W. Mackail, Chairman of the Executive Committee:—

Every year the output of books is increasing, and it becomes more difficult for persons who have not much time at their disposal to arrange their reading so that it shall be interesting and instructive. It may be of interest to your readers to hear of a society which gives the needed guidance, and also provides a means of promoting social intercourse.

The National Home-Reading Union was founded twenty-three years ago to guide readers of all ages and classes in their choice and use of books. The Council secures the help of experts in drawing up lists of books in various subjects graded in difficulty to suit all kinds of readers. In the magazine issued to members each month hints are given as to the way in which the books should be read, so as to yield the greatest pleasure and profit, in connection with a series of articles on the authors and their work. Tutorial help is offered, and questions are set which enable the reader to test the soundness of his knowledge of the subject. Members are encouraged to read in "Circles" formed for the purpose of mutual stimulus and help, and are united together in a great Reading Guild.

Some of the subjects selected for special study during the present winter are: India, Italy, Wordsworth and Coleridge, Ireland, Great Musicians, French Literature, Early Italian Art, the Open Air, the Bible as Literature, Jeremiah, Charities and their Administration, the Child at home, Dante (for beginners), Simple Biographical Studies, Founders of the Empire, Australia, the Study of Words, and General Literature.

Anyone may join the Union on payment of the small subscription (varying from 1s. to 4s.) which admits to membership in the different courses.

Full information about the courses, the formation of Reading Circles, &c., will gladly be given by the secretary of the Union, 12, York-buildings, Adelphi, London W.C.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT. AN APPEAL TO MINISTERS.

WE have received for publication the following letter from the President and ex-President of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. It is addressed specially to the ministers on the Roll of the Essex Hall Year Book.

DEAR FRIENDS,—We appeal to you for your support and sympathy in the work of the society which we represent. Many of you are teetotallers, all of you, we are persuaded, are "Temperance Reformers," in the sense that you recognise and deplore the evils of excessive drinking, that you believe the present conditions and regulations under which the sale of intoxicating drinks is carried on to be capable of improvement, and that you would gladly do something to promote wise attempts to improve them.

We who address you believe individually that personal abstinence is the soundest basis for temperance reformers to start from, and we know that many of you agree with us, but this is not the point on which we now desire to insist. The time is past when teetotallers could reproach the rest of the world with apparent indifference to the evils of drink, and also, we hope, when others could reproach teetotallers with neglect of all the broader issues involved, and a narrow and fanatical insistence on the one remedy of total abstinence guarded by a pledge.

No one now would dare to say that the drink question claims no attention, or that it is not his business; nor, on the other hand, would any teetotaller dare to maintain that poverty, unsanitary conditions, presence of opportunities and temptations, lack of open-air occupations, and general monotony and dullness of life have no bearing upon drinking habits. And all, presumably, would agree that under the existing system the sale of liquor is not regulated with a single eye either to the public good, however understood, or to the public wishes, however expressed or ascertained.

Our society, though primarily teetotal in its constitution, desires and invites the co-operation of all who are interested in temperance reform. It has never neglected those aspects of the temperance question which constitute the common ground of all temperance reformers, and would gladly extend its activities in these directions, were it adequately supported.

May we respectfully and earnestly beg you to ask yourselves what you are personally doing for this cause, and whether there is any valid reason why you should not at least show your sympathy with us and our work by enrolling yourselves as ordinary or honorary members of our society. The minimum subscription is 1s. or 2s. 6d. respectively for the two classes of membership. Only 45 of our ministers have joined us, and we believe that if there were anything like a generous response to this appeal, the fact alone would be a powerful means of bringing the whole question with renewed force before our people, and would be a source of great, indeed hardly calculable, encouragement to all our workers.—Yours very sincerely,

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, President.

H. G. CHANCELLOR, Ex-President.
September, 1912.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE INQUIRER FUND.

MISS DENDY, the Hon. Secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the permanent care of the Feeble-Minded has received the following donations in reply to her recent appeal in our columns:—

S. C.	£100	0	0
Miss Eiloart	5	5	0
Mrs. Batty..	3	3	0
Miss Evans..	0	5	0
Miss S. J. Gregg	0	10	0
Miss F. A. Short	10	0	0
Mrs. Schunck	30	0	0

£149 3 0

A parcel of books and two of magazines.

Further donations, both great and small, are needed very urgently, and may be sent to Miss Dendy at 13, Clarence-road, Withington, Manchester.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR LABOUR LEGISLATION.

If there still existed any doubt as to the need and usefulness of an international association for labour legislation, it must surely have been dispelled by the reports of the seventh biennial meeting, which has just been held at Zurich. Over two hundred delegates representing the United States, our own overseas Empire, the British Islands, Mexico and every European State except Serbia and Bulgaria (which, however, apologised for not sending delegates), took part in the animated discussions of the Congress. What, perhaps, more than anything, has lent extraordinary interest to the proceedings has been the variety of the sources from which opinion has been drawn. Men and women of every social and political creed and class and religion, it might almost be said, found it possible to sit side by side in amicable discussion. Employers of labour and Trade Union leaders, university professors and working miners, distinguished Government officials like M. Fontaine, and hardly less distinguished voluntary social workers, all contributed to the common stock of experience and information.

CONTINUOUS INDUSTRIES.

In a brief notice it would be impossible to refer to all the subjects dealt with in an over-crowded agenda, but, from the British point of view, possibly the most interesting result of the Conference was the decision arrived at with regard to continuous industries. A special commission of the Association which met in London last June to consider the three-shift system decided to recommend to the Governments of the respective countries the adoption of an eight hours day for iron and steel workers. The presence of Mr. A. H. Crossfield, of Warrington, who, with Mr. Thomas Schlytter, of Christiania, has devoted a great deal of disinterested effort to this question; of Mr. Hodge, M.P., of the British steel smelters; and Mr. Cox, of the manufacturing iron and steel smelters, brought such a mass of expert evidence into play that the full Conference at Zurich decided to endorse the recommendation of the Special Commission to request the Swiss Federal Council to invite the Governments of the interested States to a conference, having for its object an international agreement to establish an eight hours day for the iron and steel trades. Investigations into the need of other continuous industries for similar regulations will be continued and reports presented.

OTHER DECISIONS OF THE CONGRESS.

The British section presented a full report of the working of the Trade Boards Act, with the result that the Association decided to recommend for international adoption a scheme which closely follows the lines of this measure. The Continental delegates were also extremely anxious that their respective Governments should accept what they call "the English week," in other words, a Saturday half-holiday. Steps are being taken to bring about an International Convention to restrict the use of lead in pottery-making, to secure a ten-hour day for women, and to abolish altogether night work by boys.

As one argument which is frequently used against the amelioration of labour conditions is that improvement will render employees unable to meet foreign competition, the activity of the Association in bringing about international agreements is of the highest importance.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Horsham.—The annual meeting of the Free Christian Church was held on Thursday, September 12, when the reports of the various institutions connected with the church were presented. The chair was occupied by Mr. David Price. The Rev. J. J. Marten, in acknowledging a vote of thanks to the officers, and the cordial appreciation of his services, which had been expressed by several speakers, intimated to the regret of all present that his pastorate, extending over almost twenty-one years, must shortly terminate.

London: Blackfriars.—On the occasion of a visit of about twenty members of the Northampton Unitarian Athletic League to London, on Saturday, September 14, a team from the Stamford-street Chapel Men's Club played a team from Kettering-road Church (Northampton) at cricket on Clapham Common, the Londoners winning the match. A pleasant gathering was afterwards held at the chapel at Blackfriars, when a hearty welcome was extended to the visitors by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, chairman of the Stamford-street Men's Club; and by Mr. W. Grigg, captain of the cricket team. Messrs. Nelson and Bent responded, and cordially invited the London team to visit Northampton at some future date.

London: Lewisham.—The programme of the Union Literary and Scientific Society, in connection with the Unitarian Church, for the first part of the coming season includes lectures on "Labour Unrest," by Mr. G. H. Roberts, M.P.; "Science and Race Prejudice," by Mr. Gustav Spiller; "The Montessori Method of Education," by Miss Julian (principal of the Avery-hill Training College); "Daylight Saving," by Mr. William Willett; and "The Transformation of Capital," by Mr. Aneurin Williams, M.A. (hon. secretary, Labour Co-partnership Association).

London Sunday School Society.—A course of four lectures on "Life in Palestine at the Time of Jesus" will be given by Dr. Estlin Carpenter, in connection with the London Sunday School Society, on Thursdays October 3, 10, 17, 24, at 8 p.m., at Essex Hall. The subjects will be as follows:—October 3, "The Land and the People" (lantern lecture); October 10, "Religion"; October 17, "The Scribes and Pharisees"; October 24, "The 'Age to Come.'" Tickets for the course of four lectures, price 1s., can be obtained at Essex Hall, or of the hon. secretary, Mr. R. Asquith Wooding, 25, Engayne-gardens, Upminster, Essex.

Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Association.—A public meeting in connection with the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Association will be held in the Domestic Mission, Mill-street, Liverpool, on Wednesday, September 25, at 8 p.m. The chair will be taken by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, and the speakers will include the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., and Miss Harriet Johnson.

Mexborough.—A correspondent writes as follows:—"It is just over six months since the Free Christians worshipping at the Mexborough Congregational Church were compelled to seek another and more hospitable roof under which to worship God, and took up their abode in what is known as the Central Hall. . . . After nearly fourteen years' ministry at the Congregational Church, Mr. Anderson and the Free Christians joined hands. Since that day, we are glad to report, we have made rapid progress, in spite of the many difficulties and setbacks. We started our Free Church with a membership of 60; to-day we number 140. We forthwith started a Sunday school, numbering 80; that number has increased to 250. An adult class was also commenced, and has been well attended. We are glad to acknowledge that the Sheffield Unitarians helped us most heartily. Our inaugural tea, at which over 400 sat down, and which was entirely given by friends and sympathisers, and managed by the ladies of our church, was followed by a crowded and enthusiastic meeting, presided over by the Lord Mayor of Sheffield (Mr. A. J. Hobson), and very stirring addresses were given by the Revs. C. J. Street, M.A., and A. H. Dolphin. The Free Christians of Mexborough, Bolton-on-Dearne, and Barnsley are now linked up under the pastorate of the Rev. T. Anderson. . . . We ask no questions about a man's creed or his theology; all we demand is liberty to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. Our numbers are rapidly increasing, and we are, to our dismay, finding the hall inadequate both for worship and the social activities we desire to initiate; and, what is more serious, when our twelve months' tenancy is ended the hall is likely to be sold, and then we shall be forced to seek other premises. We have therefore decided to buy land and build a place of our own. We shall do our best, and hope and trust that all who love the cause of religious freedom will not forget the little band of Free Christian worshippers at Mexborough. The three churches above mentioned are associated with the recently formed Sheffield District Association of Unitarian, Free Christian, and Free Congregational Churches."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

REBECCA OF SUNNYBROOK FARM.

Rebecca Rowena Randall (she is so particular about giving you her name in full!) has already endeared herself to all readers of Kate Douglas Wiggin's charming books, and now that she has crossed the Atlantic in the person of Miss Edith Taliaferro, and is flaunting the famous pink parasol on the boards of a London theatre, we love her more than ever. We are not quite sure that this managing little person, with her big candid eyes and her pretty curls, is not slyly laughing in her sleeve at us half the time, especially when she appears in the last act as a young lady of seventeen in her "graduation" gown of cheesecloth, and pretends to be grown up. But we could forgive her even that, and the curious American drawl which becomes a little monotonous, at times, in sheer gratitude for the atmosphere of springtime and youth which she creates wherever she goes. Rebecca is the embodiment of life and mirth. She is bubbling over with joy and originality, and the desire not only to have a good time herself, but to make everybody else deliciously happy as well. She has her troubles. For instance, there is always present with her the thought of the big family at home, and the mortgage on the farm, not to speak of Aunt Miranda. But winning smiles, an ingenuous nature, and a knack of verse-writing and "bossing" other people in the prettiest manner possible drive dull care away, and we leave her at the end of the play with as good a prospect as ever a fairy princess had of being "happy ever after."

* * *

THERE are other interesting people in the play, although they never permit you to think that they come up to Rebecca; Jeremiah Cobb ("Uncle Jerry"), for instance, the only individual who is capable of dealing diplomatically with the whimsical young person from the Brick House. Uncle Jerry drives the village stage coach, an antiquated vehicle which one would naturally associate with an earlier period than 1880, the year in which the events are supposed to have taken place. He has the hoar locks of age with the sunny heart of a child, and is a pleasant foil to the uncompromising maiden aunt who never stands any nonsense, and thinks herself capable of managing anything and anybody on the "straight and narrer" principle. Then there is Mrs. Perkins, the village gossip and mother of an extraordinary child called Emma Jane, who wears stiffly starched print frocks and executes a dance in the Sawyers' barn which is an amusing thing to remember. Altogether, "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," in spite of the unfamiliar dialect peculiar to country-folk from the State of Maine, and a streak of sentimentality which at times almost spoils the fun, provides a refreshing entertainment, and it has this advantage in a stressful age like our own that it suggests no problems, and leaves everybody contented.

THE FOUNDER OF THE SUNDAY LEAGUE.

The death of Mr. R. M. Morrell, the founder of the National Sunday League, has occurred at a time when the whole question of Sunday entertainments has again been raised in an acute form. He had reached the age of 89, and for many years had ceased to take an active part in the movement which he inaugurated, and which is likely to have far-reaching results. As far back as 1855 Mr. Morrell became imbued with a strong desire to make the people's Sunday a day of brightness and wholesome recreation as well as rest, and in that year a motion was put forth in the House of Commons affirming that it was "desirable that the national museums and art galleries should be opened on Sundays." It was rejected by a large majority, but Mr. Morrell and the friends who were associated with him in the movement continued to agitate in spite of persistent opposition, and after a few small successes final victory was obtained in 1896—forty-one years after the formation of the League. Many notable men, including Huxley and John Stuart Mill, lent him their support. Charles Dickens was among the earliest to render practical assistance by appearing at the first series of Sunday evenings for the people in the old St. Martin's Hall to read "The Christmas Carol." In early days Mr. Morrell was considerably persecuted for his opinions, and suffered actual physical violence for advocating principles which are still unpopular in certain quarters; but his enthusiasm suffered no defeat, and he had the satisfaction accorded to few pioneers of seeing his work crowned with complete success.

THE WORK OF THE LABOUR EXCHANGES.

The Board of Trade Labour Gazette gives some useful statistics relating to the work of the Labour Exchanges, from which it appears that the number of Exchanges has been increased by 164 during the past year. The number of applications received during August was 183,892 (men 118,323, women 37,923, boys 15,619, and girls 12,027), a daily average of 7,995, compared with 8,049 in July. The number of vacancies filled during the period was 67,529 (men 44,461, women 11,804, boys 6,903, and girls 4,361), a daily average of 2,936, compared with 2,573 in July and 1,901 in August, 1911. Of the vacancies filled during August 16,925 (men 13,985, women 2,359, boys 374, and girls 207) were temporary, in the sense of being known to be for less than a week's employment.

LONGSIGHT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

Appeal and Bazaar Fund, 1912. Special Effort to Raise £1,250.

A Bazaar and Chrysanthemum Fair to be held November 6, 7, 8 and 9, in the Chorlton Town Hall, Manchester.

In submitting our appeal we have the following objects in view:—

(1) LIQUIDATION OF DEBT.—On certain property belonging to the Church there is a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850. The reduction of £300 has been achieved by the Congregation's own efforts from time to time.

(2) A NEW ORGAN.—We have hitherto struggled to maintain a good musical standard in our services. To this end we have been generously and effectively helped by an unpaid choir and organist. For the continuance of a reasonable efficiency we now require a new organ. The old organ has done splendid service; but it was not new when bought by us, and it has served us 28 years.

(3) RENOVATION AND REPAIRS.—The Church and Schools stand in real need of renovation. They are a splendid and substantial block of buildings, and attention paid to them now will be a genuine economy, likely to be felt for many years to come. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay.

FOR THESE PURPOSES WE DESIRE TO RAISE £1,250.

The Congregation and Elder Scholars of the Sunday School have already raised or promised donations amounting to the sum of £300. This is the first public appeal made for over 20 years, the congregation being entirely self-supporting. There are no endowments.

We are, yours faithfully,

B. C. CONSTABLE, Minister, 16, Langdale Road, Victoria Park, Manchester.

JOHN HEYS, President.

DAN BAXTER, Vice-President.

HARRY ANGUS, Chairman of Bazaar Committee.

JOHN CHORLTON, Treasurer, 2, Beresford-road, Longsight, Manchester.

OLIVER H. HEYS, 8, Sunny Bank-road, Longsight, Manchester, Secretary.

CHAS. H. CHORLTON, 38, Ashfield-road, Rusholme, Manchester, Secretary.

Contributions in money or goods will be gratefully acknowledged, and may be sent to Mrs. CONSTABLE, the Treasurer, or to the Secretaries.

The following donations from friends have already been received:—

Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart. ...	£10 10 0
Charles Hawksley, Esq. ...	10 10 0
The Misses Riddell ...	10 0 0
"Anonymous" ...	10 0 0
Rev. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S. ...	5 5 0
Mrs. Ashton ...	5 0 0
J. R. Beard, Esq., J.P. ...	5 0 0
Miss Gaskell ...	5 0 0
Mrs. S. Holland ...	5 0 0
George H. Leigh, Esq., J.P. ...	5 0 0
Miss S. Scholes Wrigley ...	5 0 0
Mrs. Hans Renold ...	3 0 0
The Misses Brooks ...	2 2 0
J. F. L. Brunner, Esq., M.P. ...	2 2 0
Mrs. Cobb ...	2 2 0
Miss Lydia A. Leigh (deceased) ...	2 2 0
J. S. Lister, Esq. ...	2 2 0
F. W. Monks, Esq., J.P. ...	2 2 0
A. and W. P. ...	2 2 0
T. Fletcher Robinson, Esq. ...	2 2 0
Mrs. E. Walker ...	2 2 0
G. S. Woolley, Esq. ...	2 2 0
Miss A. M. Phillips ...	2 0 0
W. B. Worthington, Esq. ...	2 0 0
Mr. and Mrs. John Dendy ...	1 1 0
Miss S. S. Dowson ...	1 1 0
E. Foulkes, Esq. ...	1 1 0
H. P. Greg, Esq. ...	1 1 0
D. A. Little, Esq. ...	1 1 0
George Thomas, Esq. ...	1 1 0
Lieut.-Col. W. R. Trevelyan ...	1 1 0
Mrs. Alice W. Turner ...	1 1 0
Miss M. B. Watson ...	1 1 0
"E. D. C." ...	1 1 0
"Hadj" ...	1 1 0
Rev. C. A. Greaves ...	1 0 0
David Healey, Esq. ...	1 0 0
Mrs. Kate N. Hollins ...	1 0 0
Mrs. E. S. Paget ...	1 0 0
Sums under £1 ...	5 0 0

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION,

22, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE Society offers to send an efficient Lecturer free of charge to League Meetings, Debating Societies, &c. Autumn and winter engagements should be booked at once.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 139, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Special terms for week-ends. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LADY wishes to meet another to share country cottage for few weeks. Expenses from 15s. inclusive.—INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

APPLES.—Delicious Dessert Apples, 40 lbs. 7s. 6d., 20 lbs. 4s. Excellent cooking, 40 lbs. 6s., 20 lbs. 3s. 6d. 20 lbs. each 6s. 9d., 10 lbs. 3s. 9d. Carriage paid in England and Wales.—FRANK ROSCOE, Steeple Morden, Royston.

ABSOLUTELY FREE!—200 novel Patterns of charming Autumn Blouse material; guaranteed unshrinkable wool, warm, light, colours fast; fascinating designs, looks smart for years.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'Oyleys. Bundle of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, September 21, 1912.

•• Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

LIBRARY OF THE
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3666.
NEW SERIES, No. 770.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations
of Lancashire and Cheshire.

COMMEMORATION
OF THE
250th ANNIVERSARY
OF THE

Ejection of the Two Thousand
TO BE HELD IN MANCHESTER,
ON
SATURDAY, OCT. 5, 1912.

- 3.30 p.m. United Service of the Congregations of the Province, in Cross Street Chapel.
Preacher, the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.,
of London.
- 4.45 p.m. Procession from Cross Street Chapel
to the Memorial Hall, Albert Square.
- 5.0 p.m. Tea at the Memorial Hall, 6d. each.
- 6.0 p.m. Meeting at the Memorial Hall, the
President of the Assembly, J. WIGLEY,
Esq., in the Chair. Addresses by the
Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A., "Our Heritage"; JOHN DENDY, Esq. (representing the Memorial Hall Trustees, the
Rev. S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc., "Dissenting Academies"; and the Rev. H.
D. ROBERTS, "The Future of Nonconformity."

J. WIGLEY, President.
H. E. DOWSON, B.A. } Hon.
N. ANDERTON, B.A. } Secs.

ESSEX CHURCH, KENSINGTON.

Induction Service.

A Service of Induction, followed by a Meeting of Welcome, in connection with the appointment of the Rev. H. B. Speight, will take place on FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4th.

Service in the Church at 8.0 p.m. Conducted by the Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.

The Charge to the Minister will be given by the Rev. Dr. Carpenter.

The Charge to the Congregation will be given by the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams.

MEETING IN LINDSEY HALL at 9 p.m.
Members of other Churches are cordially invited to be present.

RONALD P. JONES, Sec.

TWO LADY ARTISTS (painters of Parisian School) would receive in their comfortable refined country home near Baden-Baden (Black Forest) one or two ladies, desirous to spend the winter in mild climate, to practise German or to study Art (private lessons in Painting, Drawing, Water Colours, Etching). Beautiful old garden, fancy farm, delightful scenery.—Terms and photo. of place from Miss SCHULTZEN-ASTEN, Obersasbach-in-Baden. References given and taken.

Provincial Assembly of London AND The South-Eastern Counties.

The 24th Annual Meeting of the
Assembly will be held at Manchester
College, Oxford, on Tuesday,
8th October, 1912.

The proceedings will be as follows:—

11.45 a.m. Service in the Chapel.
Preacher, the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES,
Ph.D., of Islington. Supported by
Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A., of
London.

1.15 p.m. Luncheon.

4.30 p.m. Annual Business Meeting.
The Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A., President of the Assembly, in the Chair.

6.0 p.m. Tea.

7.0 p.m. Conference.
The Rev. L. P. JACKS, D.D., will read a paper on "Citizenship and the Churches."

All the meetings will be held at the College.
No cheap railway tickets are available.
Accommodation will be reserved on the 9.50 a.m. train from Paddington. Return from Oxford, 9.25 p.m.

GORDON COOPER,
Hon. Sec.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY

A COURSE OF FOUR LECTURES on "Life in Palestine at the time of Jesus" will be given by Dr. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford) at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Thursdays, October 3, 10, 17, and 24, at 8 p.m.

Tickets for the course, price 1s., can be obtained at Essex Hall.

R. ASQUITH WOODING, Hon. Sec.

Elocutionary Entertainments

MR. ALFRED PERRIS is prepared to book engagements for a two hours'
Entertainment, consisting of Dramatic and Poetic Recitals, grave and gay, interspersed with Musical items, vocal and instrumental, by
Miss MAY PERRIS.—For particulars, terms,
&c., address, 135, Padgate-lane, Warrington.

MISS DREWRY hopes to resume her Courses of Lectures, Readings, and Lessons on English Language and Literature early in October. For particulars apply by letter.—143, King Henry's-road, London, N.W.

BROOKFIELD CHURCH, GORTON.
—The Bazaar postponed on account of the coal strike will be opened October 16 to 19, inclusive. £600 urgently needed for Church and School objects. Donations thankfully acknowledged by the Minister.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEAD-
MASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors,
Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade,
Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.
HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR
BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for
the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing
situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT,
M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss
LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated
Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey,
Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to
the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—
PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions,
&c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected.
Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff.
Entire charge of pupils from abroad.
Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H.
WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL
WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken
a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate with their own, ages 3 to 13.
The house stands on the edge of the Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.
They will be assisted by Miss Enid Branson (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.
For illustrated prospectus apply Wester-
main, Chilworth, Surrey.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, September 29.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.; 7, Mr. R. W. PETTINGER.
 Brompton, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. H. KING.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON; 3.15, Rev. H. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. J. KINSMAN; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, B.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ARTHUR HURN.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. Wm. L. TUCKER, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 only, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C. Morning service only. 11.15, Rev. F. H. JONES. No evening service.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. Wm. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. J. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROOKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Churchgate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN Row, 10.45, and (STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON and Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. L. P. JACKS, D.D.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAS, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D. Oct. 6 and after, at Schoolroom adjoining Unity Church, Higher-terrace.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTH.

GRUNDY.—On September 23, at Radlett, to Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Grundy, a son.

MARRIAGE.

HARWOOD—WARNOCK.—On September 25, at the First Presbyterian Church, Bangor, Co. Down, by the Rev. Dr. Irwin, D.D., James Leslie Harwood, son of the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of London, to Mary Gwendoline, youngest daughter of the late John Warnock, Belfast.

DEATH.

MONKS.—On September 24, at his residence, Birkdale, Frederick Monks, in his 78th year. Interred at Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

CHAPERONE wanted to go out on Saturdays, and maybe some other times in the week, with two girls attending a College in West Hampstead.—Apply, stating particulars and references, to B. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MINISTER'S DAUGHTER (22) seeks post as Companion to elderly lady or as Nursery Governess. French conversation, lessons to beginners in drawing, painting and music.—M. L., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LADY with dancing classes in London requires a girl (refined) with some aptitude for dancing, age 14 to 18. Tuition free in return for slight help in classes.—D. A., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

FRENCH YOUNG LADY wishes for situation au pair for two months from October in respectable family, in or near London.—Apply, Mdlle. GAYTE, Fairville, Oxtou, Birkenhead.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken. Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.—Summer Holidays.

The Publisher will be pleased to send copies of THE INQUIRER weekly to readers while away from home. Post free, 1½d. per copy.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 643
A FREE CHURCH FOR FREE MEN . . . 644
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—
Hymns and their Writers.—III. . . 645
LITERARY STUDIES :—
Acontius: An Elizabethan Protester
against the Narrowness of Creeds. . 646
CORRESPONDENCE :—
Death and Survival 647

The Wonder of Life 649
The Abuse of Language 650
The Hymns of George Matheson . . . 650
BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—
Everyman's Library 650
Home University Library 650
Literary Notes 651
Publications Received 651

FOR THE CHILDREN :—
Sheep Dog Trials in Scotland . . . 651
MEMORIAL NOTICE :—
Mr. Frederick Monks, J.P. 652
MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
Farewell to Dr. Crothers 652
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES 653
NOTES AND JOTTINGS 655

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE death of the German Ambassador was entirely unexpected, and has aroused the liveliest feelings of sympathy and regret. When he was appointed to the Embassy in London a few months ago, his high reputation for political sagacity raised strong hopes that he would do a great deal to improve the international situation. That these hopes were entertained is in itself a revelation of the flimsiness of the misunderstandings which have been allowed more than once to become a source of acute tension and danger. If personal charm and a considerate diplomacy are the chief requisites, it shows very clearly that any tendency to quarrel has existed chiefly among small groups of politicians. It is true that inflammatory articles in the newspapers have created short gusts of popular passion, but at heart the mass of the people in England and Germany desire cordial and lasting friendship, and know that all their interests, financial, social, and religious, are bound up with the cause of peace.

THIS conviction has been confirmed by the cordial reception given to the party of Labour Members of Parliament which visited South Germany last week. At Munich a banquet was held in their honour, and the Bürgermeister spoke in the highest terms of the debt which the people of Bavaria owed to Great Britain, especially in the sphere of self-government. Since the beginning of the nineteenth century, he said, Bavaria had made Great Britain her model in political and constitutional progress. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, in the course of his reply, said that he and his colleagues had come on a pilgrimage after knowledge, and on a crusade of peace. The quest after the material products of a nation, he added, might conceivably lead to quarrels, the quest after its intellectual products led only to peace. Germany had annexed Shakespeare, but that annexation had caused no war. Similarly, thanks largely to Carlyle, Great Britain was annexing Goethe, but Germany sent no Dreadnought up the Thames to protest against that appropriation.

The sentence of deprivation passed upon Pastor Traub, to which we referred last week, has aroused strong feeling in Dortmund, where he is so well known and so highly honoured. Three great meetings of protest have been held, in which the charges made against his character have been repudiated with indignation, and resolutions were passed pledging those present to stand by him and help him. There is a widespread feeling that legal methods have been prostituted in order to crush Traub because he is a Liberal. It is his unorthodoxy far more than his attitude towards his superiors which is at fault. This attempt to crush the liberal clergy by indirect means has aroused keen opposition in Berlin and elsewhere. Meanwhile Traub's numerous friends are taking the necessary practical steps to enable him to continue his work as preacher and reformer in a position of independence.

THE last report of the Commissioners of Prisons is in some aspects a document of a highly satisfactory character. During the period which it covers, April 1, 1911, to March 31, 1912, there was a marked decline in the number of prisoners. In 1904-5 the proportion per 100,000 of the population was 586.2; last year it was 439.2 a decrease of 147. This is the lowest return on record, and the Commissioners report that this decline in prison population was maintained throughout the year, the daily average in local prisons being over 1,000 less than for the preceding year. We are glad to see that special attention is called to the large number of commitments to prison for a short period, often in default of payment of a fine. The fact not generally known, that more than 50 per cent. of the people who go to prison do so for offences which they could purge with a fine if the money were available, gives force to the plea of the Commissioners that the question is one which calls for immediate legislation.

A GOOD deal of comment has been aroused by the publication of a return of the profits realised by the Sunday Cinema shows in London for the nine months ended March 31, 1912. The licence for exhibitions on Sunday was granted by the County Council on condition that they should not be conducted for private gain or by way of trade. It appears that the total receipts for the nine months were £92,177, while the profits distributed in charity were £15,247. We confess that we are not surprised at the result. There was an element of bogus philanthropy in the enterprise from the beginning, and the charities which refused to have anything to do with it were only showing a proper self-respect. If it is desirable that these places of public entertainment should be open on Sunday, let them conduct their business on the ordinary lines, without any elaborate pretence. Anything else has the appearance of a weak concession to Sabbatarian feeling, without any real honesty of purpose; and insincerity of this kind is the worst foe of religion.

LAST Sunday the Bishop of Salford preached a sermon in praise of the virtues of poverty in connection with a meeting of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. If they were to judge from the world around them, he said, they would almost be led to believe that poverty was a very great, if not the greatest of all misfortunes—a thing to be shunned almost like the pestilence. All the ends and aims of modern philanthropy and of all Socialistic schemes for the so-called betterment of mankind seemed to be directed at the destruction of poverty altogether, as though it was the one great evil of the world. But Christ beatified and blessed poverty. He sanctified it not merely by words, but by his life, and made it a holy thing. Poverty, so far from being an evil, was to a large extent a blessing. It was a blessing because it brought many great graces which were refused to the rich, about whom Christ said some terrible things.

* * *

WHEN a man speaks in this way in the midst of the sharp and bitter contrasts of our commercial civilisation, we have no right to call his sincerity in question. He may have undergone a severe examination of conscience and convinced himself that he is not merely repeating conventional phrases. He may also have the interior grace of poverty of spirit, and be one of the few men who can say these things quite simply and with full conviction. We must also acknowledge that a Catholic priest has more right to say them than the average Protestant, for the Catholic Church has always upheld voluntary poverty as one of the highest forms of human excellence, and has never lacked thousands of happy and devoted servants who have practised it in their lives. But, none the less, it is a message which does not ring true for modern ears, not because we are more unspiritual in temper or more material in aim than our forefathers, but for quite another reason.

* * *

THE truth is that when we repeat the traditional Christian praise of the virtues of poverty we are often guilty of a fatal confusion of thought. It is one thing to renounce the riches which we might possess, and, with St. Francis, in a mood of exultation, to choose the Lady Poverty for our bride. It is quite another thing to be born the victims of poverty, and to spend all our days in darkness or anxious fear, because there is never food enough either for the body or the soul. The article which we publish to-day on "A Free Church for Free Men" brings out this distinction very clearly, and we hope it will receive the earnest consideration which it deserves. The Bishop of Salford does well to warn us of the religious dangers of wealth; but the favourite of fortune has at least the opportunity of choosing to be poor for Christ's sake, while the victim of poverty has never had enough personal freedom or sense of possession to renounce anything. That is the spiritual tragedy of his life, and a Christianity which can only speak to him about the blessedness of being poor, possesses, we venture to think, very little of the Saviour's spirit.

A FREE CHURCH FOR FREE MEN.

RELIGION cannot and will not make progress in the world until at least two essential conditions are fulfilled: on the one hand, the community in which Religion finds corporate and social expression, the Church, must be wholly untrammelled by dogma, completely free from the credal atmosphere; and, on the other hand, the individuals who, at any one moment, together form the Church, by assembling for worship and joining with each other in the office of praise and prayer, must be free individuals. The true Church can neither make men slaves, nor be composed herself of men who are slaves. Liberty is the first essential of life in every aspect, social, economic, artistic, religious, and the finest life cannot anywhere be realised except in liberty. It is more than likely that those who chance to read these words will be familiar enough with the notion that Religion needs, as one essential condition of continued life, a "free church"; the ideal has been pictured and presented so many times that it might seem a supererogatory labour to present it again. True it is that the ideal is still a vast distance from realisation, and even from general acceptance, and needs, therefore, from one point of view, continued repetition, constant preaching. But, for the moment, let it be assumed that the notion of a "free church" as necessary for Religion is not only familiar but generally accepted, and, at once, there arises a question. Supposing Religion realised the "free church," became truly established as of the spirit alone, and faced the world with an invitation to all alike to enter, without regard to opinion, dogma, or article of belief: would that be enough for Religion? Could she, then, safely anticipate a continued life of power and usefulness? The answer to that question is in the negative; the "free church," in and by itself, would not be enough to secure the existence of a true and genuine Religion. The "free church" of Religion must be composed of "free individuals": its worship can flow only from free souls. This other necessary condition for the life of Religion is one to which those who believe in Religion at all have not given the attention it deserves. Fully to grasp the meaning of it is to throw a quite new light upon the sphere and work of Religion at the moment. We wish, here, at least, to suggest what this condition implies.

Religion needs "free individuals." It is true, no doubt, that many men and women, whose condition is that of economic and social servitude, manage to lead good lives, and even to taste the noblest joys and privileges of Religion; before to-day slaves have been great philosophers and great saints. But it would be both foolish and untrue to maintain that a condition of slavery, or of lack of liberty of any sort, is itself desirable or makes for the best life. We ought to have passed by now beyond the stage of supposing, for example, that the condition of poverty, which is a polite name for a kind of slavery, is in any way to be praised and loved for its own sake. Poverty may be deliberately chosen as the outward setting of life, and then the case is totally altered. The poverty of which we speak, which, as all know, disgraces civilisation throughout, is never deliberately chosen, and it is, therefore, little short of sinful hypocrisy to sing its praises or present it as in itself a blessing. We ought by now to have sufficient imagination to know that at least it is never easy, and that sometimes it is quite impossible, for the creature born to the slavery of poverty even to appreciate the best things of life. It is only a mistaken view of Religion and of life that would deny the truth of Aristotle's observation that, for the best life, at least a sufficiency of the material blessings of existence is necessary. Not only so: the worship of God requires some leisure. It is undignified and discreditable to have to crowd one's religion into a few odd moments grudgingly granted by an evil social state and evil economic conditions. To be deprived of necessary leisure is to be, so far forth, in a state of slavery. The service of the Almighty can come but ill from creatures who, in addition to the ordinary temptations and weaknesses of finite life, are perpetually harassed by unjustifiable and unnecessary anxieties: and many a devoted servant of Religion must, in these days, feel it often a startling proposition to expect men and women to think of heaven when, to-morrow or next week, they may be lacking the barest necessities of earth. Why should we be blind to facts, or mince words? Religion demands free individuals: she cannot flourish in the midst of a social organisation which tolerates slavery. And who will deny that the social organisation of the moment does not only tolerate, but actually necessitate, slavery? With us, the freedom of the individual is still only the shadow of a name. The present social order condemns the vast majority of mankind to the state of economic want and economic anxiety, and to an almost total loss of the means and the leisure necessary to free self-culture and self-development.

People complain at times that churches are empty and religion neglected; but what else is to be expected in a society which, at one end, is wholly absorbed in the pursuit of gain, whose only recognisable deity is Hard Cash, and, at the other end, keeps a vast number, the great majority, of its members in a condition of want, pressure, and anxiety, which can only fitly be described as slavery? It is true enough, no doubt, that the very finest treasures of Religion are independent of external conditions; but the genuine realisation of that fact demands a type of consciousness and of individuality which the present ordering of society rarely, if ever, produces. There is, in the social life of to-day, practically nothing to help Religion, and everything to hinder it. Men and women are not irreligious by nature; they appear to be irreligious because the seed of Religion in them has never an opportunity to bud and blossom. We live in an age—it is undeniable—in which the finer feelings and emotional qualities of life are inevitably thrust into the lowest place, buried under the rank growths of greed and selfishness on the one hand, and of poverty, misery, and consequent vice on the other. And this is no fit soil for the growth of Religion. How can one preach the Divine Sonship of Humanity in a society the very basis of whose organisation would appear to be the notion that men are nothing but machines, less even than brutes, to be used for the making of money? How can one talk of the love of God in a society which encourages every conceivable form of hate, and builds the comfort and luxury of the few upon the degradation and hopeless suffering of the many?

Religion demands "free individuals." How much is contained and involved in that! Nothing less, in the end, than a complete social revolution: nothing less than the establishing of an order of social life which shall secure to all who labour honestly at some useful task an equitable share in the products of their toil, and a leisure sufficient to permit of at least a reasonable degree of self-culture and individual development. Freedom, and the free individuals needed by Religion, we have not, nor shall have until we are moved to have done for ever with the view that Labour exists for Profit and that the sole end of earthly existence is the pursuit of gain. Religion will not rightly flourish in the world till the social revolution is accomplished. At the moment, she maintains, indeed hardly maintains, her existence only against "fearful odds."

Rightly to grasp this ideal of "the Free Church of Free Men" is, as we have said, to give the worker for Religion a new incentive and a new hope. To labour for the complete Ideal gives sufficient employment to every energy and capacity a man possesses, and needs, moreover, the consecration of the finest gifts and attainments. It involves, on the one hand, the ceaseless attempt to restore true unity of the spirit to a divided Church, to repair the torn folds of the robe that should cover all alike. And, on the other hand, it involves an endeavour, without pause, to arouse men and women to a burning sense of the evils of their social state, the preaching, in season and out of season, of the gospel of social discontent, the creation of those who shall themselves in turn create new values, the quickening of shame and remorse for things as they are till it is no longer possible for any man or woman to sit still and accept the present order. Above all, the demand which Religion makes for the "free individual" implies the gospel of discontent: this is the hardest thing for those interested in Religion at the moment to grasp. Yet it must be grasped; no man professing Religion at all can escape, or dare avoid, the preaching of discontent. Genuine Religion is essentially revolutionary: Christ came not to bring peace but a sword. And though it be true that Religion brings a great contentment to the inward, personal life, yet it is a contentment which cannot rest in itself, but turns into its opposite whenever it beholds, as to-day it does continually, social wrong, social injustice, social misery, or looks upon another soul which is robbed of contentment by the circumstances of its life. The more settled and assured the inward peace of life becomes, the more passionate grows the fervour of discontent against all cramping, hampering circumstances; it is only the soul that, in some way, truly rests on God, that can, with utter sincerity, repeat the genuine battle cry of Religion:—

Bring me my bow of burning gold!
Bring me my arrows of desire!
Bring me my spear! O, clouds, unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire!

I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

"The Free Church of Free Men": here is a gospel and an ideal noble enough to awaken the fire in any man, and the world needs men who will preach it without fear and without rest.

STANLEY A. MELLOR.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

III.

"Father, I know that all my life."—
A. L. Waring.

ANNA LETITIA WARING passed away on May 10, 1910, at the age of eighty-seven. Her long life was absolutely without event of public interest, except that in 1850 she published a little volume of hymns, and from time to time in later editions added to their number. It is the inward and spiritual quality of her life, to which the hymns gave such beautiful expression, that is of interest and worth to us.

The Warings were a Quaker family, and had been so for several generations. Thus Anna Letitia was brought up in the Society of Friends, but she early felt the influence of a different type of religious experience, and at nineteen was baptized into the Church of England. Her home was at Neath in Glamorganshire, where she was born, April 19, 1823, the second daughter of a family of seven brothers and sisters. There, at Plas-y-velin, the children had a very happy childhood, into which came the delight of visits to the grandfather's house at Alton in Hampshire. Their father was a man of refined literary tastes and generous sympathetic nature, the mother, "wise and firm, whose very look of displeasure was ample punishment for any childish transgression." It was a cheerful household and a most hospitable home. Then at Alton, at the grandfather's, there were two dear and clever aunts, who knew all about birds and flowers, to whom Anna Letitia, with the other children, owed much in the guidance of her growing love of Nature and sympathy with all dumb creatures, and in the moulding of her religious disposition.

Her early years were not without sorrow, for when she was eighteen the youngest sister died, a dear child of twelve. Their mother, in a letter at that time, speaking of Anna's grief, used an expression which gives us a glimpse of her character: "She is a sturdy little oak; she is not easily moved out of the track which she herself chalks out." This she proved decisively in the following year, when she declared her intention to join the Church of England. There was in her an inward need, which the prevailingly silent worship of Friends did not satisfy. She recalled afterwards how as a child, when she sat in the quiet meeting-house, the church bells of Neath seemed to be calling her. She longed for some more expressive form of worship, and she felt the powerful appeal of the sacraments of the Church, so eloquent without words, to the believing heart, of deep spiritual truth. An uncle of hers, Samuel Waring, who also wrote some hymns, but died when she was only four, had taken this step of secession to the Church before her, and a paper of his, giving reasons for the change, strongly confirmed her resolution. It was naturally a trouble to her home circle and friends, but it involved no painful breach, for they entered with true sympathy into the earnestness of her conviction, and she on her side always realised the deeper spiritual unity, which remained beneath the different forms of practice and belief. To the end of her life members of the Society were among her most intimate friends. She was baptized at Winchester, in St. Martin's parish church, Winnall, on May 15, 1842, so that probably she had been staying at the time with her aunts in the old house at Alton.

Four years later, while on a visit to Clifton, she wrote the hymn,

Father, I know that all my life
Is portioned out for me.

How soon after she made her home there, with her sisters, I do not know; but they had relatives in Bristol, and it was, I believe, quite early in the fifties that the father died, and the home in Wales was presumably broken up. Certain it is that for the greater part of sixty years Miss Waring lived at Clifton, and it was there she died, having survived all her brothers and sisters.

It was a quiet retired life she lived, enriched by warm friendships and devoted to good works, to the contemplation and expression of the great truths of religion and the quiet ministry of a pure and humble soul. She had the happiness to know that her hymns found their way to many hearts the world over. For years she was a constant visitor in the Bristol prisons, on behalf of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. With all her reserve she is said to have had an abundant sense of humour and a remarkable gift of telling good stories. To the depth of her inward life her hymns bear witness. The Bible was her constant study, and the Old Testament she read in the original Hebrew. In her old age she had the trials of growing weakness and dependence, but the loving care of near relatives always about her, and she was happy in her own inward peace. Her mind was clear to the last, until on that May evening, two years ago, she quietly fell asleep. It was characteristic of her whole spirit that towards the close of her life she delighted to recall her father's dying words: "When I am dead, throw open the window, let the light shine in, let the birds sing."

Such was the spirit in which Miss Waring faced the closing years of her long life; and when we turn back to the earliest of her hymns as they were published more than sixty years ago, we see how this quiet, happy trust was a constant light upon her way.

Father, I know that all my life
Is portioned out for me;
The changes that are sure to come
I do not fear to see;
But ask Thee for a present mind
Intent on pleasing Thee.

I ask Thee for a thoughtful love,
Through constant watching wise,
To meet the glad with joyful smiles,
And wipe the weeping eyes;
A heart at leisure from itself,
To soothe and sympathise.

Her life was given up, with beautiful completeness to that happy service, "at leisure from itself." As a ministering angel, she was ready always to enter into the needs and the joys of others, to speak the helpful word with sure insight and the healing touch of sympathy, and to encourage all pure and noble endeavour. Her heart was "at the secret source of every precious thing," resting in the constant sense of the Father's care and His infinite love, in the fellowship of Christ, which meant perfect love and willing sacrifice. She accepted the teaching of the Church in the matter of the orthodox doctrine of salvation and the sacraments, in which she delighted, as her hymns repeatedly testify; yet there can be little doubt that it was the inward witness that brought to her the ultimate conviction. The simplest and the deepest things of the life with God, beyond the power of death, were clear to her, because her own heart was filled with pure, unselfish love. Hers was an absolute trust, asking only that the Father's will might be done, willing and glad to be led, and sure that so it was best.

I would not have the restless will
That hurries to and fro,

Seeking for some great thing to do,
Or secret thing to know:
I would be treated as a child,
And guided where I go.

Wherever in the world I am,
In whatsoever estate,
I have a fellowship with hearts
To keep and cultivate,
A work of lowly love to do
For Him on whom I wait.

In service which Thy will appoints
There are no bonds for me;
My inmost heart is taught the truth
That makes Thy children free;
A life of self-renouncing love
Is a life of liberty.

When Dr. Martineau was bringing out his "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," in 1873, he wrote to Miss Waring asking permission to include some of her hymns in the book. He wrote, not as an entire stranger, he said, but "with memory of long-standing obligations" to her. "For, in truth, the quiet hours of sympathy in thought which may be given by true heart words, like yours, are of more avail to unite the distant, than ordinary intercourse to make friends of the near." We are thankful for our knowledge of the beautiful simplicity of her life, with which the cadence of her verse is in such perfect keeping, and through which it gains for us a new depth of meaning.

V. D. D.

LITERARY STUDIES.

ACONTIUS:

An Elizabethan Protester against the Narrowness of Creeds.

III.

HIS METHOD.

Acontius' book is a plea for liberty in all but the absolute essentials of the Christian Faith, and he therefore writes strongly against the overloaded creeds which, even in his day, were beginning to afflict the Church. He pleads, as did Chillingworth after him, for the Bible only as the standard of faith and practice, and makes a brave and noble protest against the persecuting and burning so common all around him. Chillingworth may easily have gained the inspiration for some of his noblest passages on this question from the book of Acontius, with which he was certainly familiar.

The most striking feature of Acontius' method is his marvellous open-mindedness. He was prepared to look into the face of every new belief, to study its features, and to judge for himself as to its truth or otherwise. He warns against the natural arrogance of the human mind. He has a shrewd knowledge of human nature, and especially of its weakness in disputations. "We find by experience," he says, "that when a man is certainly persuaded of a thing, and hath reason so to think, he cannot but stand as it were in admiration, that there should be anyone that cannot see as he sees." This led naturally to "choler and ten to one if he come not to reproach and railing."

The zeal of the orthodox is well portrayed in his description of the reception of heresy by the Church. "We as soon as any one seems to set his foot beside the Path, we think there is no course to be taken, but straightway to sound a defiance, to fill the world with railings, reproaches, clamours; whatever comes to our tongue's end, that we deem most fit to resist the Error, whereas oft-times nothing can be less to the purpose: like wise men of Gotham, we bring oyl to quench the fire. Whereas now or never, we stand most in need of sober advisement, let us abandon wrath, away with Arrogance, away with clamours, and let Reason alone bear sway in this business, neither let Satan, but the Spirit of God guide our Reason."

His inherent reasonableness is shown in the advice "to pause a while and think every man with himself; to me indeed, such things seem true which I have hitherto with the multitude believed; but what if that befall me which betides every man, that I should most err in that whereof I seem to be most certain. Why may I not hear the man first? Why should I not weigh what he saies?" He is not afraid of the freest inquisition into the grounds of our faith. "What!" he asks, "will the Truth become less apparent by the often discussion, and not rather every day more certain and clear?" He gives a counsel of perfection when he says, "Desire of Conquest ought to be banished from all Christian disputes," but he concedes that "do what we can, we shal hardly obtain the power to seem vanquished without great reluctance."

IV.

HIS THEOLOGY.

The crucial parts of Acontius' work were the third and seventh books, in which he advocates a creed of the smallest possible dimensions, and resting as far as possible on the Scriptures only. If we depart from them, he urges, there is nothing in which we may safely trust. He inquires what are the points which the Scriptures set forth as necessary to be known and believed, so that a man who did not thoroughly understand them was not to be accounted a member of God's Church. He quotes passages from John's Gospel which state that belief on the Son will obtain for a man eternal life. This is the fundamental truth, but it can exist in company with a great deal of error on other matters, since we are all human. If this were not the case, then no one could be saved; but it is expressly stated that "a very great and innumerable company shall be saved."

Hence there are degrees of Truth, some which it is absolutely necessary we should know, and some which may be safely unknown. But how are we to tell? "As for any general note of difference, though I have diligently inquired into the matter, yet have I not been able to find one." If anyone defined the principal heads of doctrine as those which are necessary to be believed, at once the question arises as to which are these principal points. "So that we are still as far to seek as ever." The only thing therefore was to make diligent inquiry.

He considers "that place of John is very remarkable," in which he says his book was written that we "might believe that Jesus is the Messiah the Son of God, and that believing ye might obtain life by his name." So that all that was required was simple belief in Jesus Christ as our Saviour. This was all that the thief on the cross and the eunuch had. The palsied man "believed in all probability that that same man, whose name was Jesus, came from God and was in favour with God; and therefore he hoped that by his means he might recover his health. But that he knew all those things which the Church hath for a long time accounted as articles of Faith necessary to be believed to Salvation, how likely a matter it is, I leave it to every man to judge." This passage was charged by Cheynell as being of a most suspicious cast.

Abraham, also, was another example of the vagueness as to articles of faith among the ancients. "He was promised that he should be the Father of many Nations; he was promised that happiness should betide to all Nations of the world by his seed; finally, he had the land of Canaan promised to him, and a very great prosperity, but of those points of Religion which it is judged every body is bound to know upon pain of damnation, we read not a word." From this he concludes that the points he has enumerated are the only ones mentioned in Scripture as being necessary for salvation. In this connection he repudiates Sabellianism, and with regard to the "long and very Tragically controversie" about the words of institution in the Lord's Supper, his opinion is that "it is clear therefore, that as well those which hold Christ's body to be in the Sacramental bread, as those which deny the same, although it must needs be that one side err, yet are they both (if otherwise conscionable observers of our Lord's commands) in the way of salvation." In the face of this, it was the duty of both sides to love and reverence one another.

His advice with regard to Creeds and Statements of Doctrine is, "That whatsoever shall be laid down as agreeable to the Word of God, may be expressed with the same words and phrases which the Spirit of God uses in Scriptures. Otherwise it is almost impossible, but that the wit of man will intrude something of its own." This was the principle so much in favour with Chillingworth and his school, and was the model upon which John Biddle worked his "Twofold Catechism." The Seventh Book deals with the question of Confessions of Faith, and pleads for more simplicity in their construction. Almost every city and state had its own Confession, and even private persons published them, so that the Papists were not without excuse in thinking that there were as many sects as Creeds. The ancient Jewish Church had been many times reformed, the altars thrown down, and all the signs of idolatry removed, and this was their confession of faith. There was no mention in the Scriptures of any other. He pleads for a common and general confession of faith in order that they might not only be, but also openly appear to be, of one faith and mind. But since this did not seem practicable, he would sooner have none at all than so many. The tendency was for them to be so enamoured of their Confessions that they would sooner do violence to the Scriptures than that a word of them should be changed. And thus it came to pass that the word of man carried more authority than the word of God. He believes therefore that if a carefully drawn-up Symbol were set forth, all these others might well be abolished.

Such a Symbol he finds in the Apostles' Creed, which was the watchword, as it were, by which the ancient Christians gained admittance into their assemblies. Whoever acknowledged it, was received into their midst, however erring in other respects, and whoever denied it was refused. Such a confession should be wanting in none of the articles necessary for salvation, and, on the other hand, it should contain none that are not so necessary, otherwise men will enter the Church who ought not to be there, and others will be kept out who have a right to entrance. If the Creed were not properly drawn up, and especially if non-essentials were included, the peace of the Church would be permanently endangered. It was impossible that everyone should think alike in the Church of God, and all that was required was that they should agree in essentials, and then conduct their controversies in a loving and brotherly spirit.

Even if the Confession contained all that it should contain, the wording of it was very important in order that its meaning might not be misunderstood, wilfully or otherwise. The Romanists, for instance, confessed the doctrine of remission of sins, but understood by it a remission brought about by the merit of good works. How was this to be avoided? By the admission of clear and simple articles only into the Creed, such as, "That there is only one true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent." The utmost simplicity is evidently his aim.

All the doctrines necessary for salvation were contained in the Bible, and were so simply expressed that all but those who were blind could easily understand them. Care must, therefore, be taken that the Confession of Faith contains nothing, not only that is not very certain and necessary to be known, but also nothing that is not expressed in the very words of the Scriptures as far as possible. And this, not that he thought that the Christian Religion was contained in the words and syllables of the Bible, or that other expressions were wrong, but simply on account of the unreliable nature of men's characters. For men will often hold doctrines to be so certain and true as to be beyond controversy, which yet are afterwards proved to be false. There was no one who did not believe that the Scriptures contained all the essentials clearly set forth. If so, why should we want to express them otherwise? Are we wiser than the Holy Spirit? He thinks, therefore, that whatever must be affirmed as necessary to salvation should be maintained in the very words in which it is expressed in the Scriptures. It was also not necessary to condemn all errors in a Confession of Faith, but only those which clashed with necessary articles of faith.

He proceeds to outline such a creed as he has described, and it was this proposed Confession which gave such offence to the orthodox theologians of succeeding generations. It may, perhaps, be interesting to compare a Sixteenth Century Eirenicon with those of our own day. He believes "(1) That there is one true God, and Jesus Christ whom He has sent, and the Holy Spirit, and that it ought not to be denied that the Father and the Son are distinct persons, seeing Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God. (2) That man is subject to the anger and judgment of God, and that the dead rise again; the just to eternal happiness, the wicked to eternal torments. (3) That God sent his own Son into the world, who, being made a man, died for our sins, and was raised from the dead for our justification. (4) That if we believe on the Son of God, we shall obtain life through his name. (5) That there is salvation in no other name, not in the blessed virgin, nor Peter, nor Paul, nor any other saint or name whatever. And that justification is not in the law, nor in the commands or devices of men. (6) That there is one baptism in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

He thinks that if such a Confession as this were made and received by the whole Church, it would make for the peace and contentment of all. For this was the only method by which such concord could be brought about. For if each man makes his private judgment the standard for others, then all will be heretics together, and there will be no end to the trouble and confusion. But if once men could be persuaded that whoever professed this symbol (whatever other cause of difference there might be) was yet a Christian and a brother, there would be great hopes of carrying on these discussions with courtesy and mutual respect.

The aspect of religious life and thought which this book holds up to view seems undoubtedly that of Chillingworth and Hales and of the Latitudinarians generally, and Acontius owing to his great influence at the critical period of Oxford development in the first half of the Seventeenth Century, may be safely regarded as one of the main foundations of English Liberal Christianity.

J. H. M. NOLAN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

SIR,—In the letter you publish to-day, Mr. Hocart puts his finger upon a difficulty which, as he says, is at the root of much prevalent misgiving in regard to human immortality. To the onlooker it does seem as though what appears to be the gradual fading away and cessation of consciousness must imply the final extinction of the individual mind in question. And yet, I think, there are weighty psychological reasons that should make us hesitate in drawing that conclusion. We picture a mind familiarly to ourselves as a mode of energy, somewhat after the fashion in which we familiarly picture to ourselves heat as a property of a hot body; or electricity as a property of an electrified body. And just as the heat may gradually be dissipated, or the electric charge be gradually weakened, so we conceive an individual consciousness may gradually thin away and pass into nonentity. As a matter of fact, of course, the energy in the former cases does not pass into nonentity; at the most, it does but change its form. This consideration will not, however, help us here, because in the physical change that takes place the individuality, such as it is, of the particular source of energy in question would appear to be lost. But the truth is that from a psychological point of view the popular analogy I have mentioned breaks down completely. The laws according to which physical energy is scientifically interpretable are not applicable to the mental life, and a scientific interpretation of the latter has to proceed on totally different principles. Not only so. A mind is not an object, that is capable of being observed or inspected by an external spectator. What the external spectator can alone observe are the bodily concomitants of mental states. For the sake of argument, however, let us suppose it were possible to contemplate a mind as an object, just as we contemplate (say) a stone as an object. Then one of the most striking differences—probably, the most striking difference—outwardly observable between the two objects would be this. Whilst the stone, so long as it remained a stone, would preserve from moment to moment an existence which to the external spectator would appear to be unbroken, that would not be the case with the mind. Repeatedly in the history of the mind thus contemplated there would appear to our hypothetical spectator intervals when its existence was either a pure blank, when in fact it had ceased to exist, or when, to use Mr. Hocart's words, "only a very small spark remained." During the hours of dreamless sleep, or during a state of swoon, for example, what would there be of mental life capable of being observed in the manner we are supposing? To an outside spectator, an individual mind would periodically exhibit gaps or pauses in its existence; it would not have, that is to say, the kind of continuity which is characteristic of a stone or other physical object. And yet we know, as a matter of fact, that these gaps or pauses do not imply breach of continuity for the conscious mind itself; the waking life before and after the interval of what we call unconsciousness is recognised by the subject itself to be of one piece, to constitute, in other words, one personality. Now, is it to advance a very extravagant hypothesis, if one ventures to suggest that something similar may happen in the stage of bodily death or in the intervals to which Mr. Hocart refers?

At all events, the natural normal course of the earthly existence of each one of us enables us to see that a self-conscious individuality is not necessarily dissolved when a pause or interruption occurs in its flow, but that it has a continuity which does not involve unbroken continuity of being throughout a given period of time.

With respect to Mr. O. A. Shrubsole's reply to my previous letter I have not much to say. In that letter I tried to show (a) that the arguments he had put forward for discontinuing what he called the "fruitless discussion" were every one of them logically invalid—instances, in short, of such fallacies as logicians are in the habit of describing under the names of ignoratio elenchi and non sequitur; and (b) that the unqualified and dictatorial assertion, "there is no evidence whatever to support the belief," combined with the deliberate suggestion that those who think there is evidence are either mentally defective or stupid, was a sample of the worst kind of dogmatism. How does Mr. Shrubsole seek to set aside these objections? In the first place, he protests that he himself "did not offer any opinion on the subject at issue." But, as I did not say or imply that he had done so, the remark possesses not the slightest relevancy. In the second place, he alleges that in asserting "there is no evidence whatever to support the belief," he "was but quoting what THE INQUIRER had already said." But this is contrary to the fact. The writer to whom he alludes spoke of "direct evidence," and I presume that what is true of "direct evidence" is no more necessarily true of "evidence" simpliciter than that what is true of a "straight line" is necessarily true of each and every kind of "line." In the third place, he retorts that my letter was itself "a flagrant example of dogmatism," because, according to his account of its contents, I "asserted the dogma with much unnecessary warmth." But I did no such thing. I should never dream of asserting immortality as a dogma, either with or without unnecessary warmth, any more than I should dream of asserting the existence of matter as a dogma. I think there is a large body of evidence in favour of both these beliefs, and on an appropriate occasion I should not hesitate to say I thought so, but that is very different from laying down either of them as a dogma. In the fourth place, he complains that instead of grappling with the problem (which, by the way, was altogether beside my purpose), I did but "vaguely hint" a method of investigating the subject that "is something like 'the secret of a mother's love.'" But, neither vaguely nor otherwise, did I hint anything so silly. How can a method of investigation be like the secret of a mother's love? Discussion not only of this problem, but of any problem, does, I confess, seem to me "fruitless" when the mode of conducting it is such as is adopted by your correspondent.—Yours, &c.,

G. DAWES HICKS.

Cambridge, September 21, 1912.

SIR,—Mr. Hocart's difficulty is one which must, I think, always be present with us so long as we think of the soul's existence as being absolutely dependent on the body, possessed or contained by the body; whereas the truth would seem to be that the soul, spirit, or ego (perhaps the name does not greatly matter) must, if our highest intuitions are to be trusted, possess and inform the body with all its functions, mental and physical, by means of which it expresses itself and gathers the experiences that bring knowledge and wisdom.

She wears that body but as one endues
A robe, half careless,

as Francis Thompson says in one of his poems, and he finely indicates the attitude which I think we should take in regard to the real individuality (not the same as mere personality) when he says:

How praise the woman who but know
The spirit?
How praise the colour of her eyes,
Uncaught
While they were coloured with her
Varying thought? . . .
How should I gauge what beauty is
Her dole
Who cannot see her countenance for
Her soul?

If the poet has here caught a glimpse of a great truth which we, so poor of faith and so lacking in vision, are unable to perceive, many of the difficulties which some people experience when they are confronted with the partial or complete suspension of the normal consciousness, such as Mr. Hocart instances, disappear, even if we cannot immediately explain exactly what has become of the soul. The spirit cannot express itself fully if the brain is paralysed or the mind deranged—if, in fact, the bodily mechanism is jarred and dislocated, any more than a musician can evoke melody from an instrument that is broken or out of tune. He must get his instrument repaired, or obtain a new one. Moreover, if we are able to conceive the possibility of a soul surviving the complete suspension of life, i.e. death, we ought not to be dismayed by its inability to function during the partial inhibition of its normal activities during life. In some cases when the power of the mind has been impaired by an accident, a second accident has restored the memory which the first obliterated, and we are all familiar with the suspension of consciousness (in the ordinary sense) during sleep or insensibility; yet we wake from sleep and recover from an anæsthetic in full possession of our reason and personal identity. Does not this go far to prove that the soul, the creative or directing force, is not destroyed when the mind is seemingly inactive?

All these considerations tend to the "larger hope" which in some of us has become a real conviction, and lend new significance to those words of Tennyson which seem to show that the idea of a continuous life—of a succession of lives, in fact—fills some people with a strange joy, and certainly prevents them from being frightened by any lapse of memory, however prolonged, or the thought of a "draught of Lethe" awaiting the soul in "slipping through from state to state."

Or if through lower lives I came—Though all experience past became Consolidate in mind and frame—

I might forget my weaker lot ;
For is not our first year forgot ?
The haunts of memory echo not.

And men, whose reason long was blind,
From cells of madness unconfined,
Oft lose whole years of darker mind :

Much more, if first I floated free,
As naked essence, must I be Incompetent of memory.

For memory dealing but with time,
And he with matter, could she climb
Beyond her own material prime ?

Moreover, something is or seems,
That touches me with mystic gleams,
Like glimpses of forgotten dreams—

Of something felt, like something here ;
Of something done, I know not where ;
Such as no language may declare.

Yours, &c.,

LAURA G. ACKROYD.

Brondesbury Park, N.W.,

September, 23, 1912.

SIR,—I have just read with the greatest interest and pleasure the letter in your issue of to-day, signed Laura G. Ackroyd. And I wish to offer the tribute of an old woman to a younger one for the enlightened, temperate, and fair-minded contribution she makes to a momentous question. I think in the latter paragraphs of her letter, especially, a word in season is spoken which needed to be said, and nothing of mine can add to it. But if I may exercise the privilege of age to strike a personal note, I would say that having been for the last twenty years a student, more or less, of theosophy, as taught by its best writers, I can bear witness to its all-pervading help in the endeavour to solve the perplexing riddles of life—notably those of survival after death, and the inequalities of the human lot. It is also strongly in accord, though not identical, with the whole trend of progressive thought and research in religion, science, and philosophy—to say nothing of the intuitive visions of poetry. This being the case, I most heartily endorse the wise suggestion of your correspondent that all thinkers should at least welcome and try to understand every earnest attempt, from whatever school of thought, to bring some light and leading to our troubled minds.—Yours, &c.,

ELLEN M. HIND.

5, North-square, N.W.,

September 21, 1912.

THE WONDER OF LIFE.

SIR,—I was not present myself at the British Association meeting, but I have read a full report of Professor Schäfer's address and a condensed one of the discussion, and except for a criticism of Professor Geddes', who, as far as I can gather, misunderstood Schäfer's position, there is nothing startling in Schäfer's contentions, except his statement that "life is not identical with soul," which is precisely the admission I should have thought religious men and women would have desired, but could hardly have hoped that he would make. The other statements are such common-places of biological science that I hardly like to assume that these are what "H. G." takes exception to in the last issue of THE INQUIRER. Will you kindly pardon me if, to make this point clear, I venture to quote from my own writings ?

Writing in a scientific journal (Natural Science) in 1899, I summarised the thought about the origin of life, knowing perfectly well, and stating it, that I was only summarising current opinion, and not suggesting anything new or heterodox, as follows :

From the earliest times various writers "have noticed certain resemblances between some kinds of dead and living material ; these resemblances have steadily multiplied in number, while they have become far more forcible in character, during the last forty to fifty years, so that many, perhaps most, scientists are beginning to assume, consciously or unconsciously, that purely physical and chemical causes are, or soon will be, sufficient to explain the lower and possibly also the higher forms of life." And then follow nearly twenty pages of illustration of this point of view. I considered this general attitude to be true five years later (1904), when this same thought was repeated in book form, nor did I then or now believe that it is antagonistic to religion.

Quite recently, for a series of articles on "Biological Thought" that I was asked to write for The Highway, I had to consider the trend of biological teaching to-day, and it was necessary for me to point out that the sciences of life are tending to accept permanently the religious feelings as natural to man, and I stated "that there is a tendency in" (in science) "to allow mind factors in animal development a power not formerly conceded to them ; not only so, but the presiding control of any given organism, especially in higher forms such as man, seems difficult to place in any one centre of the brain, and the question naturally arises whether some such conception as soul may not have to be revived" (Highway, September, 1912). Professor Schäfer's address, separating the thought of soul from life, as a related but distinct problem, was given four days after my article was published, and he appears, with the full weight of his great authority, to have taken the same view. To individuals who do not believe in miracles, who do believe in law and evolution, this address which rejects miracles, but accepts the idea of a soul, ought to have been about the most encouraging statement that could have been made, and to expect Schäfer to write poetically when he was making a simple statement of facts, is surely an odd conception of a scientist's function. Did we ask him to tell us about the wonder of life, we should find that he could teach not only ourselves but the physicists whom "H. G." prefers, as Schäfer is probably one of the three or four greatest world authorities on the processes of life, and the physicists are physicists and not biologists.

May I point out one other fact that seems to escape so many men otherwise of a religious nature ? If one really believes with the physicists that matter has psychic properties, it inevitably destroys a belief in immortality of our individual minds, as death then would be not only a disintegration of the body, but, as matter and mind would be aspects of one deeper something, the disintegration of the one would be the disintegration of the other. To me, all the beauty of life would be gone if I believed this thought.

Sir Oliver Lodge's view of religion leans often in both these directions ; sometimes he seems to favour mind, soul or spirit as a separate reality from matter, sometimes he seems to favour their union ; but the tendency in physics lately has been far too speculative to be claimed as sound, careful science, and many physicists themselves have raised objections to the growing imaginative element which is seriously endangering scientific truth.

There are consistent monistic scientists, like Lloyd Morgan, and time might show that these are on the side of truth, but if so life is robbed of its greatest hope, the immortality of the soul beyond death.

There are other scientists as great, and Professor Schäfer, in his practical study of life and in his wide learning, is possibly greater, who are beginning to consider mind or soul as a real problem to be studied independently of but related to the study of matter. To this school belongs the real hope of Christianity, and if it should prove itself to be the stronger it will almost certainly re-establish our faith in the soul. There is, I admit, a vague poetry in the physicist's thought, but it would be the poetry of disintegrating life, of a nirvanic preparation for the passing of a dream, the dream that we are immortal souls, whereas if soul must be separated from the thought of life there lies a great hope, and all is changed. Every real scientist knows the mystery and the wonder of life, and is as much impressed by it as is the poet or even the religious mind.

"H. G." gives two definitions of science, one which I think no great scientist could accept, and which Huxley would have called a kitchen Cinderella definition of her aims. "Science ends in mystery ; . . . poetry and religion begin with it." If this were so science would be a utilitarian study and nothing more. Is it not simple truth to say that science, poetry, and religion have each their daily life side, and this keeps them from soaring blindly to the clouds, but that each, as Huxley said of science, have their fairy visions ? Those who love mind realities, spiritual realities, are a little band of men and women, and the great scientist loves mind ideals as truly as the great poet or the great religious teacher. If we divide our forces in warring sections, the real enemies to humanity, those who would make of life a blind drudgery, those who would make of sport, food, and debased passion false gods for mankind to worship, will triumph, and the enemies are many and the real prophets are few.

"H. G.'s" second definition all who love science can endorse, if it is interpreted widely. "Science," and may I add poetry, art, music, and literature, rightly treated, are not "the enemies of religion." "Science is the patient, selfless, devoted search for truth in the spirit of a trusting, wondering child. It grows more reverential towards the universe the more it knows and feels." This is the spirit of science we can all accept, viewed at its topmost height by a Newton or a Darwin. Across the path of humanity's ideals are drunkenness and vice, automatism and habit, greed of power and gold; the sciences of life can do, and have done, much to make life cleaner, healthier, and purer. Science is no enemy of religion, differences of ideas and feelings should be a matter of friendly discussion between them; our real foes are those who deny in theory or practice the need of a mind life that is rich and human and wholesome. Against these, science, religion, philosophy, art and poetry ought to act together in one united effort of friendly co-operation for the genuine ideals of life.—Yours, &c.,

J. LIONEL TAYLER.

146, Highbury New Park,

September 23, 1912.

THE ABUSE OF LANGUAGE.

SIR,—Mr. Eustace Thompson, in his letter against slang, makes a sad blunder, and thereby casts a slur on a worthy effort. He speaks of the use of the word "shove" as a modern usurpation, and does not see that it is an attempt to bring back a sound expressive word. Has Mr. Thompson forgotten Milton's use of the word in Lycidas? Does he not know that Shakespeare uses it at least three times, and that the word is quite classical down to Dryden's poetry? Then it was "quietly shoved aside" by those cultured and elegant people who tied up flower-pots in ribbons, and hid the nakedness of their piano legs.—Yours, &c.,

R. H. U. BLOOR.

Exeter, September 21, 1912.

SIR,—While agreeing with Mr. Thompson's remarks on the above subject, and deprecating with him any tendency that may exist to the use of mean or ignoble expressions in treating of serious matters, I venture to think he has been unfortunate in the single example he has given. "Quietly shoved aside," said of a claimant to a throne, is surely not only a very expressive phrase, but is also perfectly correct and classical English. Otherwise what of Milton's well-known line in the Lycidas—

And shove away the worthy bidden guest?

Shakespeare also uses the word several times, as, for example, in Hamlet—

Offence's gilded hand may shove by justice.

In all three cases I submit "shove" is the right word in the right place for the simple reason that no other would express the meaning so well.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT B. DRUMMOND.

10, Hartington-gardens, Edinburgh,
September 21, 1912.

THE HYMNS OF GEORGE MATHESON.

SIR,—I should like to thank Mr. Davis for bringing to the knowledge of your readers the life and personality of Dr.

George Matheson, "Matheson of Innellan," as he was known in his earlier years of fame. I am acquainted with no preacher or devotional writer gifted with more poetic insight; and, though the grit of orthodox phraseology is sometimes sprinkled on the spiritual bread, rather more than Unitarians may like, still it is the bread of spirit and of poetry that he gives to the hungry soul. At bottom he was of the true Catholic genus like John Caird, of whom he learned. Such was his sympathy—too rare in Scotia—for non-Christian religions, that it was once suggested to him that he should go as a missionary to the Hindus. "I go?" he exclaimed. "No, I dare not go. I am afraid I would be converted to Brahminism."

But chiefly I write to bring to your readers' notice another grand hymn by him, which I do not think has ever appeared in any Hymn Book. One can easily understand why it has no place in the "Church Hymnary," Scotland's richest book of praise, along with "O Love that wilt not let me go." But it is a grand hymn, and it reveals the breadth of Dr. Matheson's mind. It is entitled "One in Christ," and I omit a verse or two.

Gather us in, Thou Love that fillest all!

Gather our rival faiths within Thy fold!
Rend each man's temple-veil, and bid it fall,

That we may know that Thou has been of old.

Gather us in.

Gather us in, we worship only Thee;

In varied names we stretch a common hand,

In diverse forms a common soul we see,

In many shapes we seek one Spirit-land.

Gather us in.

Thine is the mystic light that India craves;

Thine is the Parsee's sin-destroying beam;

Thine is the Buddhist's rest from tossing waves;

Thine is the Empire of vast China's dream;

Gather us in.

Thine is the Roman's strength, without his pride;

Thine is the Greek's glad world without its graves;

Thine is Judea's law with love beside,

The truth that centres and the grace that saves.

Gather us in.

Some seek a Father in the heavens above,

Some ask a human image to adore;

Some crave a spirit vast as life and love,

Within Thy mansion we have all and more.

Gather us in

—Yours, &c.,

R. NICOL CROSS.

138b, Duke-street, Southport,
September 21, 1912.

A PUBLIC lecture on "The Philosophy of Shadworth Hodgson" will be delivered by Professor G. Dawes Hicks, M.A., Litt.D., at University College, London, on Friday, October 4, at 5 p.m.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

IN the new volumes which have just been issued as harbingers of the autumn publishing season, Everyman's Library maintains its reputation for a wide range of interest, and for its confidence in the appetite of the public for standard old-fashioned and sometimes almost forgotten books. Cobbett's "Rural Rides," in two volumes, with an introduction by Mr. Edward Thomas, will help to revive memories of England eighty years ago by a master of shrewd observation and racy English prose. A book of a similar character even less familiar to the ordinary reader is "Letters from an American Farmer," which contains a vivid description of life in the American Colonies in the 18th century. The letters were first published in London in 1782. There was an American edition in 1793, and then these letters, which earned the high praise of Hazlitt, fell into oblivion for more than 100 years. A further volume has been added to the works of Swedenborg, "The Divine Love and Wisdom," with an introduction by Sir Oliver Lodge. Roget's well-known "The-saurus of English Words and Phrases" has been revised and issued in two volumes. Hallam's "Constitutional History of England," in three volumes, a Dictionary of Non-Classical Mythology, and "Three Comedies," by Björnson, are also among the notable volumes in a very attractive list.

THE HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

ONE of the remarkable features of the Home University Library, published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, is the regularity with which the instalments of ten volumes are issued, and the high standard of excellence maintained. Probably when the whole series is completed, a few of the volumes will stand out above the others and remain as permanent additions to the literature of knowledge. Scholars, like other men, vary in their power of good writing and popular exposition, and some subjects lend themselves more easily than others to the art of compression in a small book. The new volumes include "Missions," by Mrs. Creighton; "Ethics," by Mr. G. E. Moore; "The Making of the New Testament," by Prof. Bacon; "Great Writers of America," by Professor W. P. Trent and J. Erskine; "Political Economy," by Prof. S. J. Chapman; and "Electricity," by Prof. Kapp. From the point of view of the student the lists of books and hints for further reading are of great importance, and here we think a little more supervision might be exercised by the editorial board, so as to give them some greater uniformity of scale. It is, moreover, desirable that in the case of a series of volumes, published both in England and the United States, the names of publishers in both countries should be given. When, for instance, American writers refer to standard English books they should not appear as though they were only to be procured from a New York publisher. This remark applies even to some books published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate themselves, e.g., in Professor Bacon's volume on "The Making of the New Testament," Pfeiderer's "Primitive Christianity" is described as published by Putnam's, and Dr. James Drummond's "Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel," appears with the reference "Scribner's, N.Y., 1904." The English edition was published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate in 1903.

LITERARY NOTES.

MEDIAEVAL sculpture has been studied hitherto chiefly in France, and writers like Robert de Lasteyrie, Mlle. Louise Pillion, and quite recently M. Boinet in his book "Les Sculptures de Bourges," have naturally confined themselves to French examples. An important gap in the history of English art will be filled by the publication of an "Account of Mediæval Figure Sculpture in England," by Mr. E. S. Prior, the Slade Professor of Fine Art in the University of Cambridge, and Mr. Arthur Gardner, which will be issued shortly by the Cambridge University Press. The authors have not attempted to give anything like a complete catalogue of English remains, but even so the work of classification occupies a quarto volume of more than 700 pages, illustrated with some 855 photographic reproductions in the text, in which the reader can enjoy the charm that romance and sentiment have wrought in English mediæval sculpture. The authors claim that English sculpture since the Saxon days has been a specific growth—sui generis—from its own stem, however much it has bent to the breezes of Continental fashion. Owing to the enormous destructions of its examples it may be reckoned that scarcely more than 1 per cent. of the figure sculpture of the Middle Ages has come down to us. What remains, however, is not scanty in itself, and the illustrations have been selected from about three thousand photographs, while probably more than three times that number of actual objects of sculpture have at one time or another been brought to the notice of the authors. Account has also been taken of other forms of mediæval imagery—the paintings of manuscripts, and on walls, the figure tracings on glass, upon enamels and brasses; as well as the modelled figure work on seals and coins.

THE Cambridge University Press also announces for publication in October a work by Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, entitled "Light on the Gospel from an ancient Poet." It maintains that the recently discovered Odes of Solomon constitute a kind of half-way house between Jewish and Christian thought, connecting the Pauline doctrine of the Body of the Messiah with the imagery of the Song of Songs, and illustrating from Jewish sources the Christian doctrine of the revelation of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

AMONG other books announced by the Cambridge University Press are the "Philosophical Works of Descartes," Vol. II., translated by G. T. R. Ross and Elizabeth Haldane; "Romanesque and Byzantine Architecture," in two volumes, with numerous illustrations, by T. G. Jackson, R.A.; Vol. IX. of the "Cambridge History of English Literature," and several new volumes in the series of Cambridge manuals of science and literature.

THE Cambridge University Press has undertaken the agency in Great Britain and the Colonies for the sale of a series of International Bibliographies, which are being issued in Berlin under the direction of the International Institute. A "Bibliography of Social Science" is among the volumes which will be issued shortly.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON announce the early publication of "The Life of a Spider," by J. H. Fabre, the first of a series of books which they intend to publish from the pen of this author. It has been translated by Mr. A. Teixeira de Mattos, and will have an introduction by M. Maeterlinck, who has described Fabre as the "Homer of the insect world."

NEW and cheap editions of Mr. Arnold Bennett's popular little books on the philosophy of every-day life, which have had a great vogue, especially on the other side of the Atlantic, are also announced by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. These include "The Human Machine," "Mental Efficiency," "How to Live on Twenty-four Hours a Day," and "The Feast of St. Friend."

THE British and Foreign Blind Association are preparing a Braille edition of the late Dr. Weymouth's "New Testament in Modern Speech." St. Mark's Gospel has now been published.

PROFESSOR SCHÄFER's address at Dundee, as President of the British Association, on "Life, its Nature, Origin and Maintenance," will be issued immediately by Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. This will be the only authorised issue of the address.

THE well-known Jesuit, Father Matthew Russell, the brother of the late Lord Russell of Killowen, died quite recently. Messrs. Longmans & Co. will publish in a few days his latest book, "The Three Sisters of Lord Russell of Killowen and their Convent Life." The eldest of the sisters died comparatively young, and the account of her is confined to a chapter or two; but very full and intimate accounts are given of the two other sisters, one of whom spent nearly fifty years in San Francisco, California, where she established and managed a large hospital and several other charitable institutions. The book, which is largely made up of the nuns' letters to each other, is an interesting revelation of the realities of convent life. Several chapters are devoted to the private life and character of their brother, the Chief Justice, who figures frequently in their correspondence.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. CHARTO & WINDUS:—The Outcast: F. E. Penny. 6s. net. Marcus Aurelius: John Presland. 5s. net.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—Days with the Great Composers, second series. 3s. 6d. net. Puritanism in England: The Rev. Canon H. Hensley Henson, D.D. 5s. net. A Dream of Blue Roses: Mrs. Hubert Barclay. 6s. The Preacher, His Life and Work: The Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D. 5s. net. The Old Nest: Rupert Hughes. 5s. net. Bethlehem to Olivet: J. R. Willer, D.D. 3s. 6d. net. Days with the Lyric Poets. 3s. 6d. net. The Mystery of 31, New Inn: The Rev. Austin Freeman. 6s. The Poets of the Old Testament: Prof. Alex. R. Gordon, D.Litt., D.D. 6s. net. The Essentials of Christian Belief: The Rev. David Fyffe, M.A. 3s. 6d. net. Silent Hour Booklets, 1s. net each:—The Joy of Jesus, George Matheson, D.D., LL.D.; A Hymn of the Cross, W. M. Glow, B.D.; The Considerateness of Jesus, W. M. Glow, B.D.; Courageous Calm, G. H. Knight; God's Will and My Life, Len G. Broughton, D.D.; Christian Hope, Ralph Connor; What Makes Life Worth Living, George Matheson, D.D., LL.D.; The Restfulness of Jesus, G. H. Morrison, M.A.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.:—The Immanence of God: J. Abelson, M.A., D.Lit. 10s. net.

MESSRS. JOHN OUSELEY, LTD.:—The Soul of Judas: Douglas Price. 2s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.
Cenobium, The Cornhill Magazine.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SHEEP DOG TRIALS IN SCOTLAND.

A FEW days ago we went to Kingussie to see the trials of the sheep dogs. We went up the glen behind the little town, where a beautiful stream rushes down amongst trees from the circle of hills, and there we sat on the heather above an open space of green, with a wood at the other end, and the dark and lovely mountains looking over beyond.

I wish I could tell you all that each dog did—they were such lovely dogs, and each with a character of his own; but there were more than thirty entered for the trials, so I can only tell you of a few.

Each dog had three sheep to manage; the sheep were in the wood at the back of the ground, with a man and a dog to send out the three for each dog as his turn came. On the hill at the end of the ground opposite the wood stood each shepherd in turn with his dog, and when the three sheep appeared coming out of the wood, the dog was sent off to find them. It was a long run, and there were hillocks and bushes between, so that it took a little time for the dog to find his sheep. When he had found them he had to drive them forward, through a space between two white flags first, and then through a narrower space between two red flags, and then a long run up to a little row of hurdles with a gap in it, and the three sheep had all to be got through the gap, and then across a long piece of ground to a little fold with a narrow entrance into which they were to go. There were also some hurdles arranged in the shape of a double cross; and in the more difficult trials the sheep had to be sent through the cross one way and out the other way. There were eight minutes given for the dogs to manage to get the sheep through the two sets of flags and the hurdles, and into the fold; and a quarter of an hour for those that got them through the flags, the hurdles, the double cross and into the fold.

When the judge sounded his whistle the dog started, and when the time was up the whistle sounded again and he had to stop, whether he had finished or not. Well, one pretty dog, Moss, couldn't find his sheep at all, though he hunted about for them and tried to follow his master's signs or whistling. He was three years old. When the whistle sounded again he had to give up.

Then came Maid, three years old; and she found the sheep, and got them through the flags; but they were very obstinate, and though she tried her very best, and her master did all he could to encourage her from the distance, and tried to make her understand what to do, the whistle sounded, and poor Maid had to give up!

Then came Bet, six years old; she shot like an arrow straight for her three sheep, and gently and quickly followed them, driving them before her through the flags, the hurdles, the cross, and into the pen. Such a cheering she got from the spectators! We learned afterwards that the judges gave Bet a prize of £14, and a silver cup for her master.

Then came Flossie, who was only one year old (quite a little girl, you will think), but she was very clever, and did everything except the gate in the hurdles, which the sheep would not go through for all her trying. She even got them through the cross, which was the most difficult of all. The sheep often went and stood with their noses close to the gap in the hurdles, and seemed as if they could not help going through, and then provokingly turned off and ran the other way. But Flossie got a prize of £6 for doing so well at one year old.

Then came Tell, Sweep, Fan, and Lad, who got a £4 prize; Risp, who got £3; and Blake, who got £1. All were eager and wonderfully swift; and it was beautiful to see how they understood every sign of their master's. It seemed really as if they knew all they had to do, and they were so gentle with the sheep; they seldom went near them, and they never barked, just ran, or crept up at a distance; and when they had got them very near the obstacles the dogs always lay down at their master's sign, quite flat on the ground, and waited—then walked a step or two and lay down again, just creeping gently nearer and nearer, to make the sheep go through the opening; and when after all they turned off in the wrong direction, the dog was up and off to head them back again, with untiring patience. When the dog succeeded he got a round of applause, and when he failed everyone was sorry for him, and a regretful murmur of "Oh-h-h" went out in sympathy, for all the dogs tried so hard. Once when a dog failed and the whistle sounded, his master stooped down and patted him, to tell him he had done his best.

Some of the sheep were wilder than others, which made it more difficult. But nothing could be more beautiful than the dogs' characters, so absolutely and joyfully obedient to their masters, so eager and bright, so swift and intelligent, so gentle to the sheep, so full of self-restraint. It was a beautiful lesson to us all, and we could not tear ourselves away till it was over, but sat on the hill watching from half-past nine till nearly six, with an interval away for some dinner.

And all the time the stream rushed down the glen amongst the birch trees behind us, and often a little rain fell, and the gleams of sun painted lovely rainbows upon the blue mountains every few minutes.

At the end the shepherds stood about on the hill, each with his dogs, talking it over, and we went and patted and stroked the dogs, and then they went forward to receive their prizes.

If ever you have a chance to see a sheep dog trial do not miss it—it is one of the loveliest things you could see.

G. MARTINEAU.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. FREDERICK MONKS, J.P.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death, in his 78th year, of Mr. Frederick Monks, which took place on Tuesday, the 24th inst., at Southport. Mr. Monks spent all his active life in Warrington, and by his indomitable energy built up the great business which is identified with his name. He began, as so many successful men have done, on the lowest rung of the ladder, and won his way upwards step by step by his own efforts. But there was one influence in his early life which he never forgot, and all the native generosity of his heart was seen at its best when he spoke of it. He was one of a group of lads who owed some of the deepest impressions of their lives to Philip Carpenter during his memorable ministry at Cairo-street Chapel. To those early memories of the Sunday-school and the Chapel Mr. Monks was faithful with an enthusiasm that never faltered, and next to his own home there was no place on earth he loved so dearly. Succeeding ministers have found in him a staunch friend, while his fund of lively reminiscence made the past live for them in the present.

When the years brought affluence and honours—he was a magistrate for the Borough of Warrington and the County of Cheshire—Mr. Monks was prodigal in his generosity. He was never so happy as when he was giving happiness to other people, and sharing his good things with those less fortunate than himself. His beautiful home at Walton Old Hall was a centre of abounding hospitality. Through it all those who belonged to Cairo-street Chapel seemed to occupy a special place of privilege. For many years the teachers and elder scholars of the Sunday school held a tennis club in a field close to his house, which he placed at their disposal; and this is only one illustration of his constant concern for their happiness and welfare. Every form of philanthropic effort in Warrington found in him a generous supporter, but his name will be specially connected with the management of the Hospital and the foundation of the District Nursing Society. In all his work he was helped very greatly by his wife, a woman of remarkably shrewd judgment and quiet decision of character. Mrs. Monks died a few years ago. Their son, Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., is the present head of the firm, and there are three daughters.

Since his retirement from business Mr. Monks has lived at Southport, where he took a deep interest in all that concerned the welfare of the Unitarian Church. The interment took place at Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, on Friday afternoon.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

FAREWELL TO DR. CROTHERS.

MEETINGS IN LIVERPOOL.

LIVERPOOL, as a gateway to that ocean, "which does not separate, but unites the nations," had the privilege of the last days of cordial greeting and farewell to Dr. Crothers, at the close of his eight months' holiday on this side of the Atlantic, so much of which, to our great advantage, has been spent in this country. He sailed with his family for Boston, by the Leyland s.s. Winifredian on Thursday afternoon, September 19, and on the first Sunday in October is to be once more in his own pulpit at Cambridge, Mass.

"Holiday" was what ostensibly Dr. Crothers came over for, and he told us at a farewell reception at the Mill-street Mission on the Tuesday evening before he sailed how on that holiday he had fared. It was a humorous picture he set before us, of a tired and discouraged man being led about from one Italian city to another, through a long course of the Old Masters, until after two months of that discipline the home authority saw that it would not do any longer, and gave him permission to accept all the preaching engagements he could get. Then his spirits rose again, his energies revived, and in this country he found himself thoroughly at home and happy. At the meeting of the National Conference in Birmingham, at the Whitsuntide meeting of the Unitarian Association in London, at the annual meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association at Ringwood, his voice was heard, and at other times in churches in London, Birmingham, Gee Cross, then in Wales, Ireland and Scotland, and finally in Liverpool, where on the last Sunday he preached in the morning at Ullet-road Church an earnest word for "Peace," in the afternoon to the children at the Mill-street Mission, and in the evening at Liscard, where the Memorial Church was crowded to the doors. Then on Monday a last sermon in Hope-street Church, at a service arranged by the Liverpool Sunday School Society, followed by an informal meeting of the Women's League, and on the following evening the farewell reception at Mill-street, organised by the Liverpool District Missionary Association. So our friend takes his rest, and we delight to have him among us, to feel the touch of his quickening personality, and to listen to the fearless, happy and persuasive tones of his voice.

THE ORDER OF SPIRITUAL CREATION.

The last sermon, in Hope-street Church, renewed the message of confidence in the power of a spiritual faith, in the creative energy of the soul in this world of God, which in one form and another Dr. Crothers has repeatedly brought to us during his stay in this country. We are here to be "labourers together with God," and find the surest revealing of the Divine purpose in the things which ought to be, "in the urgency of righteousness, in ideals unfulfilled, in high hopes, in rebellion against evil, in self-sacrifice"; we are to be not "conformed to this world," content with things as they are, but "transformed" by the renewing of our mind, that we may know what is the "good and acceptable and perfect will of God." Such has been the message, and we heard it again in Hope-street Church.

The sermon began with a contrast between the two conceptions of the beginnings of things, which we find in the first chapter of Genesis and at the opening of the Fourth Gospel, the former with all its emphasis on the thing that is made, the latter dwelling upon that which must be before the actual making of anything, that which is eternal and eternally creating. "In the beginning was the Word," the thought, the idea, and out of that Divine idea, as if God were uttering himself, out of that came the world, and man, and at last the ideal, the Christ, the Word made flesh. Starting from that conception, Dr. Crothers went on to show how it was true in regard to our world, and our creation of the things we long to see in the world. First must come the thought, which must utter itself in some great word; and out of the thought, out of the word of life, out of the mind of the man who imagines and sees, is the good, great thing at last to be realised. The greatest thing we need as religious teachers is to get something of this creative spirit into our own hearts. What is it we are trying to do when we teach religion? Not to impart a certain number of facts, but to create a world, a world of beauty and truth, of life and love; not merely to tell what has happened, but to make something happen that never has happened before; to create in some soul a mightier love than it has ever known before, to create in it a new spiritual world. And this must be done along the lines of that conception of the Divine Word. First the thought, the conception, the hunger for something as yet unattained; then the clear perception, "That is what I want," and the long, patient effort to realise in action what is already realised in feeling and thought. The difficulty with the creation of that spiritual and moral world, which all good men are seeking to bring into being, is that it takes so long before the Word becomes flesh, before the thought becomes form, before the desire becomes action. So it has been with the thought of God, the thought of righteousness, the great conception of justice between man and man. How long it has taken before we begin to conceive of the possibility of an honest and kindly world in which to live! How long it took before the conception came to anyone that we are here not as enemies, but as members of one family, with common interests and common rights and common aspirations!

One of these great ideals, which we are trying first to conceive as thoughts, and then to turn into action, is the ideal of the Church—the Church as a family of free spirits, a brotherhood of seekers after truth and righteousness, and a place of worship, by which we mean the continued delight in all that is high, beautiful and holy. When we speak of the Church, if we think simply of what has been done already we have lost the creative impulse. Think of it, not as something accomplished, but as one of the great ideals. "One holy Church of God,"—yes, but no one has yet seen that Church, no one has yet realised what it may become. It is simply a great word of hope, a great inspiration. Or take Christianity. What does it mean? Something already accomplished, done in the world? When I think of Christian history, I cannot take great pleasure in it, if I think that is all. I read of persecution, heresy hunting, superstition, numberless failures of good men in the past, and I say, "Is that what we mean?" Then there comes the vision that transcends all our efforts, which lures us on to new efforts in the future. The mind of Christ, the ideal which came to him in the beginning of the new brotherhood, the spirit of God in the spirit and the life of man. I look upon it and say, "Here is something just at its beginning. We are just learning what it is even to speak the name, to form the thought. By and by will come the blessed realisation."

Among all the revolutionaries of the present time none are so full of the essence of change, both for the individual and the world, as he who in perfect sincerity takes up the task presented to us by our fathers, the faith of pioneers, who believe that in the unexplored territory beyond is room for new homes for men, new civilisations, new and more perfect forms of religion. We are just beginning to picture to ourselves the possibilities; to our children must come the full realisation, better means and better power. Our very effort for them is but a prayer to God to help us as we stand at the beginning of our task.

That was the final word, good to be remembered, with the spur of that thought, that we are here to try to make something happen which has never happened before.

THE FAREWELL RECEPTION.

The fine hall of the Mill-street Mission, in festive array, was well filled on the Tuesday evening with a representative gathering of friends from the whole district, to greet Dr. and Mrs. Crothers, and bid them farewell. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers was in the chair, and the resolution of the evening was moved by Sir William Bowring and seconded by Mr. Richard

D. Holt, M.P. The concluding vote of thanks was moved by Mr. Arthur Willmer, and seconded by Mr. Sydney Jones. The speeches were all full of grateful acknowledgments and cordial good wishes and warm in their expression of the pleasure it has been to have Dr. Crothers, once more in our midst.

In his reply, Dr. Crothers was in his happiest mood, as he spoke of the home feeling he had among our people here, and the pleasure it had been to him to go up and down the country seeing something of the life of the churches; and also when he went on to speak of the true relations of confidence that ought to prevail between the people of the two lands, who are really one in the essential things of their deeper life. He pleaded that Englishmen should judge Americans, and Americans the English not by the obtrusive and often undesirable specimens of travellers they might meet in the streets of their great cities, but by what was best in the life of each people. When he thought of the English, he said, it was of the people of John Bright, the people of John Milton, and he asked that Americans should similarly be judged by what was best and noblest in the life of their people. It was pleasant to hear that looking back to his previous visit, six years ago, Dr. Crothers was struck by the progress made not only in the striking social movements of the day, but distinctly in the force of the liberal movement in religion.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Coseley: Appointment.—The Rev. W. G. Topping, minister of the Unitarian Church, Accrington, has received and accepted an invitation to become the minister of the Old Meeting House, Coseley. He will enter upon the appointment in the new year.

Cullompton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday, September 22, at the Unitarian Church, in connection with the harvest festival, the minister, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, preaching at all the three services. The building of the new chapel will commence as soon as possible. Further contributions to the building fund will be gratefully received by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, Chudleigh Cottage, Cullompton, Devon.

London: Holloway.—A crowded and enthusiastic gathering, including members from all parts of London, met to celebrate the opening of the branch rooms of the Liberal-Christian League at 11, Loraine-road, on Thursday, 19th inst. The speaking centred mainly on the mission of Liberal Christianity. The chairman, Mr. E. Capleton, said that though little understood in this country, he claimed for it a history of nearly one hundred years. It dated from the birth of the Higher Criticism, and was a movement which, while true to the spirit of Christianity, claimed to interpret it in the light of modern knowledge. The term Liberal had nothing to do with politics. It was the same as Free. Their movement was interdenominational, and welcomed all souls who sought for truth and righteousness. He referred to the recent formation of Free Christian congregations in Yorkshire as a sign of the times, and their fraternal union with the Sheffield Unitarians. He introduced Dr. Orchard as one who was spending his life in the cause of Free Christianity. Dr. Orchard said that to him Free Christianity meant simply freedom to be a Christian without the entanglements of Church doctrines. Such was the life Jesus led. He had been described as the only free man, because he did absolutely the will of God. Society was in a ferment both inside and outside the churches. The churches knew that something was wrong with them. His newspaper answers to correspondents had entailed a still greater burden upon him—that of giving interviews. Many had lost faith in God, in themselves, and the future. Christianity was love and service—simple words, but hard to practise. Further than that, it meant corporate communion with God. God is only found in the communion of spirit with spirit. Fellowship is necessary, though not always easy. There was a great work for the League, which might become another Salvation Army. Dr. Tudor Jones was unable to be present, his place being taken by Miss A. H. Alleyne, hon. secretary to the League. The Sunday evening services are for the unchurched, and are not intended to conflict with any existing institution. The rooms are one and a half miles from any other progressive religious centre. Last Sunday there were thirty present. Dr. Lionel Tayler lectured on "Eugenics" on Wednesday, September 18.

London District Unitarian Society.—Mr. Ronald Bartram writes from Fern Lea, Kelso-road, Highbury, N., as follows:—"May I be permitted to remind ministers and secretaries of churches and societies of the 'Information Bureau' kept at Essex Hall and this address, which was started by the Council of this Society last year. I shall be glad if secretaries and others will kindly let me know the dates of important meetings they are proposing to hold, as by this means a clashing of dates is avoided. Its usefulness was proved last year, as I received several applications to know if dates were free, and I was instrumental by this means in preventing in some instances the holding of important meetings on the same day. A diary, with the dates booked, is kept at Essex Hall, and can be seen there; or I shall be pleased to inform inquirers as to available days."

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The monthly meeting of the Union was held at Essex Hall on Monday, September 23. The sermon was preached by Mr. P. O. Jones, of Deptford, on the text Rev. iii. 20. Various methods of treating the text were submitted by other members. A very interesting meeting was closed with the helpful criticisms which the Vice-Presidents are accustomed to offer on such occasions. It is gratifying to be able to record that the attendance at the reading circle is well maintained, and that the newly-founded library is thoroughly justifying itself.

Manchester: Bradford.—The Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches has recently had under discussion the mission work in Bradford, which, up to the death of the late Rev. W. E. Attack, was carried on under the auspices of the Association. Mr. Attack, who was missionary of the Association for fifteen years, was very successful in his efforts, and a congregation has been built up which, in addition to meeting purely local expenses, now appears able and willing to take upon itself a greater measure of responsibility and independence than it has had hitherto under the care of a missionary paid by the District Association. Accordingly the governing body of the Association decided at their last meeting to recommend to the Bradford congregation the appointment of a minister. In response to this suggestion the congregation has agreed to appoint a minister in consultation with the Mission Committee of the District Association, and to make an annual contribution towards his stipend, an indication of the spirit of self-help on the part of a congregation drawn entirely from the artisan class which is most encouraging.

Manchester, Gorton.—The workers in connection with Brookfield Church are preparing for the bazaar to be opened on October 16. Over £600 is needed for costly renewals and repairs to the church and school premises. Towards this a sum of £200 has been guaranteed chiefly by present or former members aided by a few friends. Towards the remaining £400, donations of money or goods are earnestly solicited, and should be sent to the Rev. A. Thornhill at Brookfield Parsonage, or Mr. J. L. Worthington, 30, Park Range, Victoria Park, Manchester.

Taunton, Mary-street Chapel.—After considerable renovation and the addition of a new organ, Mary-street Unitarian Chapel was re-opened on Thursday, September 19, when special services were held. The renovation work includes the provision of a new roof, thorough repair of the walls, redecoration, ventilation, and the installation of the electric light, which has entailed, together with the organ, an expenditure of nearly £600, only about £60 of which yet remains to be cleared off. From Mr. Andrew Carnegie the committee obtained the promise of half the cost of the proposed new organ provided the other half was raised by the congregations and friends. The chapel is rich in historic associations, and the present building dates back to 1721. The first meeting house was erected near the same spot in 1646. Coleridge frequently preached in the chapel, walking fifteen miles from Nether Stowey in order to do so. The afternoon service, which opened with the dedication of the new organ, was conducted by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, who preached the sermon. Mrs. Goodland, one of the oldest members of the congregation, opened the organ, on which several voluntaries were played by Mr. Newlands. Tea was served in the Memorial Schools (erected in 1886 by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers as a memorial to his wife), and short speeches were made by the Rev. J. Birks, minister of the chapel, Mr. Harold Goodland, Mr. Schunck, Mr. J. Duckworth, Mr. C. J. Goodland, J.P., and the Revs. J. Collins Odgers, A. N. Blatchford, J. Worthington, Clement E. Pike, and Rudolf Davis. In the evening an organ and vocal recital was given in the chapel, some excellent items being rendered by a quartette party from George's Meeting, Exeter, and a short address was delivered by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford. The collections for the day mounted to close upon £20. Special services were also conducted on Sunday, September 22.

The Unitarian Van Mission.—The meetings of the Van Mission during the past fortnight have been held regularly, and the reports up to Sunday, September 22, bring the total number to within a couple of 400. In Wales the Rev. D. G. Rees held himself responsible for the whole series, and worked hard until the Saturday night, when he was too worn out to keep up with the keenness and appetite of his audience. His Pontardawe meetings were within a short distance of the Trebanos chapel, and the members of his congregation were able to assist with hearty singing. They drove over also to Neath, where the second week's work was done, and helped to make the meetings successful. Neath itself suffered to some extent from the fact that the fair was held at the same time, but there were many earnest inquirers and good results. There are friends in the place who hoped that the services which once were held in the town may some day be revived. The old Unitarian chapel is still pointed out. The Midland van spent a second week at Wednesbury, with the Rev. W. Clark Lewis as missionary; and the good impression which had been created was deepened and intensified, although there was very strong opposition during part of the Mission. In both towns where the Midland van has stopped a fortnight this summer the meetings have shown an increasing interest right up to the end. At Dudley the Rev. W. T. Bushrod conducted the meetings. There were small attendances, due, it was suggested, to the unfitness of the site. The van was practically hidden away except from those who were attending the library. The audience was a good one, however, and the effort was appreciated. On Saturday night the Rev. D. J. Evans, who was to preach at Dudley on the Sunday, came to the van, but the neighbourhood was deserted, and no meeting could be held. It was therefore determined to take French leave for Sunday, and try a fresh place that the authorities had declined to sanction. The result was a fine meeting, and its success may persuade the people of Dudley that their Central Market might be allowed for open-air meetings without any danger whatever. In London two series of good meetings were held, one conducted by the Rev. W. R. Shanks at South Tottenham, and the other at Crouch End by the Rev. G. Lansdown; and in Yorkshire there came one of the weeks that the Mission has waited for all the season. The tour was undertaken very largely in accordance with the suggestion that a week at Scarborough would be worth while. But it looked as though the Missioners would have to pass their week in idleness so far as meetings were concerned. Nothing was possible on the Monday and Tuesday. The local papers speak of the grandeur of the high tides and the wildness of the sea front scene; but the vanners feared lest their tiny tabernacle should be overturned in the storm. But on Wednesday matters improved to such an extent that the meeting which was gathering in the school-room was invited to the Aquarium, and a good meeting was held. Thenceforward all was plain sailing. The missionary, the Rev. E. T. Russell, worked hard, and on the Sunday he preached at the chapel in the morning, spoke from the van in the afternoon, and held two meetings at night, the second one being described by local people as "the biggest meeting ever seen at the West Pier." The van then proceeded to Malton, where there is a small congregation, and here, under the leadership of the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, a week's useful meetings were held, the local friends rendering much assistance. The following are the particulars of the Mission:—No. 1 Van, Wales: September 9 to 15, Pontardawe, the Rev. D. G. Rees, the Rev. Simon Jones, Messrs. Davies and Lewis; September 16 to 22, Neath, the Rev. D. G. Rees. No. 2 Van, Midlands: September 9 to 15, Wednesbury (second week), the Rev. W. Clark Lewis, Mr. W. L. Teasdale; September 16 to 22, Dudley, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, the Rev. D. J. Evans. No. 3 Van London: September 9 to 15, South Tottenham, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, Dr. Garnett, Mr. B. Talbot; September 16 to 22, Crouch End, the Rev. G. Lansdown, Mr. B. Talbot. No. 4 Van, Yorkshire: September 9 to 15, Scarborough, the Rev. E. T. Russell, the Rev. J. Wain; September 16 to 22, Malton, the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, Mr. Manning. All communications should be addressed, and contributions sent to the Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Harvest Festivals.—We have received reports of harvest festivals from Bolton, Birmingham (Hurst-street Mission), Crewe, Halstead, and Newport, I.W.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

NINETEENTH INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS AT GENEVA.

A large gathering of pacifists from all parts of the world is now assembled in the Nineteenth Universal Peace Congress at the University at Geneva. This Congress follows immediately upon the Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held in the same place last week. Both are Peace Conferences in a sense, but whilst the Inter-Parliamentary Union represents a more official element making for international good relations, the Peace Congress proper is a more democratic and frankly pacifist gathering. The Congress divides its work amongst six committees, viz., Actualities, Propaganda, International Law, Limitation of Armaments, Education, and Sociology. All manner of questions are discussed in these committees before being brought before the full sessions of the Congress. In addition certain questions are being dealt with more fully by specially designated rapporteurs. Thus, Senator Mechelin, of Finland, is reporting on the causes of wars since 1815 onwards; Dr. Evans Darby on Military Aviation; M. Yves Guyot on Commercial Jealousy and International Relations; and Senator La Fontaine, of Belgium, on the duty of pacifists in a country engaged in a war of conquest. But the chief fact of the Congress is the coming together of hundreds of workers for international peace from all the countries of the world. The mutual intercourse and the suggestions for work which such intercourse offers have many valuable results. Geneva, too, is in a special sense the place for a Peace Congress. Here the Alabama dispute was settled, and many other efforts towards humanising life have arisen, such as the Red Cross. Needless to say the Genevois are giving the Congress a hearty welcome.

THE WORK OF MISS OCTAVIA HILL.

Mr. C. S. Loch, in the first part of an interesting appreciation of Miss Octavia Hill in the Charity Organisation Review, deals specially with her work in connection with house property and the life of the poor. He points out that one of the chief reasons why her schemes were so successful, and productive of good results, was because she built up the home-life of those who became her tenants bit by bit, realising that where so many needs had to be satisfied, "the man, the wife and the children, their dwelling, their habits, and their pleasures must move up together. Not a single line but the net of duty must draw them to a better and completer life. When she became rent-collector and landlady, the children, she saw, wanted places in which to play, the workman and his wife a clean home, and, as far as might be possible, some place or park to which he and his family might resort . . . She wanted the children to play real games and find pleasure in something more than the mere shouting of silly and unmeaning and sometimes ill-meaning words. And for children and grown-up alike she wished other thoughts and desires than the familiar thoughts and desires of poor London courts. Thus many and many a party of tenants went down into the country for the day and received the hospitality of her friends, and thus had an outing in good humour and pleasure without resort to public-houses." The Review also contains an instructive article on Winchester, the twelfth of a series of papers on "Social Conditions in Provincial Towns."

RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL STUDY CIRCLES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

A vigorous effort is being made under the auspices of the Metropolitan Federation of Free Church Councils to form study circles for the purpose of educating young people in social and spiritual questions. A number of meetings have already been held, and it is hoped that the work thus started will develop on permanent lines in connection, at least, with every Free Church Council in the London area. "The object will be," said the Rev. William Thomas, secretary of the Metropolitan Federation to a representative of the Daily News and Leader, "to instruct the young people in social and spiritual questions on scientific lines. The keen interest and enthusiasm, almost bordering on excitement, shown by the young people at our meetings was a revelation. I am sure they are only too eager to know and learn the great spiritual truths and their application to every-day life and needs."

A YEAR'S DEATH SENTENCES IN RUSSIA.

The St. Petersburg Retch recently gave some figures illustrating the "political progress" of Russia during the year which has elapsed since the death of M. Stolypin. No less than 280 death sentences were pronounced by the military courts as against 225 in the previous year, and 105 persons were executed as against 47 in 1910-11. The press had to submit to 301 fines, amounting altogether to £9,202, as against 243, amounting to £6,015 in the previous year. These figures tell their own tale, and they are said to be far from exhaustive as they are based on the reports in the press.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE,

"Summerville," Victoria Park,
MANCHESTER.

Opening of Session 1912-13.

The Opening Address, on "A Neglected Lectionary," will be delivered by the Warden and Tutor, the Rev. H. McLACHLAN, M.A., B.D., in the Library of the College, on Tuesday, 1st October, 1912.

The chair will be taken at 4 o'clock.

Information as to Courses of Lectures by the Principal and Warden may be obtained from the Hon. Secretaries.

P. J. WINSER,
G. A. PAYNE.

Knutsford.

LONGSIGHT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

Appeal and Bazaar Fund, 1912.
Special Effort to Raise £1,250.

A Bazaar and Chrysanthemum Fair to be held November 6, 7, 8 and 9, in the Chorlton Town Hall, Manchester.

In submitting our appeal we have the following objects in view:—

(1) LIQUIDATION OF DEBT.—On certain property belonging to the Church there is a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850. The reduction of £300 has been achieved by the Congregation's own efforts from time to time.

(2) A NEW ORGAN.—We have hitherto struggled to maintain a good musical standard in our services. To this end we have been generously and effectively helped by an unpaid choir and organist. For the continuance of a reasonable efficiency we now require a new organ. The old organ has done splendid service; but it was not new when bought by us, and it has served us 28 years.

(3) RENOVATION AND REPAIRS.—The Church and Schools stand in real need of renovation. They are a splendid and substantial block of buildings, and attention paid to them now will be a genuine economy, likely to be felt for many years to come. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay.

FOR THESE PURPOSES WE DESIRE TO RAISE £1,250.

The appeal is endorsed and supported by the British & Foreign Unitarian Association and the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.

The Congregation and Elder Scholars of the Sunday School have already raised or promised donations amounting to the sum of £300. This is the first public appeal made for over 20 years, the congregation being entirely self-supporting. There are no endowments.

We are, yours faithfully,

B. C. CONSTABLE, Minister, 16, Langdale Road, Victoria Park, Manchester.

JOHN HEYS, President.

DAN BAXTER, Vice-President.

HARRY ANGUS, Chairman of Bazaar Committee.

JOHN CHORLTON, Treasurer, 2, Beresford-road, Longsight, Manchester.

OLIVER H. HEYS, 8, Sunny Bank-road, Longsight, Manchester, Secretary.

CHAS. H. CHORLTON, 38, Ashfield-road, Rusholme, Manchester, Secretary.

Contributions in money or goods will be gratefully acknowledged, and may be sent to Mrs. CONSTABLE, the Treasurer, or to the Secretaries.

Responses to the appeal have been made as under:—

Members of the Congregation ...	£300	0	0
Amount previously acknowledged ...	124	16	0
The Rt. Hon. Sir John Brunner, Bart. ...	25	0	0
Percy H. Leigh, Esq. ...	5	0	0
D. B. ...	2	2	0
W. Haslam, Esq. ...	2	0	0
R. T. Heys, Esq. ...	1	1	0
Sums under £1 ...	1	5	6
The Manchester District Association	30	0	0
The British and Foreign Unitarian Association (conditional upon £1,200 being raised) ...	50	0	0

How To Raise Yourself Above The "Small Pay" Crowd

THE people in the "small pay" crowd rise every morning to face the same routine of monotonous, hopeless toil. They labour long hours for poor pay; do unskilled work; have no responsibility, no freedom, no control over others.

Are you one of the men in that crowd? Are you anxious for higher pay, more responsibility, and more congenial work; to order instead of everlastingly to obey?

You can raise yourself above the crowd if you will. Thousands have done it; so can you. You are as good as they. If you lack anything essential to success, it is TRAINING, and that you can gain with the help of the I.C.S.

To-day it is the trained man who wins, always. But it is no longer necessary to go to school to be trained for a first-class post. The training will come to you at small cost, in your own home. Thousands who to-day hold high positions trained themselves by the I.C.S. way.

The International Correspondence Schools show splendid results in this matter of raising men above the crowd. They have devised a special system of giving a man a practical training in his own home at small cost. The I.C.S. have already helped thousands of men and women to raise themselves above the crowd. They can help you.

The proof of the value of the I.C.S. system of training is found in the attitude of employers toward I.C.S. students. Employers everywhere are on the lookout for I.C.S. Trained Men. Every day the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department receives applications for I.C.S. Trained Men to fill well-paid positions; more such applications, indeed, than they can fill.

What is to prevent you from qualifying yourself for better pay by aid of the I.C.S.? Doubling, perhaps trebling, your earnings £1, or £2, or £3, or £4 more a week? Would not that be useful to you?

In any case, you must admit that I.C.S. Training is worth inquiring about. Such an inquiry has been for thousands the first step to promotion and better pay. Take your first step on the way to Better Pay TO-DAY.

SUCCESS ENQUIRY COUPON

International Correspondence Schools, Ltd.,
Kingsway, London, W.C.

Dept. 4/B45.

Please explain, without any obligation on my part, how I can qualify for Better Pay in the position, trade, or profession, or gain a knowledge of the subject before which I have marked X.

—Commercial Training —Electrical Engineering
—Advertising —Architecture
—Illustrating —Building
—Gas-Power Engineering —Structural Engineering
—Motor Engineering —Chemistry
—Steam Engineering —French, German,
—Mechanical Engineering —Spanish, Italian —Agriculture, Poultry Farming
Over 180 Courses to choose from.

Name

Address

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

PREACHERS:

Sept. 29.—Rev. FRANCIS H. JONES.
(Morning Service only at 11.15, no Evening Service.)

Oct. 6.—Morning 11.15, Evening 7.0. Rev. J. M. CONNELL, of Lewes.

„ 13.—Rev. C. HARGROVE, of Leeds.
Morning and Evening.

„ 20.—Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS, of Bury. Morning only.

„ 27.—Rev. JAMES HARWOOD.
Morning and Evening.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION,

22, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE Society offers to send an efficient Lecturer free of charge to League Meetings, Debating Societies, &c. Autumn and winter engagements should be booked at once.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 133, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTh, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LADY wishes to meet another to share country cottage for few weeks. Expenses from 15s. inclusive.—K. H. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

VERY FINE 3 in. ASTRONOMICAL TELESCOPE, by Steward. The object glass is one of Steward's finest make, mounted on portable iron altazimuth stand, fitted with two slow motions of gun-metal and Hook's joints. Cost £12. Price £6 10s.—Rev. H. V. MILLS, Greenside, Kendal.

INSURANCES EFFECTED: Fire, Life, Burglary, &c. Lowest rates; best offices.—Particulars of E. F. COWLIN, 40, Marler-road, Forest Hill, London.

ARTIFICIAL TEETH (Old) Bought. We pay highest prices in Great Britain. 6d. to 2s. per tooth on vulcanite; up to 2s. 6d. on silver; 4s. 6d. gold; 10s. platinum. Immediate cash, or offrs or teeth returned. Call or post, mentioning INQUIRER.—Messrs. PAGET, the old-established firm, 219, Oxford-st., London. Established 150 years.

ABSOLUTELY FREE!—200 novel Patterns of charming Autumn Blouse material; guaranteed unshrinkable wool, warm, light, colours fast; fascinating designs, looks smart for years.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'Oyleys. Bundle of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, September 28, 1912.

Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3667.
NEW SERIES, No. 771.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations
of Lancashire and Cheshire.

COMMEMORATION

OF THE

250th ANNIVERSARY

OF THE

Ejection of the Two Thousand

TO BE HELD IN

MANCHESTER,

ON

SATURDAY, OCT. 5, 1912.

3.30 p.m. United Service of the Congregations of the Province, in Cross Street Chapel.
Preacher, the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.,
of London.

4.45 p.m. Procession from Cross Street Chapel
to the Memorial Hall, Albert Square.

5.0 p.m. Tea at the Memorial Hall, 6d. each.

6.0 p.m. Meeting at the Memorial Hall, the
President of the Assembly, J. WIGLEY,
Esq., in the Chair. Addresses by the
Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A., "Our Heritage"; JOHN DENDY, Esq. (representing the Memorial Hall Trustees, the
Rev. S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc., "Dissenting Academies"; and the Rev. H.
D. ROBERTS, "The Future of Nonecon-formity."

J. WIGLEY, President.
H. E. DOWSON, B.A. } Hon.
N. ANDERTON, B.A. } Secs.

NOW READY.

42 pp. Fcap. 8vo.

The Provincial Assembly Lecture for 1912,

"The Immanence of God and the Individuality of Man,"

BY

Sir HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt.

6d. net. By post 7d. Quantities 6d. each plus postage.

Messrs. RAWSON & CO., 16, New Brown St., Manchester.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD SESSION 1912-13.

THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD will deliver the OPENING ADDRESS in the COLLEGE, on MONDAY, OCTOBER 14, at 5 p.m. Subject: "The Preacher's Need of Imagination."

A. H. WORTHINGTON, } Secretaries.
HENRY GOW, }

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE UNITED SERVICE will be held in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars,
E.C., on Sunday, October 20, at 7 o'clock.
Preacher, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A. All are heartily welcome.

The Hibbert Journal.

OCTOBER NUMBER NOW READY.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

Democracy and Discipline. L. P. JACKS.
A Nation at School. FRANK ILSLEY PARA-DISE.

A Plea for the Higher Socialism. A. J. FRASER
BLAIR.

The Essence of Religion. The Hon. BERTRAND
RUSSELL.

Modernism and the Protestant Consciousness.
Prof. P. LOBSTEIN.

A Native Fijian on the Decline of his Race.
Translated, with Introduction and Notes, by
A. M. HOCART.

The Pessimism of Bergson. J. W. SCOTT.

Quintilian. A Study in Ancient and Modern Methods of Education. Ethical and Intellectual. Prof. H. A. STRONG, M.A., LL.D.

The Gnostic Redeemer. E. R. BEVAN.

The Daemon Environment of the Primitive
Christian. T. R. GLOVER.

The Future of Judaism in England. M. J.
LANDA.

Social Service. No. 5. French Catholics and Social Work. A Story of a Renaissance.
HENRY V. ARKELL.

With Discussions, Signed Reviews, and Survey of Theological and Philosophical Literature.

Super-royal 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; post free, 2s. 9d.

Subscriptions, which may commence with any number, 10s. per annum, post free.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St.,
Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Provincial Assembly of London

AND

The South-Eastern Counties.

The 24th Annual Meeting of the Assembly will be held at Manchester
College, Oxford, on Tuesday,
8th October, 1912.

The proceedings will be as follows:—

11.45 a.m. Service in the Chapel.

Preacher, the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES,
Ph.D., of Islington. Supported by
Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A., of
London.

1.15 p.m. Luncheon.

4.30 p.m. Annual Business Meeting.
The Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A., President of the Assembly, in the Chair.

6.0 p.m. Tea.

7.0 p.m. Conference.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, D.D., will read a paper on "Citizenship and the Churches."

All the meetings will be held at the College.
No cheap railway tickets are available.

Accommodation will be reserved on the 9.50 a.m. train from Paddington. Return from Oxford, 9.25 p.m.

GORDON COOPER,

Hon. Sec.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEAD-
MASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors.
Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade,
Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.
HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR
BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for
the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing
situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT,
M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss
LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated
Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey,
Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to
the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

L.—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions.
&c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected.
Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff.
Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H.

WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL
WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken
a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate
with their own, ages 3 to 13.

The house stands on the edge of the Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.

They will be assisted by Miss Enid Bran-
son (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.

For illustrated prospectus apply Wester-
main, Chilworth, Surrey.

Elocutionary Entertainments

MR. ALFRED PERRIS is prepared to book engagements for a two hours'
Entertainment, consisting of Dramatic and Poetic Recitals, grave and gay, interspersed with Musical items, vocal and instrumental, by
Miss MAY PERRIS.—For particulars, terms,
&c., address, 135, Padgate-lane, Warrington.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, October 6.

LONDON.

Acton Crestfield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Port-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON; 7, Rev. H. E. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. KENNETH BOND.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Rev. W. H. KING.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, Harvest Services, 11.15 and 7, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL, B.A.; 3, Children's Service, Mr. RONALD BARTRAM, Mr. Russell's Dickens Recital, Hackney Town Hall, Tuesday, at 8.15 p.m.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Rev. F. HANKINSON; 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11, Rev. CHARLES ROPER, B.A.; 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W. Harvest Festival, 11, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.; 3, Miss M. FRANCIS; 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11, Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.; 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A. Scholars' Service at 3, Mr. ION PRITCHARD.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, Harvest Festival, Services at 11, 3 (Children), and 6.30, Rev. D. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. W. H. KING; 6.30, Mr. A. D. BECKWITH.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 2/B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. J. WILSON; 7, Rev. W. H. ROSE.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.

BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. L. TUCKER, B.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.)
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. C. BOWIE.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Totteth, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. A. HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Schoolroom adjoining Unity Church, Higher-terrace, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTH.

THORNHILL.—On September 29, to the Rev. Albert and Mrs. Thornhill, at Brookfield Parsonage, Gorton, a daughter.

DEATH.

HALL.—October 2, at Sandal Grange, Wakefield, aged 86 years, Elizabeth Byfield Hall, elder daughter of the late John Hall, of Manchester.

PULPIT SUPPLY.

Rev. R. H. MAISTER is open to supply.—Address, 17, Devonshire-street, Ardwick, Manchester.

SUPPLIES are invited for the Theistic Church pulpit pending the appointment of a successor to the late Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY.—Address, The SECRETARY, The Theistic Church, Swallow-street, Piccadilly, W.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

CHAPERONE wanted to go out on Saturdays, and maybe some other times in the week, with two girls attending a College in West Hampstead.—Apply, stating particulars and references, to B. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

ACCOUNTANT, MANAGER, CASHIER, &c.—E. F. COWLIN (Secretary National Unitarian Temperance Association) seeks position as above. Experienced and energetic.—Address, 40, Marler-road, Forest Hill, S.E.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

NOTICE.

Readers who experience difficulty in obtaining THE INQUIRER locally will greatly oblige by communicating with the Publisher, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	8	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	659	Social Study Circles	664	The Welsh School of Social Service	667
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT:—		Acontius	665	Unitarian Home Missionary Colleges	667
Light	660	The Hymns of Dr. George Matheson	665	Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association	668
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—		Literary Notes	665	The Social Movement	668
Hymns and their Writers.—IV.	661	Publications Received	665	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	669
CORRESPONDENCE:—		FOR THE CHILDREN:—		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	670
Death and Survival	661	The Monkey and the Angel	665
The Wonder of Life	664	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—
		The Peace Congress	666

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Church Congress was opened at Middlesborough on Tuesday. The programme is a long and elaborate one, but the problem of social unrest, which occupied a large part of the presidential address by the Archbishop of York, is the dominating issue. The address itself was in many ways a remarkable advance upon the timid churchmanship, deeply tinged with conservative habits of thought, of even a few years ago. It recognised that beneath all unrest there is the movement of a true and right ambition to better the conditions of individual life. It condemned plainly and sternly the selfishness and luxury which are responsible for the bitterness of discontent. It refused to make any terms with the squalor and misery which destroy all chance of living a worthy human life; and it laid it down as a principle that the first charge upon any trade or industry should be a wage for its workers which makes decent living possible, that a trade or industry which cannot pay such a wage cannot justify its existence, and that the community has no right to make use of its services.

* * *

THE Bishop of Oxford went a step further in the direction of practical reform, and urged that the problem of the country villages was a part of the social field where the Church had special duties and opportunities. The clergy could assist and encourage the formation and the spread of an Agricultural Labourers' Union, which would make it possible to find out whether the labourer under present conditions of land tenure and agriculture could be paid a wage which would enable him to pay an economic rent for a decent house as well as to support himself and his family on sufficient food, and, if not, how the living wage, which was the labourer's right, was to be provided. We fear, however, that Dr. Gore must first educate the clergy. With the growing sacerdotalism of the Church of England it is fatally easy for men to immerse themselves in a conventional round of ecclesiastical duties; while their traditional instincts and sympathies make them the political allies of the land-owning classes instead of the champions of the poor. The country clergy have many virtues, but courage and independence and a revolutionary passion for justice are not conspicuous among them.

* * *

AN important memorial on the subject of Biblical Revision has been issued by a group of well-known scholars, including Dr. J. Rendel Harris, Professor Bennett, Principal Carpenter, Dr. G. Buchanan Gray, Dr. James Moffatt, Professor J. H. Moulton, and Professor Peake. The defects of the Revised Version are recognised very clearly, but it is pointed out that the present is not an opportune moment for further revision. This opinion is based upon a careful review of the uncertainty of many problems connected with the text, both of the Old and the New Testament, the light which has been thrown upon them by recent discoveries, and the expectation that several years must elapse before the new material can be sifted. It appears premature, they say, to undertake, at present, a revision which might be left behind in a short time by the advance of knowledge.

* * *

THE memorial concludes with the following strong plea for thoroughness:—"Under no circumstances should a revision be undertaken of an inadequate or superficial character. Whatever is done should be done by carrying the correction of the text, in both Testaments, to the full extent of our present light and knowledge. In this way we believe that the most lasting results may be obtained, and the hold of the Bible on the affections of the English-speaking peoples would be most likely to be perpetuated."

* * *

THE need of personal service was the keynote of the Annual Conference of the National Union of Women Workers which has been held at Oxford this week. In the course of her opening address, the President, Mrs. Allen H. Bright, pointed out that by the way of violence lasting reforms were rarely effected. They indulged, she said, in facile sneers at the dull decorum of a past generation, but would not future generations find cause of derision in our restlessness, our discontent, and want of reticence? The two most harmful influences in the life of the nation to-day were pessimism and the gradual extinction of that self-control which was once regarded as a specially British virtue. The best antidote for this moral malaria was to be found in the cultivation of the duty of personal service.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

LIGHT.

BY THE LATE REV. E. P. BARROW, M.A.

"This is the message which we have heard from him, and announce unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all."—1 JOHN i. 5.

It is to St. John that we owe the three sublime utterances; God is Spirit; God is Love; God is Light—God is Spirit in the Gospel; God is Love, and God is Light in this first Epistle. They tell all that can be told of the nature of God. They are simple, yet profound; Spirit, Love, Light.

I. God is Light. Out of that one word spring many thoughts. First, the thought of purity. There is nothing so pure as light. It may be dimmed, but it cannot be defiled. It touches all things, but is changed by none. It is, indeed, so pure that to us it is invisible. Pure light we never see; only as colour. There is pure light streaming across the sky on the darkest night. We do not see it, for there is nothing to reflect it, but it is there.

What an apt image, then, of the purity of Him in whose sight the very heavens are not clean; whom no man hath seen, or can see; dwelling in light unapproachable. It is from light too that we gain the thought of glory. That which is glorious is full of light. There is glory in the dawn and in a sunset; in the shining of the sea, and of the snow; in the flash of lightning, in the sparkle of a gem. It is only by the glory of light that we can picture to ourselves the splendour of Him before whom Angels stand, though angels of light, with faces veiled. It is by light that we measure, so far as we measure at all, rapid self-diffusion. Light is said to travel at the rate of 190,000 miles in a second. Compare this, if you can, with the travelling of sound at the rate of some 1,000 feet per second. It is the only aid we have to the imagining of that diffusiveness by which God is present everywhere, radiates Himself into all things, so that in Him we live, and move, and have our being. Light, again, is closely connected in our minds with joy. Light and happiness run together in a bright day, a bright look, a bright smile. Light, moreover, is linked in our thoughts with life, movement, growth, action. It is light that wakes the song of birds, and sends man forth to his labour until the evening. It is light that stirs and leads the rising sap, calls forth energy, revives hope, stimulates activity, rewards success, measures the seasons in their course, the lapse of ages, and the work allotted to man. And lastly, light is but another name with us for knowledge. It is light that makes clear. Without it, we have eyes, but see not. Ignorance and knowledge are always to the thinking mind as night and day. We say, then, that God is light, for He is the source of all those emanations of Himself which we know as beauty and glory in the physical world, truth in the intellectual world, holiness and happiness in the spiritual world. And yet how poor and inadequate is this image of light, if by light we mean the light of sun or moon or star! For they are not spirit, nor are they love. They are but subtle forms of matter, finite, created, unconscious, unprogressive, cold. They are but gleams and reflections, and no more than parables, of that uncreated light, the light of the Spirit, the true light which throbs with intensity of thought and purpose, and affection and will.

II. We have thought of God Himself as light. Let us think of His word—His written word—as light. Thy word, says David, is a lantern unto my feet. What a change is this, and how significant a change! We pass from the light that fills the heavens to the light of a little flame shut up in a lantern, carried in the hand. And that is what Scripture is, a candle of the Lord—a little tongue of fire caught up and screened out of the impenetrable mysteries which surround us on every side; a ray or two of that revelation, that fuller manifestation, hereafter to be given; throwing but little light on the surrounding gloom, but carried in the hand, with stooping, searching eye, enough to guide the feet from step to step. This is all that Scripture is, and all that it need be—a lantern unto the feet.

III. But there is also a light within. It is more than the light of a word; it is the light of a portrait. God, says one of the apostles, hath shined in our hearts in the face of Jesus Christ. Surer and more constant than the pillar of luminous cloud by day, than the pillar of fire by night, more illuminating than the flashes which encircled Sinai, more wonderful than the light which played upon the breastplate of the high priest, and even nearer than the light which filled the temple on the day of dedication, is the light which shines in the heart, in the living face—the living character, the perfected example—of the beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased. Of him it was said in childhood that he should be a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of the people Israel. Of himself he could say: "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." There was a day when even his bodily presence seemed to be transfigured before them, and his garments became glistening, exceeding white; so as no fuller on earth can whiten them. One, to whom was afterwards given a vision of the city of God, told how he saw no sun therein, neither moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb. It is pleasant to think of the impartiality of light, of its power to meet all wants, to adapt itself to all dimensions. As the light of the sun shines as brightly on a cottage-floor as on a marble pavement, so the light which glows in the heart of a child is the light which fills all heaven with its rays.

IV. Can you wonder, then, that all sons of God are exhorted to be children of light? "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead and Christ shall shine upon thee"; "Ye are all sons of light, and sons of the day"; "Ye were once darkness, but are now light in the Lord: walk as children of light." "Ye, too," said Jesus, "are the light of the world; let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works." The children of this world might in their generation be wiser than the children of light—more shrewd, more successful, as the world counts success—but, when their generation had passed away, the day would come when the righteous would shine forth as the sun. St. Paul takes up the same thought when he writes to the Philippian converts: "That ye may be blameless and harmless, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom ye are seen as lights in the world."

V. And now, lastly, I think you will see why it is that, whilst St. John speaks of God as light, his brother apostle speaks of Him as the Father of lights. "Every good gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation"—as with the stars of heaven—"neither shadow that is cast by turning." It is only by the giving of Himself that we know God, and it is only by the breaking, the refraction, of light into lights, through the word, through the beloved Son, through saintly lives, through some medium, that we are able to bear that light which is Himself. For that light is unendurable to mortal eye, too dazzling for mortal thought, too boundless even for mortal affection. God meets us only so far as we can receive Him. If the sun in the sky came nearer, we should be consumed; if he went further away we should die of cold; even as it is, though we bask in his warmth and rejoice in his light, and have some 95 millions of miles to soften their effect, we cannot gaze upon his fiery flames for more than a moment at a time. So God in Himself is that before which neither sight, nor thought, nor even rapture can stand. Well might the prophet say that before Him, in the fulness of His strength, all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree; and well might the later seer, the beloved disciple, borrowing his thought, tell how, when he beheld, lo, the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind, and the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. That is nature's recoil—sun and moon and earth, and the hosts of heaven—and there is that in man which shuns and dreads the light and falls away before it, and even loves darkness rather than light, because its deeds are evil; but there is that also which is itself light, carried indeed in earthen vessels, and blown about by winds of error and passion, but still light of that light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Where it shines there is holiness and joy and truth. Where it shines, there fear is not. In what contrast to the words of prophet and divine stands that picture which Christ drew in his warning yet hopeful words, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lamps burning; and be ye yourselves like unto men looking for their Lord."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

IV.

"I look to Thee in every need."

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

SAMUEL was twelve years younger than his brother of wider fame, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and he was himself a poet at heart and a writer of charming verses. With Whittier and Hosmer in America, and J. H. Gill in this country, he is one of those who have made the largest contributions to our wealth of modern hymns. While his brother was poet and man of letters and professor of Literature at Harvard, Samuel was a Unitarian minister, though for only fifteen of his more than seventy years in charge of congregations. He was a man of somewhat delicate health, a bachelor, who for a good many years made his home with his brother at Cambridge. Several years also he spent in European travel. Thus, in 1868, he was staying, in the course of his journeyings, at Shanklin in the Isle of Wight, and tells of a most interesting afternoon and evening spent with Tennyson at Farringford.

He was born at Portland, Maine, June 18, 1819, in the same year as Charles Kingsley, Gill and J. R. Lowell, and died at Cambridge, Mass., in 1892, ten years after his brother Henry, whose life he wrote. It was from 1853 to 1860 that he was minister at Brooklyn, the second and longest of the pastorates he held. A tablet to his memory, in the church there, speaks of him as "a man of gentle nature, liberal culture, loving heart. A faithful preacher and pastor, earnest in reform, the friend of little children. A poet of religion, he gave us many perfect songs of hope and cheer."

The Longfellow's father was a classmate and friend of Channing's, and it was in 1842, the year of Channing's death, that Samuel became a student for the ministry. While at the Harvard Divinity School he became the close friend of his fellow-student Samuel Johnson, also a writer of hymns and afterwards co-editor with him of two hymn-books; and these two, under the influence of Emerson and Theodore Parker, were led into new paths of thought, and became pioneers of that broader spiritual faith which is now the common possession of the progressive churches of many lands. Their first "Book of Hymns," published in 1846, and revised, with a supplement added, in 1848, was used by Parker at his Music Hall services in Boston, and after Parker's death, while Longfellow was living at Cambridge, he once preached for a whole year for that society. I remember Dr. Martineau once telling me, that of all the American ministers he had met (and many came to him in his Liverpool and London homes) it was to Samuel Longfellow that he had felt the most strongly drawn.

His was a life most unassuming, quiet and uneventful, making its influence felt not by strenuous activity in public affairs nor by prominent leadership, but by the force of a pure, unselfish goodness, a wonderful quickness of sympathy, a deep and fervent faith—not expressed in many words, but often by his simple presence in the natural offices of unaffected friendship. While his regular pastorates covered only so few years of his life, wherever he went to preach the fragrance of his piety and the remembrance of a most helpful and quickening presence seem to have lingered. With more vigorous health he might have accomplished more actual work, but he could hardly have left a deeper impression of the meaning and power of genuine religion in a beautiful and gracious spirit.

His hymns remain with us, a beautiful memorial of his life, hymns of rejoicing faith in the living God, the holy, all-pervading Spirit, Goodness and Love eternal, the inward Enlightener and Source of all inspiration, through the growing experience of the ages. Among the best known are: "Holy Spirit, Truth divine," "God of ages and of nations," "One holy Church of God appears," the vesper hymns "Again as evening's shadow falls," and "Now on land and sea descending," and that joyous anniversary hymn, "O Life, that maketh all things new." A good number of Longfellow's own hymns appeared in the second book the two friends brought out together, "Hymns of the Spirit," 1864, and among them this, which brings us very near to the heart of his own personal trust:—

I look to Thee in every need,
And never look in vain;
I feel Thy strong and tender love,
And all is well again;
The thought of Thee is mightier far
Than sin and pain and sorrow are.

Discouraged in the work of life,
Disheartened by its load,
Shamed by its failures or its fears,
I sink beside the road,—
But let me only think of Thee,
And then new heart springs up in me.

Thy calmness bends serene above,
My restlessness to still;
Around me flows Thy quickening life,
To nerve my faltering will;
Thy presence fills my solitude;
Thy providence turns all to good.

Embosomed deep in Thy dear love,
Held in Thy law, I stand;
Thy hand in all things I behold,
And all things in Thy hand;
Thou leadest me by unsought ways,
And turn'st my mourning into praise.

There is throughout a sense of the Divine Presence, strong and tender, and of rest in the Eternal, a secret, true communion of the spirit, the very thought of which brings back strength and courage in every need. With God that truth is found; His law is but the ordered way of love. Every hard thing, even through the bitterest tragedies of human destiny, can be interpreted, and must be interpreted, in the light of the unchanging purpose of good. Over all, and in all, the Grace Divine is the Giver of life, and the quickener of joy. That was the truth the gentle spirit of Samuel Longfellow had found and delighted to declare.

When he came back from the funeral of his brother Henry to the congregation he was then serving at Germantown, on the outskirts of Philadelphia, he preached a sermon on "Life, not Death," which, he said, was not an argument, but a message. "I bring this message," he said, "that we could stand by the lifeless body, so soon to be put out of our sight, so soon to perish, and yet have no sense of death, no feeling of mortality; lifted up, in a way that seemed inexplicable, even beyond grief and sorrow, into a peaceful and happy calm, as if a serene and cheerful presence were filling all the room, the presence as of one who had laid aside all sickness and all sorrow, and was himself in the fulness of life released from limitations. . . . The word that I bring to you to-day is this, that the soul knows nothing of death, cannot conceive of it. That to all doubts and questions of the understanding it returns only the affirmations of its experience and inmost sense of immortality. It cannot believe in any death but that of the body; nor in that death as anything but a release of the real life into new conditions. The understanding may doubt, but the soul affirms; the understanding may gather proofs and arguments, but the soul already knows. 'Demonstration in its own province is supreme, but there are times when argument is silent before the deep, incommunicable assurances of the soul.'"

In that sermon he spoke also of their thankfulness for the life which had been so long with them, "the life blameless and unstained; the life so full of genial activities and faithful use of faculties and talents committed to it; so full of kindly affections and wide sympathies and helpful friendliness; of gentle courtesy and charitable judgments; of broad humanity and simple, sincere, unobtrusive piety." Such words, in which he spoke of his elder brother, we may fitly use of the younger, and let their pleasant, gracious associations gather for us about the hymns of Samuel Longfellow.

V. D. D.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DEATH AND SURVIVAL.

SIR,—In attempting to express in the columns of THE INQUIRER a few somewhat scattered and disconnected thoughts on the subject of "Death and Survival," nothing was further from my intention than to invite discussion or to provoke controversy.

A perusal of the letters which have appeared in your columns since the publication of my article shows the discussion to have taken very different directions. On the one hand we have Mr. Shrubsole, who would have us regard the belief in immortality as a survival of the thought of primitive man in whom it took its rise "out of original mental defect," and which has retained its vitality to the present day partly through imitation and partly through similar mental defect, or, in other words, as a base and ignorant superstition, not worthy of the thought of cultured peoples. On the other hand, Mr. Mulleneux fails to understand why the question should be raised at all, seeing that, in his opinion, the problem has been solved once and for good by the great seer Swedenborg. Well, of course, Swedenborg may be right; but, while quite open to conviction, I feel that, personally, I have no means of coming to a decision.

With regard to the contention of Mr. Shrubsole, it seems to me that the particular source from which the conception of immortality took its rise is of little moment. Is it not rather the Idea which is of real importance, for great creative ideas are immortal, and once projected into the world exercise an abiding influence over human thought. Philosophies and theories may disappear in the gulf of time, but the old ideas remain on, interpenetrating and influencing new conceptions. As Professor Dawes Hicks says, the "validity of a conception is one thing, the origin or genesis of that conception is quite another." But, we are asked, why continue the fruitless discussion if we always come out at the same door at which we went in? Kant, however, said, "What is the use of pretending indifference to that about which it is impossible for us to be indifferent?"—I quote from memory; and surely the most matter-of-fact mind must occasionally have borne in upon it an overwhelming sense of the mystery of existence, and see things, if but for a fleeting moment, "sub specie æternitatis." With regard to such a question as that under discussion all dogmatism is out of place, and rationalism divorced from imagination appears to many of us to be but the other side of superstition.

Mr. Howard, in his interesting letter, raises many important and difficult questions. As to the question of consciousness, we may, I think, regard consciousness as a form of knowledge, and thus, while consciousness in the concrete and that which may survive would be identical in essence, yet the knowledge which forms the content of consciousness might be totally different when the latter is translated to a fresh plane of existence. It seems to me also quite impossible to point to any particular stage in the evolution of life and say, "Here consciousness begins," just as it is equally impossible to draw any strict line of demarcation between the living and that which we term lifeless and say, "Here life begins." All life, all consciousness would in the last analysis appear to be one, and if we grant immortality to man it is difficult to see why it should not be conceded to other and lower forms of life. Indeed, is it not a sign of man's arrogance that he should arrogate to himself the highest form of consciousness? The planet on which he finds himself is but a dust mote suspended in the depths of space, and there is surely room in the universe for other forms of being as far transcending man in organisation as man transcends the amoeba. We know that our conscious life is but part of a deeper, more profound life. It may be likened to the ripples on the surface of a deep pool, the abysmal depths of which are untroubled by the movements which ruffle its surface. What says Tennyson:—

If thou would'st hear the Nameless, and descend
Into the Temple-cave of thine own self,
Then, brooding by the central altar, thou
May'st haply learn the Nameless hath a voice,
By which thou wilt abide, if thou be wise;
For knowledge is the swallow on the lake,
That sees and stirs the surface shadow there,
But never yet hath dipt into the Abyss.

While, then, consciousness may persist, are we necessarily bound to think of it as persisting in the same form? It may be true that a future without personal identity spells annihilation in so far as our being is conditioned by present conditions, but may we not look forward to an expansion of consciousness in which all sense of separateness, all idea of individuality is lost? Perhaps it is partly due to the very necessity of our being that we are obsessed by the idea of individuality, yet to some there comes a longing to be rid not only of selfishness but of self, and to merge their individuality in a larger and better whole, a state which has been called "the attraction of the Abyss."

I would maintain that of direct evidence for immortality there is none, and belief in survival after death must in the last analysis be translated into a pure act of faith. It is not through the reason that we may find evidence for the faith which is in us, but rather through the promptings of an intuitional sense by means of which in certain states of mental exaltation we are brought nearer to the heart of things, and learn to realise that oneness which embraces and includes all, and which is All. This intuition is regarded by the mystics as an inner spiritual sense opening, as it were, inwardly as the physical senses open outwardly, and giving the capacity to perceive and know the truth independently of all external sources of information.

The simple teaching of Jesus has ever been obscured by the doctrines and dogmas of the Church, but signs are not wanting of the advent of a new Reformation which shall inaugurate the birth of a more mystical and spiritual religion. How many even to-day realise the significance of the Master's words: "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, Lo here or lo there. For behold, the kingdom of God is within you." "Learn of me," Jesus said; and to be as He was, to live as He lived, that is the kingdom of God, that is eternal life.—Yours, &c.

EDMOND JOHN HUNT.

Hampstead, September 21, 1912.

SIR,—In my monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason, entitled "The Essential Man," I lay down as a principle that a fact consistent with both of two opposing theories is of no weight in the decision between them. This applies, I think, to the question of Mr. Hocart. If one regard the mind or soul as simply the product of the physical organism, "the rainbow on the cloud," then it is inevitable that the mind should be influenced by the bodily condition; in fact, should entirely correspond with it. If, on the other hand, the soul and body be regarded as distinct in nature, but closely conjoined and correlated for the time, the inference is no less cogent that mental states must be affected by the physical condition. The really surprising fact, indeed, is the frequent apparent independence of mental activities and their marked influence, in turn, on physical states. The gradual failure of mental faculties which sometimes accompanies the decline of physical powers, or, I think more exactly, inability to use these faculties, is precisely what would be expected on either hypothesis, and is no argument in support of the materialistic theory.

I have at times observed somewhat extensively this class of phenomena in those of extreme age, and I have noticed that failure is most of all in connection with such mental perceptions and activities as depend largely on the use of the physical senses, and in some cases, of course, such activities form a large part of the apparent mentality. The more significant fact, however, was that the more purely mental processes seemed—if not always as extensive—as clear and vigorous as ever, even to great age. Memory tends to fail, frequently at a comparatively early age, through various causes; but the chief cause in old age is, I think, not a partial loss of the faculty in itself, but the habit of less attention to common events which is a result of waning physical vigour. As children we are keen in observation, engrossed in detail; these abide in the mind and often recur in various ways in the lives of the aged. As adults, too, we prefer general principles to details, so that we discipline and test memory the less.

Mr. Hocart speaks of "the increasing disbelief." No doubt there has been such increase during the past forty years—that this is the fact during the last decade or two is not so evident. We may say this at least: since men now everywhere receive beliefs less through tradition and think more for themselves, there is naturally more disbelief, and also more belief in the true sense, more rational conviction. So far as disbelief is caused by observation of the mutual dependence of mind and body, it is the result more of impression than of thought. In fact, in my judgment materialism in all its phases comes more from materialistic impression men constantly receive amid the scenes of life, especially if thought be absorbed in this sphere, than through argument or reasoning. No view of the world is so untenable logically as so-called philosophic materialism, which, of course, is not, as some seem to think, a scientific theory, but purely metaphysical.

On this great question dogmatism is out of place—except, perhaps, that we may be justly somewhat dogmatic, at least rigorous, in criticising those who appear to think that their view alone represents rational thought, especially when this view has little respect for the instincts and aspiration of humanity.—Yours, &c.,

GEO. CROSWELL CRESSEY.

Streatham, S.W.,

September 23, 1912.

SIR,—The candid expression of opinion by the Rev. James Hocart deserves acknowledgment. It shows that the problem of the future life is not so simple as it once looked. To the ardour of youth extinction seems unthinkable, but with age and reflection more sober thoughts arise. I have seen it stated somewhere that Longfellow, who wrote "The Psalm of Life," doubted the immortality of the soul at the close of his days. And yet it is as one who feels the years slipping away that I would venture to add a few thoughts to this entrancing problem. Life is too wonderful a thing to be put aside even in thought.

The problem Mr. Hocart sets doesn't trouble me. I don't know what becomes of the soul in sleep, yet I know it wakes up again, and I should want to know the condition of his aged friend's soul during those years of weakness from the inside instead of from the outside observer's position before I answered the question. I have come to the conclusion that there is no such thing as old life, although we have old bodies. In other words, the soul is not like a cloud, which becomes attenuated as it discharges vapour until it finally disappears. But rather like a perennial stream which flows for a while above ground, may meet with tortuous courses, and finally disappear below the surface. If that be so, then the failure of the bodily mechanism, by which alone the soul can express itself, must not be regarded as equivalent to the extinction of the spirit. Life is as new to the aged as to the child, but its powers of expression wane and finally cease. The rest must be conjecture, but we need not predicate extinction. On the contrary, the quality of newness, which I have ventured to claim for it, is an argument for persistence.

The theory that the permanence of the individual life must depend upon memory or the sense of continuity, though very strong, is, I think, not convincing; at least I find that I can do without it. Large tracts of life are forgotten or grow dim during our existence here. We cannot recreate their joy or their agony. Where shall we limit the line of forgetfulness? Moreover, are there not moments when simply to exist supplies the fullest joy, when memory or anticipation would only cloud the rapture of the present? And is not God the Everlasting Now to whom the past and the future are not? We should be the same individuals, though without any recollection of the past, if the bias or character of our spirits was the result of our preceding lives. A sense of environment would constitute individuality. This argument is perhaps more suggestive of Indian than Christian doctrine, but that does not militate against its truth. Perhaps this presentation of the case may not be regarded as scientific, but I venture to think it has a true psychical basis. Then the religious mind can surely go a step further. If we believe in communion with God, not through artificial sacraments, but by interpenetration of natures, may we not ask ourselves, will God destroy that which loves Him and which He loves? How can that which is united by love to the Eternal Reality be the sport of decaying elements? May we not approach this question best from the Godward rather than the manward side?

Some are inclined to think that apart from the story of the resurrection, there is little in the gospels about the future life, but the words of Jesus seem to me full of hints.

His likeness of death to sleep: can we better it? And then the teaching that in heaven they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels. Divest it of all Jewish eschatological significance, and what still remains? The teaching that in a future state human relations are transcended, the soul is occupied with larger affections, and life is spent in doing the will of the Eternal. Is this prospect too great for many to appreciate it? Still there seems plenty of reason for trusting the future, and to say with Whittier

And so beside the silent sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from Him can come to me,
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.

In arguing on this matter in terms of philosophy instead of life, I think we are apt to go astray.—Yours, &c.,

E. CAPLETON.

113, Highbury New Park, London, N.,
September 23, 1912.

SIR,—The letters which have appeared in THE INQUIRER lately under this head have been very interesting to me, for though only a layman, I have been studying this question now for 35 years, and 23 of those from a psychical standpoint. It may be interesting if I state the position I have come to take in relation to it.

For several years I accepted all the arguments advanced by theologians as to our survival, and thought them complete. But as my mind began to work itself free from the bonds of set beliefs, I soon began to have grave doubts on the subject. The point brought out so clearly by Mr. Hocart, and which one sees working all around him, was one insurmountable difficulty. Then the lapse of consciousness in swoons, under anæsthetics, in sound sleep, during accidents that affected special nerve centres, especially the brain; and the fact that during long comatose states, as, for instance, the two years of unconsciousness of Thomas Cooper's mason, who on recovery remembered only what he was doing at the time of accident, &c., all of which are bad to reconcile with any belief in a mind or soul separate from the body, or any thinking entity outside the nervous organism. During that period, the argument mentioned by your able correspondent Laura G. Ackroyd didn't appeal to me much. I had come across it in Plato's Dialogues as an argument used by Socrates; but it surprised me that such acute minds could advance it, because it appeared to me to break down exactly where it ought to hold. If you compare the Ego or Soul, or real Man, say, to a musician, and the body to an instrument, for it to be of any real worth the analogy should hold good at the vital point, which this doesn't. A musician always is conscious that he can play, if only the instrument is put right; but man is not self-conscious that he can speak if, or when, his bodily defect or injury is repaired. Why? If the Ego is associated with the thinking and apperceptive faculties, and does not necessarily depend upon the brain cells to be conscious of its ability or capacity, man should be conscious all the time; but since we know from invariable experience that he is not, Socrates' argument has no weight, so far as I can see, unless there is something in man not disclosed by any study of this aspect of man's self-conscious states.

In the early part of 1886 Frederic Myers developed a new idea on this matter which the late Prof. Wm. James calls the greatest discovery ever made in psychology. The gist of it is, that the consciousness previously and always in theology and metaphysics associated with our sense of personal identity, which is our normal consciousness, and which we see interrupted in dreams, swoons, or accidents to the brain, &c., is not our only stream of consciousness; but below, or outside it, there is another which he called subliminal, and which is the greater and associated with the metamaterial and spiritual world, and in which resides the immortal principle in man. After some years of close study of all Myers's arguments I became convinced that Myers had made out his case—that hypnosis, unknown to our forefathers, had disclosed to us a deeper and more complete stream of consciousness and memory than we suspected; and therefore my old difficulty vanished. (Those who want to follow his argument should consult Myers's "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death.")

For some little time, however, a new difficulty has arisen, and if any of your readers can help me I shall be glad. Dr. Hollander, in his "Mental Functions of the Brain," which is founded upon many hundreds of clinical cases, gives cases where a part of the brain was carried away by accident, the men afterwards living and regaining good health, but minus the faculties now known to be associated with the parts of the missing brain which they never afterwards recovered. Now, in all the cases analysed by Myers and which I have read in the reports from Hypnotic Hospitals, I have not found any in which the brain has been partly destroyed. What I want to know, therefore, is, does anyone know of any similar case in which a part of the brain having been permanently lost, the individual being subjected to hypnosis, it was afterwards found that the functions and memory physiologically associated with parts lost still showed themselves? If such a case cannot be produced, it is possible, after all, that Myers's subliminal self meant only the resuscitating into life or expression of impressions made upon the cell-life of the brain, but which ordinarily do not come to the surface. Should this view be correct, then Mr. Hunt might be right after all; and personally, I feel I should have to give up any feeling of certainty about it, and repose my soul again in the belief of Emerson, so beautifully expressed at the end of his "Threnody."

Meanwhile, Professor Hicks's advice, "No dogmatism," is best.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED ROWE,

Hon. Gen. Sec., Newcastle-on-Tyne
Psychical Research Society.

196, Portland-road,
Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sept. 30, 1912.

SIR,—I am very grateful to Miss Laura G. Ackroyd and to Dr. Dawes Hicks for so kindly contributing to the solution of the difficulty which troubles me. I agree perfectly that gaps or pauses in our consciousness do not militate against the continued existence of the soul. Dreamless sleep, swoons, &c., leave us no doubt on this point. But my difficulty begins with the hypothesis that something similar to our present losses and recoveries of consciousness may happen in the stage of bodily death.

Of course the difficulty would not exist if, according to the system adopted by Miss Ackroyd, it could be shown that the soul "possesses and informs the body" and retains a constant mastery over it. But, alas! facts tend to the conclusion that the mind is dependent on the body, and that lapses and returns of consciousness are determined by the varying states of the body. I have two or three times swooned away suddenly, and on recovering consciousness have been quite surprised to find myself lying on the floor. The lapse of consciousness was due to suspended action of the heart, and recovery to a renewed action of the heart. If it had not started again, as often happens, consciousness would not have returned, and onlookers, perceiving no sign of it, would have pronounced me dead. I know a lady in Brussels who has been lying in a state of unconsciousness for several weeks. I am informed by her son, who is a medical man, that this insensibility is caused by clots of blood in a part of the brain. If the clots could be reabsorbed, consciousness might return; but this seems impossible, and, as no physical change is expected, unconsciousness will remain to the last. The same influence of the body on the mind is evident in sleep, in the use of anæsthetics, in accidents, &c.

Now, since the variations of mind-consciousness are so intimately connected with the variations of the body, are we warranted in concluding from recoveries of consciousness while the body is living, that there is a possible return of consciousness after the body is dead? Is not the argument endangered by the complete change in the condition of the body? This is the serious difficulty which we must face in our attempts to allay the painful conflict between our rational and spiritual aspirations to a future life and the facts of experience which seem to unite body and soul in one single and perishable organism.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HOCART,

Brussels, September 29, 1912.

THE WONDER OF LIFE.

SIR,—I find myself credited by Dr. Tayler in last week's INQUIRER with two definitions of science because I said that science ends in mystery, and that science is not the enemy of religion. These statements may or may not be true, but neither of them is in any sense a definition of science. It sounds odd, not to say a little perverse, when Dr. Tayler describes the statement that all science ends in mystery as a "kitchen definition," reducing science to an affair of bread and butter. I was, of course, not thinking of the usefulness of science when I made that rather commonplace remark, but of the fact that the result of all true scientific research is to lead men into the unknown, and to give them a feeling of the wonder and mystery of the Universe.

As to Professor Schäfer's introductory words about life not being identical with soul, it did not impress me as meaning that he wished to emphasise his belief in the soul apart from the body. I may be wrong, but I understood it as meaning that he had nothing to do with what religious people call the soul. It may be a fancy or a fact, but in any case I am not going to say anything about it. My business is with Life. This is what I thought his words suggested, not any kind of assertion, positive or negative, as to the reality of the soul.

However, this is merely a matter of interpretation. The interesting point in Dr. Tayler's letter is that he himself does draw a very sharp distinction between Life and the Soul, and that he does this, as he believes, in the interest of religion and of the soul. If I understand him rightly, he maintains that life is the product of matter, and that the disintegration of the one means the disintegration of the other; but the soul is an independent entity in some way inserted in matter.

The question naturally arises, if the soul is from the first quite independent of matter and of life, when did the soul come in? Was it placed in the body at birth, or before birth, or later? If the soul is something absolutely distinct, then it must, as it were, have been inserted in a living body by a special act of God at a particular moment, or have taken possession of a living body by its own free will. This is a problem which the Schoolmen liked to discuss, and it is a problem which the Theosophists of our day think they can partially answer. The soul is a reincarnation in new flesh and surroundings. It comes in from the outside and takes up its dwelling place in an infant body. It is not implicit in matter or in life, the final triumphant end of matter and of life.

Of course, the soul, or, as I should prefer to call it, the conscious self, "must be studied," as Dr. Tayler says, "independently of but related to the study of matter." I am surprised to hear that scientists are only "beginning" to realise this. All true psychology must be mainly a study of self-consciousness. No one can tell what is in man by elaborate physiological or genetic investigations. It is self-consciousness and reflection which reveal man to himself.

But when you discuss origins self-consciousness is not enough. There are three answers to that question of origins. First, the answer of the materialist, that self-consciousness is the transitory result of the chemical combination of atoms, which dies when they separate. Secondly, the answer, if I understand him, of Dr. Tayler, that self-consciousness is due to a soul which is perfectly independent: something thrust into matter, something added on to life, not growing out of life, not the highest fulfilment of life. Thirdly, there is the answer of those who say that out of what is called matter, in certain pre-ordained conditions, there issues life; and that out of life, possessing a certain spontaneity and capacity for adaptation, there evolves consciousness. This theory does not imply, with materialism, that when the conditions change that which resulted through them must be destroyed; and it escapes the very serious difficulty, both for the reason and the imagination, when we are told that the soul is something inserted in the body at a particular period of its development. If matter is conceived of mystically, not as something entirely understood, but as something instinct with the divine, there is no shock to the mind in thinking of it as producing something infinitely great and wonderful. Life is not reduced to terms of matter because it flows out of matter, and self-consciousness is not reduced to terms of the lowest life because it flows out of life.

This is the merest sketch of a suggestion, and I have no desire to speak dogmatically. I believe with Dr. Tayler in the persistence of self-consciousness after death, and its final independence of material conditions. That belief is founded not on any theory of origin, but on self-consciousness, the experiences of love and sorrow, and on faith in the meaning of the world as good. Dr. Hicks, in a recent letter, has expressed very powerfully the kind of reasons and feelings which help us to believe in immortality.

All I am concerned with in relation to Dr. Tayler's letter is to say that the theory of the soul suggested by him, which he puts forward in the interests of faith, is a theory which drives some minds in the contrary direction. It is not the only possible theory which harmonises with persistence of self-consciousness. The development of self-consciousness out of material conditions, and its evident dependence upon them in certain cases, does not imply that it must be always dependent upon them, nor that it perishes when they are changed.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY GOW.

Hampstead, September 30, 1912.

SOCIAL STUDY CIRCLES.

SIR,—The appeal to the Churches of the Union for Social Service has already brought several requests for help in the starting of study circles, and it may be of service to give the experience of the one which has been carried on in Leicester for three winters. Our numbers are small—we do not wish for more than 12 at the outside, but as our members are very busy people and cannot always attend, it is as well to have so many on the books. We meet once a fortnight, begin with tea at 4 o'clock, and have the discussion from 5 to 6. We find a text-book useful, and generally take a chapter at a time, all reading it through during the fortnight, and one member endeavouring to gain further information from larger books, and opening the discussion. The first we took was "Work and Wages" (1s.), consisting of eight chapters selected from Prof. Thorold Rogers' standard work, dealing with the condition of agriculture and its labourers from the Norman Conquest onwards, and forming an interesting introduction to Beard's "Industrial Revolution" (also 1s.). This carries the history well on into the nineteenth century, and prepares the ground for the Reform of the Poor Law in 1834, the starting point of the Majority and Minority Reports of the Royal Commission.

Another useful 1s. book is "The Growing Generation," published by the Student Christian Movement, dealing with the problems of childhood and adolescence; and quite recently Messrs. A. & C. Black have published a 6d. edition of a valuable book by Dr. Watson, of Glasgow, entitled "Social Problems and the Church's Duty," which would provide food for many years of study.

The subject recommended for next winter by the Interdenominational Committee is "The Living Wage"; the Christian Social Union is already discussing it, but at present we have no literature to suggest dealing with all sides of the question, and we should be extremely grateful if any of your readers could help us to it.

I may add that we are shortly issuing Mr. Wicksteed's recent article in THE INQUIRER as a pamphlet, in the hope that it may be widely read and serve as an incentive to the serious study of social and labour unrest.—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE GITTINS.

6, Salisbury-road, Leicester,
October 1, 1912.

ACONTIUS.

SIR,—I have read with great interest Mr. Nolan's appreciation of Acontius. It may be worth while to point out a fact that has escaped the attention of writers on this early champion of religious toleration. In 1893, when Dr. Richard Garnett was Keeper of the Printed Books, the British Museum acquired a book by Acontius, of which no other copy is known. It is entitled "Vna essortatione al timor di Dio," and was printed by John Wolf, who styles himself "Seruitore de l'Illustrissimo Signor Filippo Sidnei." That there was such a book was known, but it was believed to be hopelessly lost. The volume, which is described in "Three hundred notable books added to the Library of the British Museum under the Keepership of Richard Garnett" (Edinburgh, 1899, p. 34) also contains some verses.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM E. A. AXON.

Manchester, September 29, 1912.

THE HYMNS OF DR. GEORGE MATHESON.

SIR,—Mr. Nicol Cross is mistaken in thinking that Dr. Matheson's verses beginning "Gather us in, Thou Love that fillest all!" have never appeared in any hymn book. They are included in two collections at least—Dr. John Hunter's "Hymns of Faith and Life," and Mr. Garrett Horder's "Worship Song."—Yours, &c.,

J. M. CONNELL.

Lewes, September 28, 1912.

SIR,—Mr. R. Nicol Cross is mistaken in thinking that G. Matheson's hymn "Gather us in" is not to be found in any hymn book. It is in "Worship Song," edited by W. Garrett Horder, and is frequently sung in Letchworth. Other hymns of Matheson's in the same collection are "O Love that wilt not let me go," and the lesser known one beginning "Saviour divine, I come to Thee—I yield, a captive to Thy sway."—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE A. DEACON.

311, Norton Way, Letchworth,
October 2, 1912.

LITERARY NOTES.

A BOOK by Mr. Edward Cadbury entitled "An Experiment in Industrial Organisation," with a preface by W. J. Ashley, M.A., Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham, will shortly be published by Messrs. Longmans & Co. The book will be a contribution to the applied science of factory organisation, dealing with the selection, education, and training of employees, the method of departmental organisation through committees, and the relation of the character and welfare of employees to business organisation and efficiency.

* * *

MESSRS. LONGMANS are also about to publish, under the general editorship of Professor W. J. Ashley, a series of "Birmingham Studies in Social Economics." They will be the outcome of investigations pursued by candidates for the Higher Social Study Diploma of the University of Birmingham, as well as for its higher degrees in Arts and Commerce; and it is hoped that they may be of service both to those actually engaged in social work and also to economists and legislators. The first three monographs to be issued will be as follows:—"Environment and Efficiency: a Study in the Records of Industrial Schools and Orphanages," by Miss May Thomson, of the Woodbrooke Settlement; "The Public Feeding of Elementary School Children," by Miss Phyllis Winder, of the Birmingham Women's Settlement, and the University Hall of Residence; "The Social Policy of Bismarck: with a Comparison of Compulsory Insurance in Germany and Great Britain," by Miss Annie Ashley, M.A.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Radnorshire: Lewis Davis. 1s. 6d.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK:—The Johannine Epistles: A. E. Brooke, B.D., in The International Critical Commentary. 10s. 6d.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & Co., LTD.:—The Classical Psychologists: Compiled by Benjamin Rand, Ph.D. 10s. 6d. net. John Millington Synge: Francis Bickley. 1s. net. Mohammed "The Great Arabian": Meredith Townsend. 1s. net. Lafcadio Hearn: Edward Thomas. 1s. net.

MESSRS. T. FISHER UNWIN:—The English Fairy Book: Ernest Rhys. 6s.

MESSRS. HARRAP & Co.:—Myths and Legends of Japan: F. Hadland Davis. 7s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co.:—The Times and the Teaching of Jesus, The Christ: Author of The Great Law. 12s. 6d. net. A. J. Balfour: W. M. Short. 7s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—Greed in Human Life: Maurice Clare. 6s. net. Ethics and the Family: W. F. Lofthouse. 7s. 6d. net. Prayer and the Human Problem: The Rev. W. A. Cornaby. 6s. Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt: J. H. Breasted, Ph.D. 7s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE:—England and Germany: By Leaders of Public Opinion in both Empires. 1s. net.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION:—The Story of Isaac Hopper, a Hero of the Anti-Slavery Movement: Henry Rawlings, M.A. 6d. net. Moral and Religious Lessons for Infants: M. C. Martineau. 6d. net. Belief in God: S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc. 2d. Favourite Stories: E. Pritchard and J. J. Wright. 1s. net. Stories for the Little Ones: Grace Spears and Dorothy Tarrant, M.A. 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Contemporary Review, The Hibbert Journal, The Nineteenth Century, The Quest, The Expository Times, The Sunday School Quarterly, The Bookman.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE MONKEY AND THE ANGEL.

SOME years ago I took some boys and girls to the Zoological Gardens, and as soon as we arrived inside the Monkey House what do you think one of the girls said? I think you could guess. She said: "Aren't they like little men?" Your mother perhaps says something like it when your little brother has been up to some tricks. "Oh, you little monkey," she may call out; and then some other day, when she wants him to do something that he is afraid to do, she will say, "Be a little man." Now if you thought about it you might say, "How strange; one day Mother says he is a monkey, another day she wants him to be a man. Can we be both?" Yes; all of us have something of the man, or I would rather say of the Angel, and also something of the Monkey, and the question is, which will win.

I wonder if you have heard Professor Drummond's story of "The Monkey that Would not Kill." Its name was Tricky, and it was most mischievous. If you locked it out of a room it re-entered through the chimney; if you locked it in it would get out by the same means. It got into the church and threw the hymn-books and Bibles about so that it looked as though the pulpit had been besieged by an army which had used them for bullets, and the minister, unable to stand it any longer, dropped the monkey into the sea. But it was not drowned, for a few hours after it boarded a ship. The crew kept it as a pet, but it soon caused trouble. It killed the ship's cat, and in consequence it was to be hanged. It was no use, though; it was found a little later not hanged, but hanging; it had got its hands round the rope and was fairly comfortable. Then the boatswain threw it into the sea, but it climbed up the side of the vessel and shook the water over him. So for the time being Tricky's life was spared. But one day it got hold of some paint and painted the parrot vermilion, daubed the woodwork of the ship, and spilt the paint pot over the captain's coat. Then the captain, in a fury about it, ordered that Tricky should be landed on a desert island. This was done, but, though the captain did not know it, there was a Scotchman living there, and he was terrified by Tricky, for it was his first sight of a monkey. Tricky came down the chimney into his house, spilt the milk over the baby, and tried to eat the children's porridge. So the Scotchman tried to shoot it. But once he couldn't aim straight, and another time the gun didn't go off. Then he tried to hang it; once the rope broke, and the next time the pump-handle to which he had fixed it was carried away by the monkey. When again he got hold of Tricky, he threw him into the sea from a high cliff with a weight round it, but Tricky simply picked it up and carried it along the sea bed. So it could not be killed. It might have been, though, if it had been caught quite young. I expect you could have killed it easily if you could have found it when it was a few days old, just as you could your little kitten. But it was allowed to grow, and then it seemed as if it could not be killed. Isn't it just the same with us? The bad things in us get stronger if they are not killed at once; when we get into a temper it is the monkey showing itself; when our eyes flash with anger it is the monkey at the windows. You have often heard a boy say of another, "He got his monkey up," and that is what he means.

Now, of course, monkeys can only be kept alive by being fed. In the Zoo you feed them with nuts; we feed the monkey within by bad thoughts and actions. If it is not fed it will die, and all of us ought to begin to starve it at once. The pity is that some people think that the angel and the monkey can grow together. A famous writer, Robert Louis Stevenson, has told us a story of a man who thought this could be. At day he was a good, kind doctor; at night he was cruel and wicked. At last his bad habits grew so strong that he could not break them; he remained the bad man when he wanted to be good again; in other words, the monkey grew so strong in him that it killed the angel so that it could not have life again, for he died alone, he was so ashamed of what he had become. There is a fable of Æsop which tells of a man who petted a snake, and kept it warm in his bosom, but one day, when it had grown to its full strength through his care, it bit him so that he died. If we are nursing to ourselves any evil thing, let us cast it out, lest it eat away all the love and goodness in our heart.

Now God will help the Angel to grow in us if we will only let him, just as a sculptor can get out of a plain and quite ordinary piece of marble a beautiful figure. When Mrs. Fry used to visit those dreadfully dirty, dark prisons that once existed in London, the prisoners used to say, "The angels have lent their voices to you, madam." How beautiful a thing to say, yet how true. The Angel had grown so in her that it could be heard as well as seen. Florence Nightingale took pity, when a little girl, on dumb animals; thus the Angel was given a start, and it was seen at its best in the Crimean War.

There is something more; the people who try to let the Angel grow in them help it to grow in other people. There was a great preacher who once lived in Brighton named Frederick Robertson. When he died, quite a young man, after a brave and good life, a minister wanted to write his biography, so he went down to Brighton to find out all he could about him. He did not hear much of him, but a man who kept a shop told him that he had a portrait of Robertson hanging in his shop parlour, and whenever he felt tempted to cheat or do anything mean he went and looked at it, and then he could not do it. So you see the Angel that was in the great preacher was helping, even after he was dead, the Angel to grow in someone else. We read of the apostle Stephen that when he was being tried his "face was as the face of an angel." He had looked on his Master Jesus, and had caught the goodness there was in him, and so his face shone as though he belonged already to heaven.

We are small, but we can do something, too. I have read of a very little child who did for a man something like the preacher for the shopkeeper. He was an organ-grinder, he was frequently drunk, and he swore fearfully, but one day a little boy came up to him and caught hold of his empty trouser leg (he had lost a limb) asking for something. He shook the little chap off with a blow and curse, but he, after running a few steps, came back and put up his face for a kiss. Two days later the organ-grinder was run over, and when he went back to his work he found it very difficult, for the pain was very hard to bear, but he never forgot that little child's face. Because of it he bought some jigs and reels and used to go and play in the poor streets where pennies were scarce, so that the children could dance, and when the injuries became so bad that he had to go to bed, the memory of that little face made him bite his lips so that he should not complain. The lady who wrote this story said that if she were to write anything on his tombstone it would be this: "He saw the face of a little child and looked on God." The tiny boy had helped the Angel to grow; it was only just beginning, but it was certainly there. So we are never too small to let the Angel grow in ourselves, or to help it to grow in others.

What about wings, do you say? Oh, never mind about them. Think of your mother, your father, or the one you love best in the world. Do you really think wings would improve them much? I don't think you do. "Oh, my mother," you say, "I think she would look just as well in that old bonnet"—"My father, I think I should like him better in that bowler hat and overcoat." Of course. Willing feet are as good as wings; a cheerful smile is as lovely as any light the painter can put round the face of a saint.

In a story of South Africa, Jesus comes to a soldier all alone on the veldt, and says, "There is an angel in every man, but some have their wings folded. Wake yours, mount up with him." That is my last message to you—Angel up; monkey down.

W. K.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE PEACE CONGRESS.

MEETINGS IN GENEVA.

THE nineteenth Universal Peace Congress met this year at Geneva, the home of the Red Cross Convention, and the seat of the Alabama Arbitration Court. Delegates from most European countries and from the United States met for friendly intercourse and passed numerous resolutions on questions of the day and on means and methods of educating public opinion in all countries on the futility of war and the present un-Christian methods of adjusting differences.

Unfortunately even pacifists are not of one mind, and the Congress just concluded has clearly shown that the Peace workers in most countries are still divided into what may be termed "Nationalists" and "Internationalists." Thus some of the Italian delegates strongly defended the war with Turkey.

The British delegates too were strongly divided on the question of an early evacuation of Egypt, so eloquently pleaded for by the exiled leader Farid Bey. Mr. Maddison protested that the Congress had no business to discuss a purely British matter of policy, but the assembly decided otherwise.

Among the unofficial acts of the Congress two deserve to be named. During the excursion of members round the Lac Léman, and during a reception by the Lausanne Peace Society at Ouchy Pier, some Italian delegates suggested sending a message to the Turkish and Italian representatives sitting in that town. A deputation, including the well-known Mme. Séverine, undertook to deliver a message of sympathy and hope that the negotiations for peace might be fruitful.

The other unrehearsed act was the announcement made at the end of the Congress that French and German pacifists, after several private sittings, had agreed upon a line of action in both countries, based on the rights of the inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine to autonomy within the German Confederation, thus coinciding with the late Frédéric Passy's hope that Alsace-Lorraine might prove a factor for uniting the two neighbouring States. The conclusion of this act was touchingly sealed by M. Emile Arnaud, a prominent French delegate, embracing affectionately the venerable German delegate, Herr Dr. Adolf Richter.

THE WELSH SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

FROM September 9 to 13 there was held at Llandrindod Wells a United Summer School of Social Service for Wales. For a country that is usually associated in the minds of most with riots and religious revivals and similar emotional outbreaks, such an enterprise is in itself wonderful enough. But when we bear in mind that it was held under the joint auspices of the Church of England and practically of all the Nonconformist denominations our amazement becomes greater still. But such has been the case, despite the Dis-establishment war that is now being waged with zeal and energy such as the Celtic temperament alone knows how to bring to its public affairs. On the same platform day after day for nearly a whole week we saw assembled representatives of Anglicans, Baptists, Calvinistic Methodists, Congregationalists, Friends, United Methodists, Wesleyan Methodists, and even Unitarians and Roman Catholics, to discuss social problems of our own time and district in a friendly, sympathetic and most scrutinising manner. The inevitable conclusion is that the social problem has for the moment in Wales risen supreme over every other. Not that the religious aspect was in any way ignored or even suppressed, for it was expressly stated as one of the features of the movement that "the problems brought forward at the school will be discussed with definitely Christian understanding and purpose." This seems broad enough, but there was a desire on the part of many that it might be made broader still so as to include representatives of the Jews. This may follow later, but for the time being it lay outside the practical aim of the school. It is evident, then, that religious people of all shades of opinion are gradually coming to realise that there are certain things in Christianity on which we can and ought to unite, even granting there are others on which it is necessary for us to divide our efforts for some time to come. It was sarcastically remarked in one press notice that the Lord's Prayer was the only religious basis on which we could all meet, and our reply is that it is a basis broad and deep enough to accommodate all of us comfortably; and especially is this the case when we find a Unitarian minister pronouncing those noble words of Jesus and a Catholic priest and others repeating them after him, and be it further remembered that the persons who stood shoulder to shoulder on that common platform were not insignificant or possessed of an "elastic conscience," as may sometimes be the case on certain novel and sensational occasions, but quite the contrary; for Canon Buckley, Mr. D. Llenfer Thomas, Profs. D. Miall Edwards, Philemon Moore, J. M. Davies, Principal T. F. Roberts, the Rev. Silyn Roberts and others are names in Wales that one might do a great deal of conjuring with.

The same school on a smaller scale met also for the first time at the same place a year ago. Its origin may have something to do with its wide popularity, for if not wholly it was partly, at any rate, the outcome of a recent visit paid by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Wales to discuss with ministers and members of the various denominations the relation of the churches to the social problem. But although associated with such a controversial name it knows no political any more than it does religious and theological bias. The principal subject brought up at the school for consideration on the present occasion was the Welsh coldfield, a subject as promising and fruitful as the keenest social student could well desire to have. A course of five lectures was arranged in English to "consider such social, industrial, and domestic factors as affect the character of the workers and those dependent upon them." The boy and girl problem was dealt with by Mr. T. W. Berry, Director of Education for the Rhondda Valley. That of the wives of the workers, as home-makers, as mothers and as citizens by Mrs. Roberts-Rosser, of Pontypridd, who acted as the mouthpiece of a small committee which has been established to make original investigations. The proper use of leisure, and the problem of education in relation thereto was treated in the absence of Mr. W. Brace, M.P., the appointed speaker, by Mr. John Thomas, B.A., organising secretary of the Workers' Educational Association for Wales. The problem of expenditure—personal, domestic and social—was entrusted to the able hands of Mr. Thomas Jones, M.A., secretary to the Welsh National Insurance Commission, and finally the question of co-partnership as a possible modification of the wage system was explained in a most instructive way by Mr. Aneurin Williams, M.A., of the Garden City Movement. In addition to these there were two lectures of a more general nature, the one in Welsh by Mr. R. H. Richards, University College, Bangor, on "The Economic, Social and Moral Changes of the Industrial Revolution," and the other in English, by the Rev. J. Morgan Jones, M.A., of Aberdare, on "The New Testament and Social Subjects." The school was, moreover, opened and closed by two public meetings at which the principal speakers were:—Canon Buckley, the Rev. Dr. A. J. Carlyle, of Oxford, Mr. Tom Bryan, M.A., Principal T. F. Roberts, M.A., of the University College, Aberystwyth, Dr. R. Owen Morris, Special Medical Lecturer, Welsh National Memorial, and Rev. D. Adams, B.A., of Liverpool. There we have a galaxy of the best inside and outside Wales, both in the religious and intellectual spheres. Among others who acted as chairmen or took part in the various discussions were Sir D. Brynmor Jones, M.P., Sir Frank Edwards, M.P., and Mr. Ellis Davies, M.P.

A further interesting feature of the school was a well-arranged exhibition of a large number of objects descriptive of life in the Welsh coalfield, as well as a display of plans for model dwelling-houses which had been submitted for adjudication at the recent National Eisteddfod in Wrexham. Still, in spite of the good work that was done in these various ways, the main significance of the school lay not so much in what was accomplished as in the manifesting of the great possibilities of such an enterprise. It transpired at practically every meeting held that there are questions in the Welsh coalfield that are burning red-hot for solution. Many of them are already so much overdue that even the least delay in order to consider them seems almost a sin against the Holy Spirit. But how and by whom are such going to be solved? It is a satisfactory answer to this question that the School of Social Service is seeking to find. Moral considerations at all points interpenetrate the social, and this makes the task doubly intricate. It is in view of this important fact that the churches are waking out of their lethargy to the realisation of their duties. Their sphere of interest and activity is wider than was imagined. One lesson was pre-eminently emphasised by the great majority of speakers, and that was that it is of the utmost importance for every would-be reformer to clean in the first place his own hands of all social and industrial dirt, for we can never hope to cast the mote out of our brother's eye while we have a beam in our own eye. Let the rich become poor, at least in spirit, and the proud and exalted humble, and then their words to the masses will carry the weight and receive the respect they deserve. Having tasted the first fruits of the Welsh School of Social Service, we trust and believe that it will henceforth come to take its place as an annual affair side by side with the preaching session, the singing festival and the National Eisteddfod. But it must produce not hearers only, but also doers of the Word, for socially, at any rate, faith without works is dead of itself.

J. P. D.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE proceedings connected with the opening of the session took place on Tuesday, October 1, at 4.15 p.m. There was a good attendance of supporters and friends of the College. The Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., took the chair until the arrival of the President, Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., who was detained by a late train. An address was given by the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., Tutor and Warden of the College, on "A Neglected Lectionary." It was a careful and masterly survey of the fortunes, or misfortunes, of the Apocrypha, and a plea for their reinstatement among Christian Scriptures. Beginning with the Council of Trent in 1546, which for the first time in history made the acceptance of the contents of the Bible an article of faith, including besides the Old and New Testaments Tobit, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus and the Maccabees, the way was prepared for the complete neglect of the Apocryphal books named. The very fact that they were accepted by the Roman Catholic Church was in later times prejudicial to their acceptance among Protestants. Luther held that although the Apocryphal books were not equal to Scripture, they were, nevertheless, useful and good for reading. He recognised merit in many of the books, and wished that the Maccabees had taken the place of Esther in the Canon. The tendency after Luther was to follow him in his strictures rather than in his appreciations. In Coverdale's Bible, 1535, it was stated that the Apocrypha were not of like authority with the other books. Cranmer's Bible, 1540, classed the Apocrypha as hagiographa—quaintly interpreted as books wont to be read not openly. The Bishops' Bible, 1568, showed more respect for the Apocrypha, and the Authorised Version of 1611 included them without clearly defining their character and authority. The sixth article of the Church of England lays it down with regard to the Apocryphal books that "the Church doth read them for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet it doth not apply them to establish any doctrine." The Westminster Confession, 1648, gives the Puritan standpoint. The Apocrypha are not of divine inspiration. They are of no authority in the Church of God. They are on a level with other human writings. This distinction between divine and human writings proved fatal to the Apocrypha. That the Apocrypha remained in the English Bible was due to the Anglican Church. The Nonconformists of England and the Presbyterians of Scotland were no patrons of the Apocrypha. Amongst them it fell into practical neglect. A story was told of a bookseller, who in recent times on being asked for a copy of the Apocrypha, inquired, "Is it a daily or a weekly?" The Apocrypha had got back to the old meaning—books hidden away. People were in the dark as to their history and value. A change had come over the attitude of the churches, however, due largely to the science of higher criticism which had bridged the gulf between divine and human writing. There was now an International Society of the Apocrypha which afforded a common meeting ground for Episcopalian and Nonconformist. Its claims must not be pitched too high, but it was good and useful to read. The hundred and fifty years between the testaments were marked by a revolution of the cultus, doctrine, and polity of Judaism. If they were to read the Scriptures intelligently they must know the Apocrypha. In conclusion, he would say without reserve that the time was ripe for the reinstatement of the Apocrypha. A course of lectures on the subject would be given by him at the College during the session.

Before the lecture, the Principal announced that there would be three new students this session at Summerville, possibly four. They would open with five theological students, and four taking the Arts course. The important announcement was also made of what may be the beginning of a new departure at the College. The Committee had arranged with the Rev. Dr. Cressey, of London, to give three special lectures in November on the composition and delivery of unwritten sermons. They hoped from time to time to have special lectures of this kind dealing with the practical side of the minister's life and work.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary services of the above Association were held on Sunday, September 29, in the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, and were conducted by the Rev. Arthur W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden. He delivered two inspiring addresses, in the morning speaking on "The Coming Day" and in the evening on "A Missionary Faith."

On the following day the annual meetings were held, when the chair was occupied by the President, the Rev. Alfred Hall. There were also present the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. A. W. Fox. The business meeting in the afternoon was well attended by delegates from the churches, every church being represented. A welcome was given to the Rev. J. B. Robinson, who undertook the work at Barnard Castle at the beginning of July. The treasurer's report showed a balance in hand of £33, though claims would have to be met early in the year.

The committee's report stated that during the past year many difficult problems had arisen. It was feared the church at Carlisle might have to be closed, but the trustees had met and resolved that an attempt should be made to secure the services of a missionary minister, prepared to reside in Carlisle, and that part of his stipend should be paid out of the income of the invested proceeds from the sale of the church buildings. Services are being held in a room in the city. Schemes were being forwarded for the settlement of a minister who should have charge of the congregations at Darlington and Stockton, and also for the settlement of a minister in charge of the congregations at Sunderland and South Shields. The two strongest churches at the present time were Newcastle and Middlesborough, and these had maintained their own in times of general church decline. For some months of the year they were the only churches with ministers, and the district was reduced to the sad condition of having ten churches and only two ministers. At the present time there are only three in the field. Reference was made to the resignations of the Revs. W. F. Kennedy, R. H. Maister, and W. Wilson.

It was resolved early in the year to form a lay preachers' class in the hope that among the young people and others some helpers would be found who would be willing and able to serve the churches which must depend largely upon lay help in the future. The gatherings had been well attended, the lay preachers had come into Newcastle from Gateshead, South Shields, and Sunderland, enthusiasm had been shown, and the result was that the Association had now a larger band of lay preachers than at any previous time in its history. Mr. A. Rowe had undertaken the duties of plan secretary, and the printed plan revealed that there was much resource in the way of lay preachers. The Association was glad that the young people had shown their ability and earnestness, and were proving acceptable to the churches.

Reference was made to the loss sustained by the deaths of Mr. John Pattinson, Miss Emma Fallows, Mr. Turner, and Mr. J. T. Southern. Special resolutions of sympathy were passed with the families of Mr. John Pattinson, who was treasurer of the Association for several years, and Mr. J. T. Southern.

Ald. Sir J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., was elected President for the coming year.

A resolution of thanks to the lay preachers was passed with applause, to which Mr. A. Rowe and Mr. Vigo Demant replied.

On the proposal of Miss Lucas the following resolution was carried unanimously.

"That this meeting urges the Government to pass immediately, and without modifications, the White Slave Traffic Bill."

Also "that this meeting, believing that the admission of women to citizenship would tend to the moral and social well-being of the nation, appeals to the local members of Parliament to support Women's Suffrage amendments in the proposed Reform Bill." Carried nem. con.

On the proposal of Miss Alice Lucas, the following resolution was also carried nem. con.:—"Believing that the acquisition of knowledge is lawful only if the method thereof be in harmony with the principles of Religion and Morality: and that the pursuit of physical well-being must not be permitted to override the higher considerations of compassion and pity, this meeting emphatically condemns the practice of vivisection, and calls upon the Government to totally abolish it by law."

The meeting then went into conference with Mr. Bowie on the condition of the churches. Reports were given by representatives, and Mr. Bowie, in reply, made several helpful suggestions.

The evening meeting was well attended, addresses being given by the Revs. Alfred Hall, W. Copeland Bowie, and A. W. Fox, Sir Joseph Ellis, and Mr. Charles Smith, of Liverpool.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE BOY SCOUTS.

THE founder of the Boy Scout movement, fresh from his tour round the world, has been speaking at Manchester recently in the interests of the organisation, which owes its rise to him. Numerically speaking, the movement has been a huge success. It is to be found in France (éclaireurs); the rigid militarism of Germany does not apparently offer quite the sort of outlet desired by the youthful Teuton and corps of Pfadfinder are springing up in many places; at the recent Moral Education Congress at The Hague representatives of the Dutch Padvindes, whose statement of the principles of their organisation had been inadvertently omitted from the printed papers of the Congress, appeared in full marching uniform, and presented to each delegate a copy of their formulated aims and objects. Moreover, the movement has penetrated to the awakening East, and the lads of New Guinea and Siam are out in quest of hypothetical enemies. Whatever judgment, then, we may pass upon the movement, it has apparently come to stay. Without entering here on the discussion of some points on which the Scouts have been severely criticised, for example, their alleged militarist tendency, it is well to recognise that the leaders of the movement have in some ways shown a truer insight into boy psychology than many conventional teachers.

PRINCIPLES OF THE DUTCH SCOUT ORGANISATION.

What objection, for instance, have we to offer to the following principles imposed by the Dutch Scouts :—

- (1) To do one's duty towards one's country and Government.
- (2) To show respect and obedience to parents, teachers, and the public authority.
- (3) To help one's neighbour.
- (4) To consider every man as a friend, and every Scout as a brother.
- (5) To treat animals well.
- (6) To behave like a knight towards all people, rich or poor, young or old, towards women and the weak.
- (7) To tell the truth under all circumstances, to keep one's word faithfully, and in every case to show one's self a "man of honour."
- (8) To lead a pure and wholesome life.

A good many of us who are ardent friends of peace could subscribe to the above without any mental reservations whatever. Moreover, the Scouts are essentially right in two other points. They see the necessity of discipline for the growing lads of our large towns, who for want of it are in many cases growing up nervy, irresponsible, and shiftless. They are endeavouring to provide an outlet for the spirit of adventure, which is always present in the normally healthy boy, which is so frequently stifled by our present educational methods, and which for want of wise direction frequently finds its way into undesirable channels. The present writer, seeing on the road from The Hague to Leiden three lads whose accent unmistakably proclaimed them to be Cockneys, dared, being out of England, to go up and speak to them without being introduced. He found them orienting themselves like skilled travellers, and was happy to meet them again a few days later in the magnificent Rijksmuseum at Amsterdam intently gazing on its masterpieces with as much apparent understanding as the average visitor. Moreover, these youths, all under 18 years of age, and unaccompanied by any adult, were behaving themselves with perfect good manners, as behoves strangers in a strange land, without any of the loudness and vulgarity which characterises a certain type of perambulating Englishman, who forgets that the whole of Europe does not belong to him.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—The Rev. E. H. Pickering was ordained to the ministry of All Souls' Church by the Presbytery of Antrim on Tuesday, October 1, the service being conducted on behalf of the Presbytery by the Revs. P.

Godding, H. J. Rossington, and A. O. Ashworth. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, with whom Mr. Pickering has acted as assistant at Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, gave the charge to the minister, and the Rev. G. L. Phelps gave the charge to the congregation. Subsequently there was a well-attended social meeting in Rosemary Hall to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Pickering to Belfast.

Birkenhead.—A reception was held in the schoolroom of the Bessborough-road Unitarian Church on Wednesday, September 25, to meet the newly appointed minister, the Rev. J. E. Jenkins. Mr. A. W. Willmer gave a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins on behalf of the congregation, and spoke with confidence and hope of their future work. After Mr. Jenkins had responded a musical entertainment was provided by members of the congregation. A public meeting of welcome will be held in the Town Hall, Birkenhead, on Tuesday, October 15.

Edinburgh.—A large gathering assembled on Friday evening, September 27, for the induction of the Rev. Raymond V. Holt, B.A., to the pastorate of St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, as colleague and successor to the Rev. Robert B. Drummond, B.A., who retired at the end of the month after a ministry of over fifty years. Amongst those present were the Revs. Lucking Tavener, James Forrest, E. T. Russell, and Dr. J. K. Wood. The service was opened with prayer by the Rev. T. M. Falconer, of Glasgow. Principal Carpenter, of Oxford, delivered the charge. The Rev. R. B. Drummond gave the charge to the congregation, and Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, welcomed Mr. Holt into the ministry.

The Edinburgh Evening News of September 27 contained the following reference to the Rev. R. B. Drummond's long ministry:—"The retirement of the Rev. R. B. Drummond from the pastorate of St. Mark's (Unitarian) Chapel ought not to pass without note. Mr. Drummond's ministry has been a conspicuous one. Apart from the long term of years in a single pastorate, he has held a remarkable position in Edinburgh. One of the features of the city pulpit, recognised by the discriminating, is the wealth of ability in the smaller denominations. Though outside the main currents of popularity, those preachers are often worthy to be classed with those of the greater churches, and they exercise an influence not to be estimated by numbers. Thus Mr. Drummond, though his audience might be small, never failed to present a discourse in which ethical power was backed by reasoned thought, and enriched by literary illustration. His preaching was dominated by the thought of a progressive revelation, a conception at one time much less familiar than it is now. Mr. Drummond, mounting the pulpit with Carlyle or Ruskin in hand, emphasised a spiritual continuity throughout the ages. He was a pioneer, with this difference, that he would boldly set forth as the main theme of the day topics which more conventional preachers thrust into secondary place as an evening sermon or lecture. With it all, Mr. Drummond never failed to impress a high and serious view of life. He was neither a sentimentalist nor a dilettante, and his outlook on public affairs was indicated by service wherever he believed justice to be involved."

Hackney.—The teachers and school committee of the New Gravel Pit Church met on Sunday, September 29, to acknowledge the long services of Mrs. Wood and Miss Green, who have been connected with the school, as teachers, for 25 and 21 years respectively. A small presentation was made to each. Mr. C. W. Cornish presided.

Huddersfield.—At the scholars' service at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, September 29, a presentation was made to Mr. Charles W. Potts, one of the superintendents, in recognition of his five years' services to the school, on his approaching marriage. Mr. Potts is the son of the late Mr. S. C. Potts, borough treasurer of Huddersfield, who was at various times secretary, warden, and trustee of the Fitzwilliam-street Church.

Leeds: Mill-hill Chapel.—The Rev. C. Hargrove preached his final sermons before becoming Minister Emeritus, on Sunday, September 29. In his morning address he said that an eminent Anglican Bishop had lately remarked that a church, like every living organism, had its childhood, and, as it grew towards maturity, must put away its childish things. What that good bishop desired for his great church, that, their little church, an offshoot from the old mother, had possessed from the beginning. With individuals growth stopped sooner or later; it was not so with communities, such as a church, in which men outlived themselves in their fellows. If a community ceased to grow, through stupid self-satisfaction or self-conceit, it was near its end. In regard to the faith held and preached in that church, if they said they had gone far enough, they condemned all their past, with its broadening down from precedent to precedent. He turned to their true definite service, the service of God's family, of their fellow-men. The greatest misfortune, to his mind, that could befall that chapel would not be the loss of those who were blessed with wealth or had been distinguished in office, but would be the severance of the congregation from social work.

Leeds: Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The annual dinner of the Yorkshire Unitarian Club was held on Saturday evening, September 28, at Pownall's Rooms, Leeds. The guests of the evening were Dr. J. E. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and a former pastor of Mill-hill Chapel, and Mr. Stanley Penwarden, a delegate from the London Laymen's Club. Mr. F. G. Jackson presided. The secretary read a letter from the Rev. Charles Hargrove expressing his regret at being unable to attend. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Carpenter and Mr. Penwarden.

London: Stratford and Forest Gate.—A joint meeting was held in the schoolroom of the West Ham-lane Unitarian Church on Monday last to bid farewell to the Rev. John Ellis, who had been minister of the two congregations for the past three years, on his removal to Stalybridge. The chair was taken by Mr. Alfred Wilson, representing the London District Unitarian Society. Mr. and Mrs. Ellis carry with them the hearty thanks of the members, and their best wishes for success in the new work. A presentation of an album was made, containing an illuminated address.

London: Wood Green.—It is announced that Dr. Orchard, of Enfield, will give an address on "The Relation of Ethics and Religion" in Unity Church, Wood Green, on Thursday, October 10, at 8 p.m.

Manchester District Sunday School Association.—The Rev. W. Holmshaw, who has just left Blackley to take charge of the pulpit at Ilminster, has been an officer of the above Association for many years, and for over six years has filled the office of general secretary. At a largely attended meeting of the committee held in the Memorial Hall on Monday, September 30, the opportunity was taken to bid farewell to Mr. Holmshaw and to give him a tangible token of the Committee's high appreciation of his services. Mr. H. J. Broadbent, President of the Association; Mrs. Dowson, the Rev. C. Peach, and Messrs. J. H. Pimley and J. Wigley bore testimony to the conscientious and painstaking ability, the ungrudging sacrifice, and the fine spirit of comradeship which Mr. Holmshaw has brought to his work. The gift took the form of two armchairs and three books, one of these being a bound volume of Annual Reports, covering a large part of Mr. Holmshaw's period of office. This volume is inscribed with the following address:—"To the Rev. W. Holmshaw. This volume, containing the Reports of the Manchester District Sunday School Association for the years during which you acted as General Secretary, is offered to you, together with the accompanying pair of armchairs, on your leaving Manchester, as a small memento of the esteem in which you are held by your colleagues on the Committee, and their admiration for the capacity and zeal you have displayed in connection with the work of the Association. With their expression of regret at losing the assistance of so valuable a helper they desire to join a heartfelt wish for the future welfare and happiness of yourself and Mrs. Holmshaw and your family." Mr. Holmshaw made a suitable reply.

Mansfield.—In view of the fact that the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, minister of the Old Meeting House, is leaving Mansfield, a presentation was made to him on Wednesday, September 25, at a social gathering at the Co-operative Café, arranged by the Mansfield branch of the Workers' Educational Association, which Mr. Vaughan did much to establish, and for which he has worked energetically. The Mayor, Councillor T. Hall, presided, and the company included Alderman Singleton, Mr. S. Pickering, Mr. J. R. Skelton (secretary), and Mr. R. F. Dolley, M.A., tutor of the class. The gift took the form of a traveller's writing case, and was presented by the Mayor, who expressed his belief that the Mansfield Branch of the W.E.A. had a great future before it. The speaker also spoke in terms of warm appreciation of Mr. Vaughan's work amongst them. He was a man who endeavoured to live up to what he preached, and the town of Mansfield would be the poorer for his removal from their midst. Alderman Singleton added a few words in a similar strain. The Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, in replying, alluded gratefully to the help and affection he had received from the members of the Association, and to the efficiency and energy of the secretary, Mr. Skelton. The movement they had at heart had actually taken root in their growing town, and would, he hoped, go on to become one of the best classes in the kingdom. It was a genuine educational association for workers, irrespective of class. It was not a class movement. They wanted people to find out their latent capacities, and then to press the Government, which had taken up education, to give opportunities for what the people really need. The speaker went on to indicate lines upon which the work could be developed, suggesting an exhibition of pictures in the Town Hall, and also public lectures. Pictures and theatres, he added, could be a tremendous power in education, and they were going to be improved by the people knowing what was better and wanting what was better. The wonderful development of the electric pictures was a marvellous means of education. It could be abused, but also developed on educational lines. In view of the music hall ditties of a questionable character, which were sung everywhere, the Association ought to set themselves to revive the good old English songs and music. In these and other ways they could help in the uplifting of the people. As yet they had only touched the fringe of the work, but they must be pioneers.

Marple.—A reception was given to welcome the first minister of the Marple Unitarian Church, the Rev. L. Short, and his wife and family, at the Marple Liberal Hall, on Saturday, September 21, Mr. A. Hirst being in the chair. Several letters conveying good wishes were read from those unable to be present, including the Rev. W. D. Judson, of the Primitive Methodist Church, the Rev. R. Augustus Foster, the Rev. William MacMullan, the Rev. Alfred Toothill, and the Rev. H. Paynter Boase, of the Wesleyan Chapel, Marple. After an address by the chairman, the Rev. H. E. Perry, of Stockport, secretary of the East Cheshire Christian Union, extended the right hand of fellowship, and read an encouraging letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who was unable to be present. In this letter Mr. Dowson spoke in warm appreciation of the Rev. L. Short, and said he looked forward with confidence to the future of the liberal and progressive cause in Marple. The Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Mossley, brother of the new minister; the Rev. J. S. Burgess, of Flowery Field; Dr. Mellor, of Warrington; and Mr. T. A. Edwards also spoke. The Rev. L. Short, in responding, said that his chief business was with the non-churchgoers. He was not concerned about the people who already went to places of worship. He knew many reasons why people stayed away. Some were not satisfied with the old position. They had got tired of it, and wanted something more fitting to their minds, and something to which their lives could respond. He would appeal to those, and also the people who did not attend church because they thought there was no longer any need. They felt they could worship God in their work, and alone. That was a great mistake. They did not realise what they owed to the church, the strength of soul and mind which was helping them to worship God. They were not justified in staying away for that reason. They should help to make other souls as strong as their own.

Northampton.—The second annual meeting of the Unitarian Athletic Association was held on Thursday evening, September 26, at the Kettering-road Church school. The Rev. W. C. Hall presided over the meeting. The secretary read the report for the year, and laid emphasis on the fact that the past year had been the most successful one they had experienced. He had to report the loss of both shields won last year, but this was more than counterbalanced by the increase in the number of members, by a good financial year, and by the addition of two more sections to the association. The balance-sheet showed that the income was £35 ls. and the expenditure £32 16s. 3½d., leaving a balance in hand of £2 4s. 8½d.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings of the society were held on Monday, September 30, at Wick, under the presidency of Mr. John Lewis. In the morning a pilgrimage was made to the grave of "Iolo Morganwg," whose mortal remains lie buried in the floor of the quaint old church at Flemingston. The Rector, the Rev. Mr. Morris, received the visitors very kindly, and read extracts to them from a short history he has compiled explanatory of the various objects of interest connected with the place. There were present at the afternoon meeting Mrs. Reid, Swansea; Ald. J. B. Willans, of Kerry, Montgomeryshire; Mr. L. N. Williams, J.P., Aberdare; Mr. D. R. Llewellyn, Aberdare; and Mr. Ronald Ll. Thomas, Merthyr. The President, Mr. John Lewis, of Pontypridd, occupied the chair at the business meeting, and amongst other matters it was decided, on the motion of the Rev. Simon Jones, seconded by Mr. J. B. Willans, that the Society should give its best support to the White Slave Bill now before Parliament, and that in the original and not its amended form. At the conclusion of business a service was held in memory of "The Ejected of 1662," conducted by the Rev. E. K. Dennis, and the Rev. Simon Jones (Swansea) was the preacher.

Styal and Dean Row.—The Rev. E. A. Voysey, M.A., has accepted the invitation of the two congregations to take temporary charge to the end of the year.

Warrington.—As briefly reported in our last issue, the funeral of the late Mr. F. Monks, J.P., took place on Friday, the 27th ult., at Cairo-street Chapel. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. S. A. Mellor, and was attended by representatives of many institutions with which Mr. Monks had been connected, a deputation from the Corporation being also present. In the course of his address Dr. Mellor paid a tribute to the sterling qualities of Mr. Monks's character, his many services to his native town, and his generous support of his place of worship and all its connected institutions. The urn containing the remains was subsequently borne to the grave in the old chapel yard by Mr. Samuel Dunn, the oldest employee of Messrs. Monks, Hall & Co. Mr. Monks was an honorary freeman of Warrington, and resolutions expressing deep regret at his loss and gratitude for his many services to his native town have been passed by the Bench of Magistrates and many other public bodies.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE MEMORIAL TO SERVETUS.

A correspondent writes:—During the past week I was in Geneva as a delegate at the 19th Universal Peace Congress, and last Sunday, being the anniversary of the birth of Michael Servetus, I made a pilgrimage to Champel, on the outskirts of Geneva, to find the monument erected in 1903 as an act of expiation to the memory of the martyr of 1553. It is a plain granite slab at the foot of the rue Michel Servet, and bears the following two inscriptions which may interest your readers. Facing the Chemin de la Roseaie we read:—

LE XXVII OCTOBRE MDLIII
MORT SUR LE BVCHER
A CHAMPEL
MICHEL SERVET
DE VILLENEVE D'ARAGON
NE LE XXIX SEPTEMBRE MDXI

And on the east side:—

FILS
RESPECTUEUX ET RECONNAISSANTS
DE CALVIN
NOTRE GRAND REFORMATEUR
MAIS CONDAMNANT VNE ERREUR
QUI FUT CELLE DE SON SIECLE
ET FERMEMENT ATTACHES
A LA LIBERTE DE CONSCIENCE
SELON LES VRAIS PRINCIPES
DE LA REFORMATION ET DE L'EVANGILE
NOUS AVONS ELEVE
CE MONUMENT EXPIATOIRE
LE XXVII OCTOBRE MCMIII

ALCOHOL AND MODERN LIFE.

The interesting and valuable address on "Alcohol and Modern Life" delivered by Dr. Lionel Tayler at the National Unitarian Temperance Association Conference last Whitsuntide, of which we gave a summary at the time, has been issued as a pamphlet, price threepence. We would particularly recommend it to all who have the cause of temperance at heart, for it contains much information relating to the action of alcohol and narcotic drugs which is not usually accessible in a cheap form, and a list is also given of important works dealing directly or indirectly with the drink problem in its relation to the State, the statistical aspect of the alcoholic controversy, and the treatment of inebriety, which should prove extremely useful to the temperance worker.

A FRENCH MONUMENT TO JOHN STUART MILL.

The town of Avignon proposes to erect a monument to John Stuart Mill. A committee has already been formed to make the necessary arrangements, which includes among its members M. Poincaré, the French Premier, and M. Clemenceau, who translated one of Mill's best-known works into French. Mill died at Avignon, where his wife also died and was buried in 1858. "Since then," he wrote, in a pathetic passage in his autobiography, "I have sought for such alleviation as my state admitted of, by the mode of life which most enabled me to feel her still near me. I bought a cottage as close as possible to the place where she is buried, and there her daughter (my fellow-sufferer and now my chief comfort) and I live constantly during a great portion of the year. My objects in life are solely those which were hers; my pursuits and occupations those in which she shared, or sympathised, and which are indissolubly associated with her. Her memory is to me a religion, and her approbation the standard by which, summing up as it does all worthiness, I endeavour to regulate my life."

TELEGRAMS IN ESPERANTO.

English Esperantists will be interested to learn that M. Chaumet, the French under-Secretary of State for Posts and Telegraphs, has consented, as the result of urgent representations, to allow telegrams to be sent in Esperanto. Owing to international telegraphic regulations, however, such messages can only be treated as in code. It may be mentioned in this connection that the Labour Congress at Havre passed a motion advocating Esperanto as a means of furthering fraternisation of the "Internationale Ouvrière."

HAMPSTEAD GARDEN SUBURB.

Some interesting lectures and debates have been arranged for the coming season at the Hampstead Garden Suburb Institute, and the School of Music, the Child Study Society, and other societies for promoting the study of Shakespeare, photography, and natural history, each publish an attractive list of items in connection with the general winter programme. Mr. Sidney Webb, Sir Frederick Bridge, Mr. John Withers, of the Alpine Club, and Mr. Wilfred Mark Webb (editor of Knowledge) will be among the lecturers, and the first debate of the season on "Our Nation and the Family of Nations," will be opened by Lord Courtney of Penwith.

WHERE BLAKE LIVED IN LONDON.

Blake loved London as dearly as Charles

Lamb, but with a mystical love which transformed its grey buildings and crowded streets into something visionary and beautiful. For seven years he lived in a little riverside house at Lambeth, and for seventeen years he resided at 17, South Molton-street. Another early residence was in Oxford-street. He was born in Broad-street, at No. 28, which now bears a County Council plate to record the event, and he died in the rooms in Fountain-court, called "The House of the Interpreter" by his disciples, which have long since disappeared. The Blake Society recently suggested that it would be a good thing to turn one of the houses where Blake lived into a museum in which to store relics, after the manner of the Carlyle Museum in Chelsea.

HORSES IN WARFARE.

The Humanitarian League has sent the following letter to Sir Edward Grey:—"The Committee of the Humanitarian League desire to express their earnest hope that his Majesty's Government will give favourable consideration to a resolution unanimously passed at the recent National Peace Congress, to the effect that the merciful provisions of the Geneva Convention should be extended to wounded horses and other animals employed in warfare, and that protection should be accorded to the veterinary surgeon and such voluntary aid societies as may be duly authorised to visit the battlefield." It is suggested that the British delegates should be instructed to give their support to this resolution at the meeting of the Third Hague Conference in 1914.

PUBLIC OPINION

IS THE BEST WEEKLY REVIEW OF WHAT MEN AND WOMEN THINK, SAY, AND DO.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

People read PUBLIC OPINION to-day because it is supremely interesting. As readers are constantly saying, it is readable from beginning to end. "It keeps a tired world alert," says Mr. Garvin, the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.

It conveys, in the most handy form, something of life's variety, vivacity, and eternal interest. It is a weekly cinematograph of what people are doing, saying, and thinking. It gives a rapid survey of the events of the week.

PUBLIC OPINION (2d.) has increased its circulation four times in the last four years. It begins its 52nd year this week, and will give 52 of the best numbers ever issued.

For busy people there is no other paper which so easily helps them to keep in touch with all those things which interest intelligent people as PUBLIC OPINION.

It is a unique paper, presenting the cream of all the best thought in the best papers, magazines, and books on All Questions of the Day.

It is interested in Social Problems, in Religion, in Politics, in Science, in Literature, in all Arts and Crafts. It is just the paper for those who, like Trafford in Mr. H. G. Wells' new story, "want to get into touch with men who are thinking—into the souls of their books."

PUBLIC OPINION is non-party, and seeks only reliable facts and information. It is a great acquisition to any house, as it covers so wide a field, and interests everyone, for it is interested in everything. It is a Newspaper Room, a weekly Library of New Books, and always a cheerful and well-informed companion. It goes all over the world, and makes an ideal present.

PUBLIC OPINION

presents its compliments to the Readers of "The Inquirer" and urges them to get

THIS WEEK'S ISSUE

containing, in addition to all the usual features,

SPECIAL ARTICLES

BY

Sir H. H. JOHNSTON,
on "Things Worth Striving For."

A. O. BENSON, C.V.O.,
on "Real Life."

KATHARINE TYNAN,
on "The Literary Outlook."

PUBLIC OPINION

TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

A Specimen copy will be sent on application to the Manager, PUBLIC OPINION, 31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C. The yearly subscription in the United Kingdom is 10s. 10d.; abroad 13s. This week's number, 2½d. Post Free.

PUBLIC OPINION

1842 1912

The Inquirer

SEVENTIETH YEAR.

On October 19 a Special Number of "THE INQUIRER" will be published, commemorative of the Seventieth year of Publication.

This issue will be enlarged, and will contain articles of special interest to our readers, among which will be:—

"The Rationality of Spiritual Trust." By Professor G. DAWES HICKS.

"Christianity and Citizenship." By Rev. L. P. JACKS.

"The Liberal Movement in Evangelical Christianity." By Rev. H. E. B. SPEIGHT.

"The Liberal Movement in the Church of England." By Canon LILLEY.

An Interview with Professor Sieper, of Munich, on Anglo-German Relations.

"The Task of Reconstruction." By the EDITOR.

Order early from your Newsagent, or from THE PUBLISHER,
3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

CHURCH OF THE UNATTACHED

There are many Unitarians living at a distance from a congenial Place of Worship. Arrangements have been made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by which a Sermon or Pamphlet will be sent Weekly to anyone paying in advance 2s. 2d. to cover a year's postage.—Apply by letter to Miss PEARSE, E. Priory Mansions, Kilburn, London, N.W.

NOW READY FOR OCTOBER.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

Infant Class Teaching. Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
A Good Guide (Poem). Elizabeth Wilson.
A Vote of Confidence. George J. Allen.
Heroes of Faith.—Dr. Channing. Albert Thornhill, M.A.
The Teaching of Jesus.—L. G. Sharpe.
William Carey, Missionary. W. H. Carpenter.
A. M. D. G. W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.
English Unitarian Churches (Poem). Robert Pearce, (M.P.).
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching.—III. A. Stephen Noel.
A New Story of Burnley United. William J. Pigott.
Notes for Teachers.—XXXI.—XLVIII.
Arthur Brooke.
Five Lessons for Infant.—Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
The Making of a North Country School. J. Lonsdale Cox.
Children's Services. George Jessel, M.A., M.B.
Friends and Foes.—A Morality (A Play for Children). H. W. Hawkes.
By the Way.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.
(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

PREACHERS:

Oct. 6.—Morning 11.15, Evening 7.0. Rev. J. M. CONNELL, of Lewes.
„ 13.—Rev. C. HARGROVE, of Leeds. Morning and Evening.
„ 20.—Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS, of Bury. Morning only.
„ 27.—Rev. JAMES HARWOOD. Morning and Evening.

North Midland Presbyterian AND Unitarian Association.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD ON
TUESDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1912,
AT THE

OLD MEETING HOUSE, MANSFIELD.

PREACHER:

The Rev. E. G. EVANS, B.A., of Dukinfield.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION,

22, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE Society offers to send an efficient Lecturer free of charge to League Meetings, Debating Societies, &c. Autumn and winter engagements should be booked at once.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LETCHWORTH (Garden City.)—House to Let, furnished, during Autumn or Winter. Two sitting-rooms, kitchen and servant's room, four bedrooms, dressing-room, and bathroom. One mile from station.—Apply Miss LAWRENCE, Cloisters Lodge.

BOARD and RESIDENCE for Lady (not invalid) in Lady's house at Acton. Exchange references.—E. C., c/o H. G. Scarll, 404, Uxbridge-road, W.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

VERY FINE 3 in. ASTRONOMICAL TELESCOPE, by Steward. The object glass is one of Steward's finest make, mounted on portable iron altazimuth stand, fitted with two slow motions of gun-metal and Hook's joints. Cost £12. Price £6 10s.—Rev. H. V. MILLS, Greenside, Kendal.

INSURANCES EFFECTED: Fire, Life, Burglary, &c. Lowest rates; best offices.—Particulars of E. F. COWLIN, 40, Marler-road, Forest Hill, London.

ABSOLUTELY FREE!—200 novel Patterns of charming Autumn Blouse material; guaranteed unshrinkable wool, warm, light, colours fast; fascinating designs, looks smart for years.—Write to-day, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'Oyleys. Bundle of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS of every description accurately typed 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C. and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate, Saturday October 5, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see in the Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3668.
NEW SERIES, No. 772.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

1842 1912

The Inquirer SEVENTIETH YEAR.

On October 19 a Special Number of "THE INQUIRER" will be published, commemorative of the Seventieth year of Publication.

This issue will be enlarged, and will contain articles of special interest to our readers, among which will be:—

"The Rationality of Spiritual Trust." By Professor G. DAWES HICKS.

"Christianity and Citizenship." By Rev. L. P. JACKS.

"The Liberal Movement in Evangelical Christianity." By Rev. H. E. B. SPEIGHT.

"The Liberal Movement in the Church of England." By Canon LILLEY.

An Interview with Professor Sieper, of Munich, on Anglo-German Relations.

"The Task of Reconstruction." By the EDITOR.

Order early from your Newsagent, or from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

London District Unitarian Society.

THE UNITED SERVICE

will be held in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, E.C., on
Sunday, October 20, at 7 o'clock.

Preacher:
Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

ALL ARE HEARTILY WELCOME.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD SESSION 1912-13.

THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD will deliver the OPENING ADDRESS in the COLLEGE, on MONDAY, OCTOBER 14, at 5 p.m. Subject: "The Preacher's Need of Imagination."

A. H. WORTHINGTON, } Secretaries.
HENRY GOW, }

Liberal - Christian League.

AUTUMN ASSEMBLY.

King's Weigh House, Thomas St., W.

Monday, October 21.

3.30 p.m. Subject, "Revelations, Old and New." Speaker, Rev. Donald Fraser, of Liverpool.

7.30 p.m. "Various Aspects of the Women's Movement." Several Speakers.

Tuesday, October 22.

3.30 p.m. "Spiritual Forces," by Dr. Julia S. Sears and Mr. Macbeth Bain.

7.0 p.m. Organ Recital in Church.

7.30 p.m. Public Meeting. Speakers, Mr. Herbert Burrows, Revs. Dr. Tudor Jones and H. S. McClelland, B.A., B.D., Miss Maude Royden, and Rev. W. E. Orchard, D.D.

Admission Free, but Reserved Seats can be secured.

Contributions to expenses gratefully received.—Apply (Miss) A. H. ALLEYNE, Hon. Sec., 21, Red Lion Square, W.C.

UNITY CHURCH, ISLINGTON.

AN

EISTEDDFOD

WILL BE HELD AT

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, W.C.,

ON

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1912.

Music; Elocution; Literature; Art;
Photography; Needlework; Cookery.

Full particulars of Mr. RONALD BARHAM, "Fern Lea," Kelross-road, Highbury, N.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

PREACHERS:

Morning, 11.15. Evening, 7.

Oct. 13.—Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, late of Birmingham.

" 20.—Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS, of Bury. Morning only.
No Evening Service.

" 27.—Rev. JAMES HARWOOD.
Morning and Evening.

Nov. 3.—Rev. DENDY AGATE, of Altrincham.
Morning and Evening.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent.
HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

HOME EDUCATION.—JOSEPH H.

WICKSTEED (M.A. Oxon) and ETHEL WICKSTEED (Higher Froebel Cert.) have taken a house on high ground and sandy soil, between Guildford and Dorking, where they wish to receive a few boys and girls to educate with their own, ages 3 to 13.

The house stands on the edge of the Common, in two acres of grounds, mostly pinewood and heather.

They will be assisted by Miss Enid Branson (Science Tripos, Cambridge) and visiting teachers. Trained nurse in the house.

For illustrated prospectus apply Westminster, Chilworth, Surrey.

Elocutionary Entertainments

MR. ALFRED PERRIS is prepared to book engagements for a two hours' Entertainment, consisting of Dramatic and Poetic Recitals, grave and gay, interspersed with Musical items, vocal and instrumental, by Miss MAY PERRIS.—For particulars, terms, &c., address, 135, Padgate-lane, Warrington.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, October 13.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Berrymsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE; and 7.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls' Weech Road, Finchley-road, 11.15, Church Anniversary Service, 6.30, Harvest Thanksgiving, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON; 7, Rev. H. E. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Mr. F. MADDISON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. VICTOR FOX.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, Harvest Services, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Leytonstone, 632, High-road, 6.30, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, Harvest Services, 11, 3 and 6.30, Rev. J. MORGAN WHITEMAN.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WOOD.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, Smaller Worple Hall, 7, Mr. WM. LEE B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. J. WILSON; 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. T. F. M. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. L. TUCKER, B.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BROOK.
 {DEAN Row, 10.45, and
 {STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. A. VOYSEY, M.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GENEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. PERRY; 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11.30 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. N. J. HAWTHORN JONES.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. A. HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Schoolroom adjoining Unity Church Higher-terrace, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

The address of the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE will from the time of this notice, be 16, Franklin Mount, Harrogate.

PULPIT SUPPLY.

Rev. R. H. MAISTER is open to supply.—Address, 17, Devonshire-street, Ardwick, Manchester.

BIRTH.

THACKRAY.—On October 6, at Lawrence-road, Huddersfield, to Rev. E. and Mrs. Thackray, a son.

MARRIAGES.

EVANS—JOHNSON.—On October 10, at All Souls', West Hampstead, by the Rev. George Evans, M.A., of Middleton, and the Rev. T. B. Evans, M.A. (father and uncle of the bridegroom), and the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, George Arthur Evans to Winifred, only surviving daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Johnson, of Hillfield-road, West Hampstead.
 GREENHALGH—YEARNSHAW.—On October 5, at Chowbent Unitarian Chapel, by the Rev. J. J. Wright, Stanley Greenhalgh, M.Sc., eldest son of Robert Greenhalgh, J.P., and Mrs. Greenhalgh, of Breeze-hill, Atherton, to Bertha, only daughter of John Yearnshaw, of Mayfield-street, Atherton, and the late Mrs. Yearnshaw.

DEATH.

WILKINSON.—On October 4, at his residence, 335, Anlaby-road, Hull, William Wilkinson, aged 77 years. Interred at the Hull General Cemetery on October 7.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

ACCOUNTANT, MANAGER, CASHIER, &c.—E. F. COWLIN (Secretary National Unitarian Temperance Association) seeks position as above. Experienced and energetic.—Address, 40, Marler-road, Forest Hill, S.E.

WANTED, CHOIR MASTER, Unitarian Chapel, Stand. Salary £10 per annum.—Applications not later than October 25, to W. TURNER, 7, Morley-street, Whitefield, Manchester.

STUDENT for the Ministry requires Saturday employment, in order to supplement College grant.—Apply, X., 22, Bruce Castle-road, Tottenham.

MISS LUCAS recommends a friend with several years' experience as Companion to an old Lady. Capable and trustworthy.—Fieldhead, Darlington.

LADY-NURSE, or Nursery Governess, wanted for five children, ages 2 to 8½ years. No teaching, as three eldest attend school, but able to help with music and first lessons if required.—Mrs. H. MARTINEAU, Roughdown End, Boxmoor.

YOUNG DUTCH LADY, Certificated Tutor, Musical (Violin), French, German, Mathematics, Botany, History, &c.; experienced in care of young children, practical and domesticated, seeks post in refined household.—Miss A. S. BERGSMAN, Mantgum, Netherlands.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	9
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.
 Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	675	The Abuse of Language	679	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—		Our Free Heritage	680	Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and
Hymns and their Writers.—V.	676	“The Future of Non-conformity”	680	Cheshire	682
“Farthest South”	677	BOOKS AND REVIEWS:—		The Provincial Assembly of London and
QUESTIONS AT ISSUE:—		André Chénier	680	the South-Eastern Counties	684
Professor Schäfer’s Address on “The		Literary Notes	681	The High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham	685
Nature, Origin, and Maintenance of Life”	678	Publications Received	681	Care of the Feeble-Minded	685
CORRESPONDENCE:—		FOR THE CHILDREN:—		The Social Movement	685
The Living Wage	679	Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727).—I.	681	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	686
				NOTES AND JOTTINGS	687

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

At the time of going to press the rumours from the Balkans are uncertain and conflicting. The long delay of necessary reforms and the repressive measures of the Turkish Government have inflamed the Christian states to such an extent, that the question of war has probably passed out of the control of politicians and become an irresistible popular demand. The situation is full of menace. At the moment the Great Powers appear to be acting in concert and to be using a rather belated diplomacy to avert war; but their policy of procrastination has not reckoned with the stubborn passion for freedom and good government which still burns in the heart of small peoples, and they have a direct responsibility for the very difficult situation which has arisen.

WAR is horrible and degrading even when it is carried on under the highly technical rules of civilized states, but in the present case its horror is likely to be increased tenfold. If the worst fears are realised it will be waged in a bleak mountainous country during the winter. The Turkish troops will not be opposed by a regular army with a peaceful population looking on, but by whole districts in a state of insurrection; and they have not an enviable reputation when they fight and possibly win victories in circumstances of this kind. It will be impossible for Europe to look quietly on and simply allow events to take their course. The small Christian peoples cannot be left defenceless in the hands of Turkey to be taught the folly of loving freedom too well; while the success of their arms would create at once a situation fraught with political menace of the gravest possible kind. The indefinite postponement of debts of honour is as dangerous in diplomacy as it is bad in morals.

ON his return from South Africa last Saturday Earl Grey spoke very gravely of the native question. “There is no more difficult question in the whole orbit of politics,” he said, “than what should be the attitude of the white Government towards the black and coloured races for whose well-being they are responsible.” He gave an emphatic warning against blind reliance upon manhood suffrage, and suggested that in order to ensure the strength and safety of South Africa a reform measure may become necessary, which, without withdrawing the right to vote from any who now possess it, will raise the qualifications of all who may be enrolled as electors in future. It is hardly necessary to say that it will make all the difference whether a step of this kind is taken in a mood of racial panic so as to preserve ascendancy, or with a single eye to the good government and well-being of the whole population.

A CROWDED meeting was held in the Lyceum Theatre last Sunday afternoon to give voice to the public demand that the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill shall be passed without the amendments introduced into it in Grand Committee. The platform was a most representative one, and included the Bishop of London, Mr. C. G. Montefiore, and the Rev. F. B. Meyer. The principal resolution, which was moved by Mr. Montefiore, expressed the conviction “that the so-called liberty of the subject is not for a moment to be weighed against the awful evil which the Bill is designed to eradicate.” The Bishop of London, in supporting the resolution, said that he did not believe that one person in ten realised the extent of this infamous traffic. It was estimated that 5,000 girls were sent annually to one great city alone.

THE Bishop of London spoke also in high terms of the police, whom he described as “our greatest asset” in the matter. His point was that they could be trusted to be specially vigilant where the safety and honour of girls of their own class were concerned. This is no doubt quite true, and the generous tribute is fully deserved. But it does not follow that it is either just or wise to look upon men who are anxious to guard against the terrible evil of a corrupt police, or hesitate to revive a brutal form of punishment like flogging, as necessarily hostile to reform or callous in the face of a gigantic wrong. In a matter of this kind we want calm thoughtfulness and administrative experience as well as the fervour of the platform, if the best results are to be achieved.

WE offer a hearty welcome to the Daily Citizen, which was born under auspicious circumstances on Tuesday. We shall like it all the better if we do not always agree with it, for then it will provoke us to reflection and possibly reveal to us the hollowness of some of our traditional ideas. We have no dislike or fear of strong and candid thought in politics or religion or any of the living interests of men. Our only regret is that a newspaper like the Daily Citizen has not been possible before. It is a serious loss when a great force in the State, like the Labour interest, cannot express itself through the ordinary channels of public opinion, and stand in honourable comradeship and rivalry with the other exponents of political thought and social ideals.

WE desire to express not only our sympathy but a sense of alliance with the Daily Citizen in two important departments of its activity. It has been our own privilege for many years to play some part in the movement for international peace. Militarism and all that militarism stands for, as a defiance of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace, are abhorrent in our eyes. "No cause will be nearer to the heart of this journal," says the Daily Citizen, "than international peace. We shall have no mercy on the scare-mongers who stir up bad blood between nations. Our influence will be exerted to curb or destroy the anti-social interests that make for war." We also welcome very cordially the attempt to give a picture of daily life among the toiling masses at home and abroad, and to call public attention to its intrinsic interest and importance. It will be a welcome relief from the vapid chronicle of society weddings. The small minority of people in this country with incomes of over three hundred a year have furnished hitherto most of the personalia in the daily press. The best way to escape from these narrow boundaries and to extend sympathy and understanding is to make the facts of life known in all the glow and pathos of their human interest.

* * *

To draw these words of welcome to a conclusion, we think that everyone, whatever his political allegiance may be, will be conscious of a breezy idealism, and the driving force of faith in a noble cause, in the words with which the Daily Citizen sums up its purpose. "Our fighting programme," it says, "includes the full citizen rights of men and women because we believe that political equality between men and women affords the only just basis for democracy, and will result in a higher civilisation. Women will bring to politics a fresh atmosphere and enthusiasm. Social freedom can best be won by the deep comradeship of men and women working together for a common cause.

"Every movement which comes from the needs and the hearts of the masses will find support from us. The care of the weak, whether it be the poverty-stricken child or the sweated worker, or the unemployed toiler; the protection of the worker in mine, in factory, or on railways, the right of people in the humblest station to be treated as human beings and not as mere cogs in an industrial machine, the right of these same people to secure a full measure of the leisure and joy of life—these things will give us the banner under which we shall fight our battle."

* * *

THE discussion on "Miracles" at the Church Congress last week was more remarkable as a revelation of a temper of mind, than as a contribution to a subject about which after all there is little new to be said. Men seldom feel the weakness and fluidity of arguments advanced after the event in order to justify or to support what they have decided already to believe. They talk vaguely of evidence, but they decline to treat it with the searching analysis or the balanced judgment which they would be bound to use if their object were to produce conviction in the unwilling mind. Real candour, like that of Canon Sanday, who expressed his dislike of the abnormal and hedged his remarks round with tentative and cautionary statements, produces something like dismay among those who begin by being sure that all the evidence must be in their favour.

* * *

THIS and other recent discussions of the dependence of Christianity upon miracles reveal very clearly where the real cleavage lies. It is not an opposition between a mechanical view of the world and the escape from mechanism into the religion of the Spirit. It is rather a question of religious emphasis. Spiritual Christianity will always shrink from dwelling upon the abnormal because it believes so intensely in a God of order and not of confusion, whose Spirit bears witness with our spirit. It values the revelation in Jesus Christ, not because it makes belief in God possible, but because it deepens and enriches the faith and love and worship which are latent in our nature, and carries spiritual development to a higher stage. It shrinks from miracles, not, as some suppose, because it is materialistic, but for the very opposite reason, that religion seems higher and more wonderful without them.

* * *

ON the other hand, there are earnest men who confess that without miracles they would find it impossible to believe in a God of love at all. They speak as though they were naturally atheists, and were only startled into faith by abnormal events. To them the whole fabric of religion seems to depend upon splashes of divine power, provided for the succour of men who are aliens from God and incapable of finding him. It is perhaps seldom that the implications of the position are expressed so clearly, and it is held in check by some controlling sense of the firm foundations of natural religion upon which Christianity rests. But there is a school of High Churchmen who seem to be bent upon reviving a crude supernaturalism in this way. They assert with imperturbable dogmatism that the New Testament is on their side. But we believe that they are wrong. The whole witness of the New Testament is of the spiritual order, and it is their surest refutation.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

V.

"Dear Lord and Father of Mankind."

J. G. WHITTIER.

WE have in our modern books many beautiful hymns which bear the name of John Greenleaf Whittier, but with very rare exceptions they were not written as hymns. They are selections of verses taken from longer poems of his, and we have often to be grateful to the insight and the skill of the first editor, as well as to the beauty and power of the poet's own spiritual vision and the music of his verse. There are more than fifty of such Whittier hymns, though only a proportion of them of the highest worth. Among the first editors to have the happy thought of making hymns out of Whittier's verse were Samuel Longfellow and his friend Samuel Johnson. In their "Book of Hymns," 1846, they included twelve from Whittier, and in the Supplement of 1848 two more, of which "O he whom Jesus loved has truly spoken" was from the poem on "Worship," published only in that year. For their first edition they took, among the rest, some verses from the poem on "Democracy," written for Election Day, 1841, and made of them a hymn of Christianity. For this purpose one of them added the opening verse, which begins "O Fairest-born of Love and Light." Martineau, who also included the hymn in his "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," gives it the title, "The Permanence of the Spirit of Jesus." As it stands there, Whittier's own work begins at the second verse, "Beneath thy broad impartial eye." The transition involved in the making of this hymn was not difficult, since Whittier judged of man and democratic duty by the standard of Christ's manhood, "the Spirit of the Holiest" in man, and the reference of some of the verses is directly to Jesus. The adding of a whole new verse by the editors is in this case exceptional; as a rule there is merely a selection and sometimes a re-arranging of verses.

The Whittier hymns we value most are those taken from the poems "My Psalm" (1859), "The Shadow and the Light"

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our next issue will be a Commemorative Number, to mark the completion of our 70 years. It will be specially enlarged, and contain several interesting features, including articles on "Citizenship and the Churches," by the Editor of the "Hibbert Journal"; "The Rationality of Spiritual Trust," by Professor G. Dawes Hicks; "The Liberal Movement in the Church of England," by Canon A. L. Lilley; "The Liberal Movement in the Evangelical Free Churches," by the Rev. H. E. B. Speight; "The Task of Reconstruction," by the Editor; a Special Interview with Professor Sieper, of Munich, on "Anglo-German Relations," &c.

Orders for parcels or single copies should be sent without delay to the Manager of "The Inquirer," 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

(1860), "The Eternal Goodness" (1865), "Our Master" (1866), "The Brewing of Soma" (1872). These, it will be seen from the dates, belong to the period of his mature manhood. It is the voice of the writer of the beautiful home idyll of "Snow-bound" and the stories of the "Tent on the Beach" that we hear in these verses, the voice of a man who had been tried in the storm and stress of life and had set his feet on the true foundation, and through conflict and self-renunciation had entered into the secret of the richer, fuller life of love and trust.

The farm lad, who had been brought up in the simple country home near Haverhill, thirty miles to the north of Boston, and among his own people of the Society of Friends, had begun to make his way into the field of literature and at the same time to know the stirring of political ambition in good citizenship, when the call of the anti-slavery crusade came to him through Lloyd Garrison. That meant the laying aside of all hope of advancement in his chosen fields; it meant the facing of obloquy and personal risk; and Whittier did not hesitate in his choice. It was in 1807 that he was born, four years after Channing had begun to preach in Boston. He was only two years younger than Garrison and James Martineau, and two years older than Abraham Lincoln, Tennyson, and Gladstone. He passed as a young man through what Harriet Martineau called the "Martyr Age of the American Republic," and the stirring call and passionate indignation of his anti-slavery poems had no small part in the furtherance of the cause. When Garrison established the Liberator in 1831, Whittier was with him heart and soul, and helped to organise the first anti-slavery society in the States. He was in Boston when the mob seized Garrison in 1835, and at Philadelphia three years later, when the Women's Convention met and Philadelphia Hall was burnt. Then, having realised where his true strength lay, he withdrew to the home at Amesbury which his widowed mother and sisters had established in 1840, and from that quiet retreat continued unreservedly his service of the cause. It was only after the war, and the publication of "Snow-bound" in 1866, when he was left alone in the house at Amesbury, that he began to reap some harvest of recognition and success as a poet. Then followed many years of growing influence, constantly enriched by precious friendships, until the peaceful close of his life in 1892.

The Whittier hymns have for us the greater power of appeal when we remember the deep and true affections, the quiet courage, the faithfulness and unselfishness of the life out of which they were born. It is from "The Brewing of Soma" that the hymn "Dear Lord and Father of mankind" is taken. The first eleven stanzas of the poem are occupied with a description of various forms of sensuous excitement resorted to for the sake of kindling what was supposed to be religious fervour. Of these, the brewing and the use in ancient India of the intoxicating drink of Soma, in connection with the rites of Vedic religion, are taken as a type, while the lament is added that Christians even now have not yet altogether abjured such attempts at the unwholesome stimulation of religious transport. Then, with stanza 12, we are borne at once into a different atmosphere, and in the rest of the poem find the hymn which we are thankful to use as a prayer for pure spiritual worship and communion in quietness with God.

From the forms of religious excitement so repugnant to his nature, Whittier turns with these words of simple heartfelt prayer:

Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways!
Reclothe us in our rightful mind,
In purer lives Thy service find,
In deeper reverence, praise.

Here one word is altered. The Oxford "English Hymnal" (1906) alone, so far as I know, among recent books, has reverted to Whittier's own word, and reads "foolish ways." We owe the better word to Dr. Martineau, I believe, who in 1873 was the first to take these verses for use in his "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" (1872 is the date of the poem). It is from feverish excitements, from the cravings of sense and self, from the restlessness of the world, that we turn to the deeper quietness which may be ours with God, to steadfast purpose and the simple doing of our Father's will. With the earnestness of that purpose is linked the thought of the unquestioning obedience of the first disciples, as the type of what our response should be to the inward appeal, and the beautiful picture of the communion of Jesus in his homeland, that should kindle in us the same restful joy and purity of aspiration.

In simple trust like theirs who heard
Beside the Syrian sea
The gracious calling of the Lord,
Let us, like them, without a word,
Rise up and follow Thee.

O Sabbath rest by Galilee!
O calm of hills above,
Where Jesus knelt to share with Thee
The silence of eternity
Interpreted by love!

With Jesus we enter into the knowledge of the perfect love of God. As he was quietly surrendered to the Father's will, with a deep joy in the time of consecration, before his bitter trial came, and so was nurtured in the strength which afterwards was able to endure and overcome, in like manner we may learn to be still in the presence of the Holiest and receive the benediction of His Spirit. It is His truth that teaches inwardly. There is a quietness in the depth of the surrendered heart, in which that clear word of God is distinctly heard, and there can be no question that for our very life it is to be obeyed. It is a secret persuasion and conviction of Divine truth and right, bread of life silently ministered in blessing to those who hunger for it. It is not of our own restless seeking, but of complete surrender to our Father's will.

With that deep hush subduing all
Our words and works that drown
The tender whisper of Thy call,
As noiseless let Thy blessing fall
As fell Thy manna down.

Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,

And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace.

So the hymn ends in the Manchester College book and in the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal. Other editors add Whittier's last verse, which introduces other thoughts and images, and after the "earthquake, wind, and fire," concludes upon the note of the "still, small voice of calm." But this, which simply rests at last in the thought and the deep sense of the enfolding peace of God, is to my mind the stronger, more satisfying ending. It makes of the whole a more perfect hymn of aspiration, of worship, and "Rest in the Lord."

V. D. D.

"FARTHEST SOUTH."

CASUALLY asked for the southernmost point of England, nine people out of ten would probably reply "Land's End," without hesitation; but as a fact the neighbouring promontory of the Lizard has the advantage over it in that direction by several miles. This triangle of cliffs and moorland, though less secluded than of old in these motoring days, still preserves a distinct character of its own and shows many features of interest in climate and aspect. As you approach it from the North the trees grow smaller and more distorted, and at last cease altogether, and the road lies over a heathery down, swept by every wind that blows, until there appears against the skyline the Lizard Town, a group of sturdy stone houses, thatched or slated, with an indefinable air of being at the end of everything, and of hugging the ground tightly lest the next gale should blow them over the edge. But though no tree can stand against the winter storms, frost and snow are so rare that the cottage gardens are hedged with masses of blue veronica, delicate tamarisk, a brittle fuchsia, while sheltered nooks of the cliff are hung with festoons of the fig-marigold, whose waxy foliage is so familiar on the Mediterranean coast.

The district has affinities both with Wales and Brittany; the place-names have a Celtic sound—Porthleven, Cadgwith, Landewednack—and a Celtic strictness survives in the observance of the Sabbath, on which day there is a complete cessation of traffic with the outer world, and indeed of any local activity whatever. Where the soil is cultivated, a unique and convenient custom ordains that in place of hedges, the fields are divided by broad walls of rough stone, without mortar, but filled in with earth and levelled on the top to form a raised pathway, whereby you are provided with fascinating wall gardens of wild flowers, and with a network of short cuts which you may follow without fear of damaging the crops.

But the protagonist here is, of course, the sea, which sweeps round three quarters of the horizon, and sends Atlantic breezes even over the landward side—such a sea as cannot be realised by the Londoner who only knows the greenish-brown opaque material of the Channel and the Eastern counties. Let no scientist argue that salt water is in itself colourless, and depends for effect upon reflections from the sky; standing on some cliff height, you may look down on the "foundations of the deep" far out under the sea, rock, weed, and sand forming a pattern in the iridescent blues and greens of a peacock's neck. The Cornish blue is not the purple of the Mediterranean; it is the more translucent colour of that precious stone appropriately named aquamarine, and no conditions of cloud or storm can change its perpetual clearness. In the fiercest gale, the waves will curl into blue arches as transparent as crystal, and thunder on the rocks in clouds of dazzling white foam, and even where the line of cliffs is broken by a sandy cove there is usually no discolouring of the water, for the sand is so clean and heavy, that the wave dies away on its firm slope with only the faintest stirring of the surface. Or come to closer quarters with my protagonist, and you will experience another contrast—between the sandy, sticky, and unpleasantly-tasting effect of the "machine-made" bathe at the seaside resort, and the delight of diving sheer down into fathoms of green water, where you seem to be within touch of the boulders and seaweed fronds which are in reality far below out of your reach; and then become for the time a sun-worshipper on some weather-polished rock or stretch of warm white sand, and you will confess that, in comparison with this, the clearest mountain torrent would seem flat and lifeless, and that until now you never knew the fullest joy which the sea could give.

And if the jewel is so perfect, the setting is not unworthy of it; other cliffs may be grander in scale and greater in height, but it would not be easy to find scenery of more beauty and variety than this thirty miles of coast, a succession of wild, castellated headlands and sheltered coves and hollows with here and there picturesque fishing villages, immortalised by the Newlyn artists and their kind. In some places the rock is bluish-black and slaty in texture, but its higher surfaces are splashed with brilliant patches of red stonecrop, or orange lichen, and the top of the cliff is a profuse garden of wild flowers, beginning in June with sheets of pink thrift, and following the summer through with Cornish heath, ragged-robin, yellow snap-dragon, blue scabious, and numberless other plants, some of which it would puzzle you to name, but they would be hailed as rare finds by the expert botanist. At other points the rock itself contributes to the colouring, where the beautiful strata of red and green serpentine appear; these are seen to greatest advantage at the famous Kynance Cove, where a jagged island is connected with the coast by two crescents of white sand. Kynance is, in fact, almost theatrically perfect, like a cove in a fairy play; it possesses all the possible ingredients of a sea coast in their most attractive form—a special quality of palest green water, islands and capes like crouching lions, stretches of dazzling sand studded with isolated rocks of every shape and colour, caves of glistening red and green serpentine, rock pools filled with coral-pink seaweed, into which speckled blennies dash for cover as you approach, and, hidden away in secluded corners, two enchanted bathing pools, deep and clear enough for the most exacting mermaid, one with an archway leading underwater into the open sea, the other replenished, if the tide should serve, by sudden cascades thrown over a cleft in its rock wall by the waves outside. Looking out towards Kynance from the Lizard, you may see the sun go down through the golden haze, reflected in a glittering pathway on the water, and perhaps touching, as it sinks, the far distant outline of some island of Lyonesse; there will come to your memory those haunting lines of Keats, inspired by such a scene as this, and your once prosaic windows will turn to

... "Magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn."

Perilous this coast certainly is, but forlorn only in romantic moments; as a reminder of the workaday world, there passes before you, day and night, the unceasing pageant of the ships, skirting the point as closely as they dare, and flying the flags of every maritime nation under the sun, from the Olympic and her German rivals, the aristocrats of the shipping community, down to the host of drab and undistinguished steamers which form the proletariat. More often than you would expect, stately sailing ships glide past with three and four masts of towering canvas, like survivals from a more picturesque and deliberate century; or the latest battle-cruiser from Plymouth rushes out on her trial run, a dark grey mass of power, hideous perhaps to the artistic eye, but fulfilling at least one of the laws of beauty in perfectly expressing the object of her existence; or on a calm day you may mistake for a group of fabled sea monsters the blunt conning-towers of a little procession of submarines, while nearer at hand the fishing boats are busy among the reefs with their lines and lobster pots.

At night the centre of interest lies closer still, in the lighthouse, whose four great beams of many million candle-power chase each other round the horizon, perpetually cut off and renewed where they meet the screen on the landward side; and if the weather is thick, your nerves will be tried by the dismal groans of a pair of gigantic foghorns, properly, I believe, known as sirens, an ironic allusion to those classic ladies who lured mariners to destruction by the ravishing sweetness of their songs.

It is easy to imagine the terrors of this coast to the sailors in earlier times, entering the Channel with no hope of friendly warnings, and knowing that the Cornish villagers regarded a lucrative wreck as a special gift of Providence, and were not averse to making the gift doubly sure by burning false flares to delude their victims, a barbarous custom which even Wesley himself, at the height of his revivalist powers, could not succeed in eradicating. But to arc-light and horn, modern science adds the greater security of the "wireless" and the submarine bell, and now there is no darker side to the salute with which this outpost of England welcomes the coming and speeds the parting ship.

R. P. J.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

PROFESSOR SCHÄFER'S ADDRESS

ON

"THE NATURE, ORIGIN, AND MAINTENANCE OF LIFE."

As so often happens, with lectures and works alike, Professor Schäfer's title to this lecture has excited a controversy which the lecture itself scarcely warrants.

Professor Schäfer, who graduated in 1874, has held a professorship in physiology and histology (the study of tissues with the aid of the microscope) for over twenty years, holding in turn this position at probably the two greatest colleges in the British Isles for this subject—University College, London, and Edinburgh. He is joint editor of the standard text book of advanced anatomy (Quain's), and has been so for twenty or more years; and has more recently compiled a text book of advanced physiology that has as high a reputation. Comment is needless. If a man with this past behind him of a cautious, careful student, with a great reputation to lose, had made any really startling proposition on the nature and origin of life, it should justly have aroused the keenest public attention; but, in reality, his lecture was little more than a careful survey of the subject. Yet even as such it might be of great interest to all human beings, except that the lecture was of a rather technical character.

We may divide his exposition of the subject into three categories:—(1) His estimate of the known facts of to-day; (2) what he conceives to be the necessary inferences to be drawn from these; (3) concessions that he makes in his thought about the word life, and beyond these a few remarks on the religious significance of his thought may be made.

(1) The Known Facts of To-day.

First, he asserts that, in his opinion, there is no satisfactory evidence existing, and none that he would give even serious consideration to, that assumes that life can at present be produced from non-life. This he is quite emphatic upon.

Second, he admits that there is no evidence for the evolution of the non-living into the living. This is a noticeable admission, in view of the somewhat reckless statements that followers of Haeckel and others have at times made. The break at present between life and non-life is, as he perceives, a real and unbridged one.

Third, he considers—and I should think no competent authority could possibly deny this—that our chemical knowledge of organic substances has increased enormously in recent years, and that this increase of knowledge takes us appreciably nearer to the problem of life itself.*

These three conclusions must, I think, be accepted by us all as sound science.

* A modern text-book limited entirely to this subject runs into over 2,000 pages, and thirty years ago perhaps fifty would have been sufficient.

(2) The Necessary Inferences to be drawn from Modern Facts.

He objects strongly to the use of such words as neo-vitalistic, and justly points out that the addition neo- to a proved unscientific assumption does not make it scientific, and quotes with approval Professor Mendola's criticism of a certain school of thought that over certain subjects uses the word mystery, or misuses it, and labels it "Eternal—No thoroughfare." He rightly insists that no scientific mind will ever permit of any subject being barred except by the natural difficulties of the subject itself.

He suggests, also, that life could not have sprung into being, but must have evolved by slow, imperceptible, or by abrupt but still ascertainable degrees, from the non-living to the living.

And we must for ever set aside . . . "as devoid of scientific foundation, the idea of immediate supernatural intervention in the first production of life."

Interpreted broadly, these propositions seem to me to be as irrefutable as his three cautious conclusions as to the state of biological science to-day, above alluded to.

(3) Concessions and Affirmations.

The real difficulty of the Professor's address lies in its use of the word life. He says his conclusions about ". . . 'life' must not be taken to apply to the conception to which the word 'soul' is attached," and if by soul he means any form of psychic life or sentient existence, however dim, in any lowly animal form, as well as in the highest, then, I think, he makes a very useful and necessary distinction, badly needed in both scientific and religious thought. He is not, however, quite clear in his use of this word, but if he means this, then we can go with him in believing "that living matter* must have owed its origin to causes similar in character to those which have been instrumental in producing all other forms of matter in the universe." This leaves the door wide open for the belief, itself to be tested by science, that mind may be only associated with matter, and may be distinct from it; and this is all that any religious mind is primarily interested in.† Perhaps, on our part, we might do a little positive thinking of a similar nature, and always use the terms mind, soul, and spirit as expressions of the same essence mind; soul and spirit being more emotional words, beautiful and necessary for religion, but meaning the same as mind in science, except that soul has in addition an individual application meaning the I or Me in us all.

I cannot help feeling a little astonishment that this mild, cautious statement should have made many religious people take up a rather antagonistic attitude, and can only conclude that it is because they have read an unfair report of the address rather than the address itself.

There are, however, several very interesting points which this treatment of the subject raises. Are we, for instance, to look upon the plant world as being explainable solely on a chemical or chemico-physiological basis, and to frankly exclude any form of the psychic side from our thought? If so, then the early beginnings of consciousness will have to be sought by other tests than those usually applied. What are to be these tests? But such questions and difficulties are not religious but scientific ones. What his address does, in fact, is to place the plant world nearer to the non-living, and to some extent to force us to take a different estimate of consciousness in the animal kingdom. Curious plant reactions, like the tendency of plants to seek moisture and light; climbing plants, and their responses to supports by which they climb; the sensitive plant, and various insectivorous plant forms, all on this assumption are studied from the chemical rather than the psychical aspect. The student of the mind, and the religious student also, ought to feel an immense relief to be rid of a set of difficulties that are very serious, i.e., dim consciousness without a nervous system, or even proved nervous reaction; and the curious fact that in the plant world consciousness appears to spring up regardless of what one would expect from ordered mental development, almost fortuitously. The religious student, in addition, should feel that mind, removed from a lowly origin that took it dangerously near to an assumption that mind might be only a reaction of matter after all, is emancipated from a kind of material bondage. As far as we are concerned, the study of mind is thus set free from some of its ugliest embarrassments by what have appeared to be its early appearances in life (mind in the vegetable world and in very simple forms of animal existence), and this is all to the good.

The real difficulty will be a physiological rather than a religious one. Can the plant physiologist explain plant life solely on this chemical and physical basis? Can he interpret not this single change or that, but the co-ordination of them all, in a series of marvellous adaptations in one unity—the plant organism? But this is a question which must be left to the plant physiologist to answer. For religious students, and for mental students generally, it is scarcely too much to say that Professor Schäfer's attitude would lift the problem of the mind on to a higher plane, and nothing but good could arise out of such a clear recognition that life has inorganic and psychic origins, and that conscious life must be studied by mental and physical laws, and unconscious life only by physical, inorganic ones. If this could be generally accepted it might have many important bearings on religious life in the future, which might or might not be hopeful, according to the result of future research; but for the present, and probably afterwards, it would teach us all to think of mind as a more limited phenomenon in the living world, as a higher phenomenon, and quite possibly as a force, power, or many forces or beings, having a separate but related evolution to the differentiation of matter.

I am not sure, if one views the whole outlook of modern science, whether this admission by a scientist, who is a trained expert teacher of scientists, a teacher not of the people but of those who teach the people; I am not sure whether this admission of the problem of the soul as being a distinct problem from that of life is not one of the most significant admissions that science has made to religion; as significant as the scientific discovery that the religious feeling is natural to man; and shows the more friendly attitude that science and religion are coming to take up towards each other. But no friendship can be one-sided and last; and if religious teachers are willing to take all the approaches of that scientific mind in an unfriendly attitude, the growing friendliness of science is likely to be withdrawn, to the temporary or permanent danger of humanity.

J. LIONEL TAYLER.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE LIVING WAGE.

SIR,—In response to the appeal of Miss Gittins in last week's INQUIRER for a textbook on the above subject, permit me to mention Mr. Philip Snowden's work, "A Living Wage," just published by Hodder & Stoughton. There is a Fabian tract on "The Case for a Legal Minimum Wage," No. 128, one penny. The subject is discussed in Part II., chapter xiii., and in Part III., chapter iii., of the Webbs' "Industrial Democracy." The June number of the Crusade contains six articles dealing with the subject from various points of view. This is published at a penny by the National Committee for the Prevention of Destitution.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN EDWARDS.

Ons Huis, Darley Drive, West Derby,
October 6, 1912.

THE ABUSE OF LANGUAGE.

SIR,—If I may take my pen for a second time upon this subject, I would like to say that I did not need to be informed that there is a legitimate use of the word "shove." It was not to the right use, but the abuse of it, that I objected. I cannot help suspecting that its use was much commoner at one time—say in the days of Chaucer or even Shakespeare—than it is in these days, whilst it has become more vulgar in these than it was in those. I do not question its value as an expression of violent action towards an object possessing considerable inertia such as a human body, whether active or passive, or a sack of coals. But am I wrong in thinking that those who have a care for the dignity of speech or literature in our day, would for themselves restrict the application of it to instances of physical violence on the part of unmannerly persons? It is employed effectively for that purpose in the very passage of "Lyceidas"

* Note his use of the words "living matter," not consciousness.

† Some monists would dislike this dualistic attitude.

pointed out to me by your other correspondents. The poet depicts the intruding ruffian who will not enter by the door into the fold but will climb up by some other way, and when he is in, behaving like a blustering boor, will shove away his better who is worthy to be a true shepherd. Shakespeare's use of it, in the instance given by Mr. R. B. Drummond, is in keeping with that: justice is entitled to be honoured by all comers; yet blustering offence, relying on its gilded hand—more irresistible than a mailed fist or iron gauntlet—may dare to shove by justice. Another word quite as strong as "shove," and with nearly the same meaning, is "thrust." The choice between them in any given connection is a matter of taste and refinement. They are not synonymous, only by reason of their different customary associations. How would the former strike the ear, in the following instances, in which the translators of the Authorised Version have preferred the latter?—

"So Solomon shoved out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord"; "They shoved out Jephtha, and said . . . Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house"; "He that did his neighbour wrong, shoved him (Moses) away"; "When ye shall see Abraham . . . in the kingdom of God, and yourselves shoved out." Or in this (rex loq.)?—"Bind him hand and foot, and shove him out," where the translators' word is neither "shove," nor "thrust," but "cast."

I would ask Mr. Drummond, with deference, whether he really thinks that the author of "Lycidas" writing prose to-day would allow himself the phrase "to shove aside" in reference to the disposal of a claimant to the throne. I will not venture so far as to put the same question to Mr. Bloor; but him I would ask, with brotherly regard, whether he sincerely approves of the phrase "to quietly shove aside." The particular claimant referred to happened to be an unobtrusive little boy, only six years old, so that he was not "shoved" at all, but was as "quietly" left aside as was the crippled innocent of Jonathan the son of Saul. To my mind it would seem equally unfitting to speak of "quietly shoving" and of "softly shouting," though I doubt not that many a school-boy would appreciate both, as they certainly deserve a place in his own language along with such favourites as "awfully funny," "jolly nasty," and "ghastly pleased." I profess no objection to the use of such loose language by the boys themselves provided they change it for what is better in due time. But I think that the writers of their lesson books should make it a serious aim to impart to them a sub-conscious appreciation for dignified and fitting language by setting before them a fairly admirable example.

I am disappointed that no correspondent has offered an explanation of the origin and vogue of the much abused adjective referred to in my former letter. I beg leave to quote the explanation so far as it goes, and for what it may be worth, in Brewer's "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable," that it "arose from the association of folly and drunkenness, &c., with what are called 'bloods,' or aristocratic rowdies." A surprising instance of it is given from a letter written by a celebrated clergyman to a young lady so long ago as the reign of good Queen Anne!—Yours, &c.,

EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Cairncastle, September 30, 1912.

OUR FREE HERITAGE.

SIR,—It is right that preachers and speakers, in our commemoration of the year 1662, have done honour to the memory of both the men and the women who suffered then for conscience' sake. Our imagination is apt to dwell on the ejected ministers, and to overlook their wives, daughters and sisters, who refused to be "strong arguments against Nonconformity," and who surely must have been no less brave sharers in martyrdom for the cause of freedom. But there is no limit to the working of the spirit of liberty. We Free Church folk have the opportunity now to show the spirit of our Presbyterian ancestors and ancestresses in the present acute stage of the struggle to extend other forms of freedom to the women of our country. That spirit is, thank God, in some abundantly. It is significant that a very large number of the men and women (including descendants of ejected ministers) who walked in the procession to the Memorial Hall in Manchester last Saturday are keen fighters for the women's cause. It is significant that some hurried from a Suffrage procession in Oldham to join the march and meeting in memory of the 2,000.

May I break a natural and proper reserve in writing to the press, and say that to me personally, born and bred in a Free Christian home, and a descendant of an honoured ejected minister, that deeply impressive service in Cross-street Chapel brought, along with a wholesome humiliation of spirit, a fresh inspiration and courage not only to be a more faithful Free Church woman, but to go on doing a mite of sacrifice for the freedom of my sex, and the "common cause"? For how can we women of the Free Churches, if we are wholly true to our heritage, help claiming an "open door," and "comprehension" for men and women alike equally, not only in the Church, but in political, industrial, and social life?—Yours, &c.,

EMILY H. SMITH.

63, Birchfields-road, Rusholme,
Manchester, October 10, 1912.

"THE FUTURE OF NONCONFORMITY."

SIR,—At the fine meeting at the Memorial Hall last Saturday, I made a speech (very hurried, imperfect and maimed) under the title "The Future of Nonconformity." The President courteously suggested I should write or get written a history on the lines so summarily indicated. That suggestion of his may well have been but a polite echo of what I had myself said. But I have since received such varied testimony to the relevancy and importance and pertinency of the ideas thrown out, that I purpose an elaboration of my notes. This project would, in effect, amount to a short treatise on "Comprehension, and the Future of Nonconformity: The History of a Movement (1662-1912)."

May I have the courtesy of your columns to ask my hearers of Saturday, who may be interested, whether as experts or learners, if they will kindly give me their own thoughts on the content and scope of such a history. The expert is desired to test the validity of my inferences; and the intelligent Church-member may be of even more value in outlining the kind of subject he would wish to be treated. Of course, a preliminary chapter would be necessary to put the general reader in a position to appreciate the condition of affairs in 1660-1662; and also, what was not necessary for my immediate theme on Saturday, a chapter on "The Unitarian Development."—Yours, &c.

H. D. ROBERTS.

123, Bedford-street, Liverpool,
October 7, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

ANDRÉ CHÉNIER.

André Chénier, Poésies. London: J. M. Dent & Co. 1s. net.

THIS interesting book recalls the name of the earliest and most classical lyrical poet of France. At first in the Army, he afterwards became secretary to the French Ambassador in London, and remained there three years. Returning to Paris in 1791, he fell under the influence of that tremendous time, and entered into political life, writing for the press. Falling under the suspicion of the Committee of Public Safety, he was arrested and conducted to the prison of St. Lazare. His imprisonment lasted four months, and it was during this incarceration that he wrote some of his finest poems. His poem "La Jeune Captive," excited the admiration of Charlotte Brontë, who pronounced it to be the only real poem in the French language. It drew its inspiration from the case of a young girl of sixteen, Mademoiselle de Coigny, who, like the rest of the prisoners, was in hourly expectation of the scaffold.

His long detention inspired his father with the courage to approach the Committee of Public Safety with an appeal for mercy. He had been forgotten, but his father's unfortunate plea reminded that terrible body of his existence. The next morning at nine he appeared before the tribunal, and his head fell into the basket before night. It seemed the irony of fate, for he was one of the last batch executed. Public opinion was changing, and an attempt was made to overset the tumbrils and liberate the prisoners. This was on the 7th Thermidor; on the 9th the Terror fell, and the rest of the prisoners, including the Young Captive, were released.

Another poet describes his fate as the most unhappy and the most inexplicable blow of the expiring Terror. He was thirty-one years of age, and was just freeing himself from the too great influence of classicalism. His genius led the way for the variety and strength of the lyrical poems of his successors, notably Victor Hugo and Lamartine.

The Boys' Own Book of Hymns and Songs has been issued, for use by the Boys' Own Brigade, Boys' Clubs, and other meetings where boys congregate. It contains 84 hymns, four short Orders of Service, and a selection of songs. The hymns are in the main quite familiar, though five were composed specially for the book by the late Rev. J. P. Hopps, and the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, J. L. Haigh, H. W. Hawkes, and E. Ceredig Jones. Hymns of the strenuous and martial order are a little predominant, and we welcome some recognition that a boy's religion has its quieter and more reflective side. The short responsive services strike us as admirable for their purpose, but they would have been enriched if a place had been found for the Lord's Prayer and possibly for some alternative collects. The songs at the end include many old favourites, and a few new ones by J. L. Haigh, which will probably sing their way into the heart in the good comradeship of the camp on summer evenings. The book is published at the price of sixpence, and may be had from the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, 48, Ruskinwalk, Herne Hill, S.E.

LITERARY NOTES.

Public Opinion, under the able editorship of Mr. Percy L. Parker, continues its useful career as an admirable summary of the news and journalism of the week. With the beginning of its fifty-second year it promises some special new features, and will in future present its readers with a series of special articles by well-known writers. Among the contributors to last week's issue were Sir Harry Johnston, Mrs. Katharine Tynan, and Mr. A. C. Benson.

WITH its present issue our lively and picturesque contemporary, the Bookman, attains its majority, and begins its twenty-second year. It has been not the least successful of the many enterprises to which Sir William Robertson Nicoll has acted as guide, philosopher and friend. The October number has been specially enlarged, its chief article being "The Triumph of Whistler," by Mr. Joseph Pennell, with numerous interesting illustrations.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE will add two important volumes to their Crown Theological Library this autumn, "Protestantism and Progress," by Professor Ernest Troeltsch, and "Bible Reading in the Early Church," by Professor Harnack, being Vol. V. of his New Testament Studies.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Williams & Norgate's other new books are a translation of "The Initiation into Philosophy," by Professor Emile Faguet; "Character and Life," a symposium arranged and edited by Mr. Percy L. Parker, which will include contributions by Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. Harold Begbie, Mr. Walter Crane, and the late Dr. Emil Reich; "An Interpretation of Professor Eucken's Philosophy," by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, and "Religious Liberty," by Professor Francesco Ruffini, with an introduction by Professor J. B. Bury, a new volume in the Theological Translation Library.

* * *

MESSRS. STEPHEN SWIFT & Co. announce several new books of philosophical and sociological interest, including "An Introduction to Metaphysics," by Professor Bergson, translated by Mr. T. E. Hulme; "Four Essays on Religion," by Professor Eucken, translated by Dr. Tudor Jones; "Pathways to Religion," by Dr. Tudor Jones; "Modernism and the Relation between Religion and Philosophy," by Professor G. Gentile, translated by Mr. C. de Lisle Burns; and "Reflections on Violence," by M. Georges Sorel, translated by Mr. T. E. Hulme, with an introductory note by Mr. Graham Wallas.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—The Mechanistic Conception of Life: Jacques Loeb, Ph.D., Sc.D. 6s. net.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK:—The Person of Jesus Christ: H. R. Mackintosh, D.D. 10s. 6d.

MR. FRANCIS GRIFFITHS:—The God which is Man, the Message of Human Idealism: R. Dimsdale Stocker. 5s. net.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON:—Tamsie: Rosamond Napier. 6s. Bible Types of Modern Women: The Rev. W. Mackintosh Mackey, B.D. 6s. The Rock of the Ravens: John A. Steuart. 6s. The Lee Shore: Rose Macaulay. 6s.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.:—St. Francis of Assisi, Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C. 12s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.:—Among my Books: Frederic Harrison. Price 7s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. JAMES NISBET & Co.:—Golden Grain, Thoughts of Many Minds: Compiled by Lady Agatha Russell. 2s. net.

THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS:—The Ability to Converse: Stanley M. Bligh. 2s. net.

MESSRS. WATTS & Co.:—Twelve Years in a Monastery: Joseph McCabe. 6d. net.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE:—The Latter Day Saints, a Study of the Mormons: Ruth Kauffman and R. W. Kauffman. 10s. 6d. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—Hypnotism and Disease: H. Creighton Miller, M.A., M.D. 5s. net. The Decline of Aristocracy: Arthur Ponsonby. 7s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Review of Theology and Philosophy, Cosmobiology, The Vineyard.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.
(1642-1727.)

I.

"O praise the Lord . . . all ye heavens. Let them praise the name of the Lord. He hath given them a law which shall not be broken."

HAVE you ever wondered why it is that the sun and moon keep always at the same distance, or what appears the same distance, from the earth—why the sun does not sometimes go so far off that we are all frozen up, and then come so near that everything on earth is set on fire—or why the moon keeps just near enough to give us light? This is not so easily explained as you might suppose, if you have never really thought about it. For let us think of some other things that move. A bird flying through the air, a fish swimming in water, a stone thrown from your hand—none of these keep at the same distance from the earth or from the things which they pass: sometimes they are nearer, sometimes farther. And you know that things fall towards the earth. An apple when it drops off the tree falls downwards, and so is always lessening the distance between itself and the earth; it cannot hang in the air at the same distance above the ground, as you could make a ball hang if you had a string tied to it, and fastened it to the branch of a tree, or as the apple itself hung when it was fastened by its stalk to the tree. Now you know that the sun and moon and the earth and stars are like great balls, only many million times heavier than any ball or any apple. Yet you can see no string by which they are hung in their places. What, then, keeps them in their positions? All these questions must have come into the head of a little boy who was afterwards the great Sir Isaac Newton, who lived to find out, by many years of study and by using the wonderful brains which God had given him, the "law which shall not be broken," the law by which the sun and moon and all the stars are kept in their own paths as if by invisible strings.

Isaac Newton was born in the county of Lincolnshire, at a small village called Woolsthorpe, six miles from Grantham. He was born on Christmas Day, 1642, just while the Civil Wars were going on. King Charles, if you remember, was beheaded in 1648, so Isaac Newton would be a little boy of six years old at the time. The wars do not seem to have come near the quiet village where the Newtons lived, for we hear of Isaac going to the village school till he was twelve years old, and his step-father went on quietly managing his farm, and expecting that Isaac would become a farmer too when he grew up. But there were other things for this boy to do in the world, as we shall see. When he was twelve, he was sent to the Grammar School at Grantham, and there he began to show what he was meant for. We are told that "instead of playing among the other boys, when out of school, he always busied himself in making knick-knacks and models of wood in many kinds, for which purpose he had got little saws, hatchets, hammers, and a whole shop." He made a water-clock, the hands of which were turned by a piece of wood which rose and fell according to the force of the water; he made, too, a windmill, that was turned by a mouse; he made kites and sundials, and invented a four-wheeled carriage, to be moved by the rider (it must have been something like a tricycle). As he was always thinking of these things, he was often backward in his class, and was thought a dunce at his lessons, and one day a bigger boy tried to bully him, but Newton fought him pluckily and beat him. I suppose this made Isaac feel he was a stronger fellow than he knew he was before, for from that day he began to work harder, and he rose to be the head boy of the school. He stayed at this school for three years. When he was fifteen he was taken away from it, as his mother wanted him to be a farmer. But it was soon seen that he had no turn for the work. When he was sent into the cattle market at Grantham with an old farming-man, to buy or sell live stock, he would be found at a bookseller's stall, reading any book he could pick up. On the day when Cromwell died, there was a great storm of wind, and Isaac Newton was seen jumping with all his strength, first with the wind and then against it. This must have puzzled his friends until he explained that he wanted to measure the force of the wind, by comparing the length of these jumps with that of a jump made on a calm day. This was in 1658, and Newton was now 16.

His uncle was a scholar, and noticing from all these little signs how fond Isaac was of study, he persuaded his mother to send him to Trinity College, Cambridge; so here Newton went in 1661, instead of minding the farm and buying and selling cattle; and very grateful he must have been to his uncle, for there was nothing he liked in the world so much as study and knowledge. So he set himself to lead a very hard-working life, and from then until the day of his death, when he was over 80 years old, I suppose he was one of the busiest men.

He studied such difficult things that you and I would think them harder than a little child thinks learning to read, and you know that seemed hard enough! Yet Newton not only understood these difficult books perfectly, he went further than they did, and wrote books of his own which said things which the writers of these other books had never thought of, and so he made us know much more than we ever did before. One of the first things he did was to read and think about Light—the light of the sun—and he made out what no one had ever done before: that it is not all one colour—white, or yellow, as you might think; but that by making a ray of light pass through a piece of glass with sharp corners and angles, called a prism, it can be broken up into all the parts it is composed of, so that we can see that it contains all the colours of the rainbow—red, orange, yellow, green, purple, indigo, and violet. In the rainbow it is the drops of water which break up the light in this way into all the different colours, and no doubt it was that which made Newton think that light could always be divided into these colours if the right way were found of doing so. For what is a rainbow but sunlight, and where do the colours come from if not from the sunlight?

It may seem strange to you that light can look white if it is in reality made up of all these different colours, but you can see for yourselves that it is so by a very simple plan. Cut a round piece of cardboard, and divide it into seven equal parts, colouring each of the parts with one of the colours of the rainbow. Then bore a hole in the middle of the paper, put it on a top and make the top spin very fast. You will see that the paper looks a greyish-white, although when the top has stopped you can again see all the colours. For some reason which it would be difficult to explain, white is white, or, in other words, light is light, because it is made of a mixture of these seven colours. Well, when Newton understood this clearly by having made many experiments with light (an experiment means trying some plan, such as I have just told you to try with a top, and repeating it several times to make sure that you are not mistaken), he gave lectures to the students of Cambridge about the spectrum, as these rainbow colours are called, and about many other things having to do with light, which is a very difficult and interesting study, needing a knowledge of mathematics—the science of number, and optics—the science of eye-sight, in anyone who wishes to understand it. Newton had this knowledge, and very few have ever lived who have had so wonderful a brain for mathematics as he. It was this which helped him to his great discovery—the discovery of the law that keeps the sun and moon, the earth and all the planets and stars in their paths. He had been led to think of it several years before he gave these lectures on light, by, it is believed, a very common sight—the sight of an apple falling from a tree. This was in 1665, at which time he would be 23 years old, and that is early for anyone to make such a great discovery; but when you remember how clever Newton was to calculate the force of the wind as he did when he was only 16, you will not wonder so much.

In this year, 1665, the plague was very bad in Cambridge (you may remember that it came a year later to London, and that Milton went into the country on account of it) and all the students were sent to their homes so that they might be less likely to catch it. Newton went back to Lincolnshire, and it is supposed to have been at this time, while he was sitting in the orchard, that, seeing an apple drop to the ground, he began to think what it was that made things fall to the earth, and to calculate how long it takes them to fall from different heights.

You have most likely all of you seen a magnet, and you know how, if a piece of iron is held at a little distance from it, the iron seems to be pulled towards the magnet, though you can see nothing that draws them together. And perhaps you know that the further off you hold the iron, the less strongly will the magnet pull it, so that at a certain distance the magnet has no power to attract the iron, as it is called. Well, Newton found that the earth acts as a magnet, and pulls towards itself—towards its centre—all things that are on its surface or within such a distance of it that it still has the power to attract them. And not only the earth, but the sun, moon and stars, and, in a lesser degree, everything that has weight has this power, so that even two books on the table are drawn towards each other, but are held back because the table, being larger, draws them more strongly to it. But I must tell you more about this next week, for such a wonderful discovery cannot be explained in a few words.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

COMMEMORATION OF THE EJECTION OF 1662 IN MANCHESTER.

THE above Commemoration took place on Saturday last, October 5. The united service, held at 3.30 p.m. in Cross-street Chapel, brought together one of the largest congregations seen in Cross-street for many years, between five and six hundred being present. It was a cheering sight, and in itself no small testimony to the strength of the appeal made by the memory of the ejected ministers and their brave stand for conscience. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., conducted an inspiring service of devotion and remembrance, and preached a sermon worthy of the occasion.

After describing in outline the "sad and glorious" event of 1662, and reminding his hearers that not all the sufferers or the bigots were on one side, he referred specially to the firmness and faithfulness of the Ejected during the long years of persecution preceding the Act of Toleration, and to the broadly inclusive temper bequeathed by the English Presbyterians to the next generation, a temper which, doubtless, led to freedom of trust-deeds, and so to the developments which had marked that Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers. In "their own way," they were worshipping where the Fathers had worshipped; and, reciting the names of ejected ministers upon their records, he asked if the present generation were "giving diligence to keep the unity of the faith," amid the necessary changes of thought and activity in our day. "The cause of the soul's liberty," he said, "may advance but slowly—has it not been already won for us? Upon this day we reconsecrate ourselves to its service, not (God forbid) in any foolish self-gratulation—we have more need of contrition and tears—but as men who realise both the wonder and the peril of the race that is set before them, and who would run it, as did the Fathers, looking unto Jesus."

After service a procession was formed to walk to the Memorial Hall, Albert-square. The President of the Assembly, Mr. J. Wigley, and the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson and W. G. Tarrant walked at the head; the ministers present came next, about fifty in number, many wearing their gowns or academical robes, and then came the main procession which was joined practically by all who were present at the service. When the head of the procession reached the Memorial Hall, the extreme end had not yet left the chapel. It was an army without banners, but very impressive as seen from the steps of the Memorial Hall by the first arrivals there.

PUBLIC MEETING.

A public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall at 6 p.m., the President of the Assembly in the chair. The hall was crowded to overflowing, and the proceedings opened with the singing of Richard Baxter's hymn "Ye holy angels bright." After prayer by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., the chairman gave his address. The right note was immediately struck in the reminder that the object of the meeting was not to keep open an old wound or to wave a flag or beat a drum. It was to call attention to the event of 250 years ago, and to receive some lasting impression from the memory of it. The ejection of 1662 had proved to be a mistake. Men could not be coerced into uniformity, and persecution had but generated life. Nonconformity had been born, and the inalienable right of private judgment secured. Their testimony that night, however, was not needless. Credal tests were still applied in some of the older universities, and in many teachers' training colleges. There were still credal barriers between the Evangelical Free Churches and their own. Their denomination stood for freedom from tests, from creeds, from dogma and authority. In the region of the soul there must be no authority between the soul and God.

THE REV. H. E. DOWSON ON "OUR HERITAGE."

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., on rising to speak on "Our Heritage," was greeted with prolonged applause, a testimony to the loving esteem in which he is held. The portraits around the walls—Beard, Gaskell, Steinthal, Rawson—suggested a fitting starting-point for the address which was full of memories and reminiscences of good men, and leaders of the past. We had not the same grit to-day, said Mr. Dowson: Our greatest heritage was the deep religious devotion of our fathers. He recognised that there was a great deal of earnestness of spirit and generosity among our people to-day. £35,000 had now been promised to the Sustentation Fund. That did not look like a slackening of interest. He was thankful for it. They had to be true to the spirit of the open door. That meant constant growth and development of thought, and it meant a welcome to all who liked to come and worship with us.

SPEECH BY MR. JOHN DENDY.

Mr. John Dendy, speaking on behalf of the Memorial Hall Trustees, explained what it was for which the Memorial Hall stood. It was erected in 1862 in commemoration of the bicentenary of the two thousand ejected ministers, who on Saint Bartholomew's Day, 1662, so nobly proved their fidelity to conscience by resigning their livings in the English Church. The trust was perfectly open for religious, philanthropic, and educational purposes. The two great principles kept in mind were to honour the noble dead and to preserve the liberties of the living. The Hall stood for both, and neither could be dispensed with. Memorials and celebrations too often rekindled animosities and perpetuated feuds best forgotten. The promoters of the meeting would rather have forgone it than have done anything that tended in that direction. It would be a fine thing when all the Churches were able to unite to commemorate the heroes of all. Why did they reverence the memory of the two thousand? Not because they had fully made their own the ideal of liberty that was ours. A few might have possessed it. It was not in its fulness the ground and inspiration of their action. But they had played their part in bringing about the present state of things. They builded better than they knew. Perhaps if some of them were to come back they might say, "Well! You have got your liberty. What are you doing with it?" Liberty, unless it led to nobler life, was empty. The ejected were sometimes called the founders of Nonconformity. They were not that. That would not in itself have been sufficient to entitle them to our reverence and regard. There was evidence that they looked and thought and hoped again to join the national Church. It was no satisfaction to them to be separated from it. They were right. The object of our life and thought and effort was not surely dissension and controversy, but agreement and co-operation, if and whenever possible. It had been the mistake and misfortune of some Dissenters that they gloried merely in differing from others. As if dissent were a virtue in itself; as if spiritual isolation were better than spiritual communion. That spirit was not fruitful. The dissent of the ejected was forced upon them. The true greatness of these men, the true lesson of their lives, was that what they clearly saw it was not right to do, that they would not do. It was on that account that they honoured them.

But it was idle to gather there to celebrate the great deed of 1662 if they themselves did not go away inspired to nobler life and action. He remembered many, during his long connection with the Memorial Hall, who with life and work upheld the great traditions of the past. He was thankful that not in their Church only, but in every Church men of that type were found. They looked with confidence to the time when in all the Churches that type of man would predominate. When that time came the walls and divisions of the Churches would be wearing very thin. The Spirit of God, which was love, would pass freely between them. The differences and dissensions which mocked the relations of the Churches would fade away in great and glorious unity.

Dr. Mellone, the next speaker, had for his subject

"DISSENTING ACADEMIES."

It was not, he said, until well on in the eighteenth century that Nonconformists could exercise their teaching function in safety. In the third decade of that century

Doddridge was prosecuted, and the prosecution was only stopped at the intervention of George II.—one point at least in that Monarch's favour. There was a vital need, especially in the north, for institutions where higher education might be acquired.

In the darkest hour of those early days, in 1670, the year of the second Conventicle Act, Richard Frankland, whose name was worthy of all honour, began his splendid work. He started a Dissenting Academy in Yorkshire, and continued it during the remaining twenty-eight years of his life, migrating from place to place when necessary. Frankland's students, it should be noted, followed him through his migrations. The academies of which this was a type were not theological in the modern sense. They arose out of the need for higher education. They prepared men for various professions, and Churchmen as well as Nonconformists made use of them. The men who were at the head of these academies were men of incredible labours. They had to be many-sided, and they placed all their knowledge and ability at the service of the young men who came to them. Frankland's example was followed up and down the country, and there were great numbers of such institutions before many years had passed. One man, or at most two, were responsible for the whole work in these academies. Up to the time of Doddridge the lectures were in Latin. He first began to lecture in English. He encouraged the study of the newer science, theology and philosophy. Doddridge and tutors like him were Calvinists in theology. They were strictly orthodox. But they were not bigots. They encouraged their students to read books to which they were diametrically opposed in doctrine. Their methods might be obsolete, but their spirit should be imitated. It might be thought that the academies were too much of the one-man type. The students knew, however, how to guard against that. They could migrate and seek the teacher they wanted. They were led to a tutor, also, not merely by a desire for his teaching, but that they might have the advantage of his private library, which was always at the disposal of students at a time when public libraries were scarce. These academies did pioneer work. Their methods were dictated by the actual needs of the time. Their principle of the open door was inevitable. Thomas Binney once said that he did not look to see all the walls between the Churches done away, but he did want them to be lowered so that all good men might shake hands over them. That was the right note. The Faculty of Divinity in the Manchester University in the strictest and most literal sense freely imparted theological knowledge without insisting on theological doctrine. Its success was a sign of the times. Each denominational college might keep its own point of view, and yet affiliate with the colleges of other denominations in friendly association.

THE REV. H. D. ROBERTS ON COMPREHENSION.

The Rev. H. D. Roberts in a vigorous address championed the Presbyterian forefathers as comprehensive and catholic in spirit, even before they were persecuted. The topic announced was "The Future of Nonconformity," but the speaker dwelt mostly on the history of the past. He contended that there was no shred of evidence for the statement that the Presbyterians were not comprehensive, and quoted from Philip and Matthew Henry to illustrate his points. Coming at the close to the future of Nonconformity, he affirmed that in the future they would all be Nonconformists. State establishments must go. They were going, not because of sectarian opposition, but in the light of quickened religious sensitiveness. There would not be one Church, but there would be fewer denominations. They were celebrating the 250th anniversary of the ejection, and it might seem that they were ploughing a lonely furrow. It was not so. They were making the highway along which the multitudes would come securely. The meeting closed with the singing of the hymn "We limit not the truth of God," and the pronouncing of the benediction by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES. ANNUAL MEETING AT OXFORD.

THE twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of the Non-Subscribing Churches of London and the South-Eastern Counties was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Tuesday, October 8, between seventy and eighty ministers and delegates being present. The proceedings opened with a service in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. Dr. W. Tudor Jones, who preached, took for his text Galatians vi. 8 and 9. The sermon was an earnest plea for the discovery of the divine within as something deeper than the conclusions of the intellect. When that discovery was made by a man or woman everything was changed, for a quality had been brought into existence which made life seem altogether different from what had been previously experienced. This was quite unlike a mere belief in God. It was a revelation which broke a man's self-sufficiency once and for ever. It was absolutely necessary for them to get this consciousness in order to bring them to their senses, and stir the will into creative action. There must be conversion. Nothing great could happen in their lives unless there was great energy, and concentration of mind and body and spirit. The very essence of Christianity from its earliest beginnings was that a change took place in the soul which was a revelation from on high, altering the whole aspect and movement of life.

At the close of the service the visitors were entertained to luncheon in the Lecture Hall. The Rev. H. Gow took this opportunity of congratulating the Provincial Assembly on the number of representatives present, and expressed their gratitude to Principal Carpenter and the authorities of the college for their kind welcome and hospitality. They felt it was a great privilege to be there in a place which had become a sort of Mecca to them by reason of its splendid traditions.

Dr. Carpenter, in responding, said that it was a special pleasure to them to welcome the members of the Assembly, as they often felt their isolation in Oxford from the churches which cherished the same sympathies and traditions. Dr. Drummond added a few words of cordial welcome, and referred to the great purpose which the Provincial Assembly was serving in breaking down the barriers of isolation which separated them from one another in their work, and so often tended to narrowness of life and sympathies. They each contributed something to the good of all, the weak as well as the strong, and very often the quiet, unobtrusive, simple life was able to lay the best gifts on the altar of the community. At the present time the religious life was beset with difficulties, and men's minds were full of doubts and fears. It might not be possible to solve these difficulties, but the one effort of their churches should be to waken in men the consciousness of all that was deepest and truest and holiest within themselves. They might rest in the valley of doubt in the deep trust that they were still being led on, and that the darkness had its own blessings. At last they would attain to the saints' rest, where there was no doubt, no sin, and all their consciousness was lost in the consciousness of God.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

During the afternoon visits were paid to some of the Colleges, and at 4.30 the annual meeting was held in the Library of Manchester College, the Rev. H. Gow, President of the Assembly, in the chair. Letters of regret at being unable to attend were received from the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Dr. Blake Odgers, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, Hon. Sec., read the minutes, and called the roll of ministers and delegates. The report was taken as read.

In the absence of Mr. F. le B. Lawford, the Treasurer, Mr. Cooper made a few comments on the financial statement, which was also taken as read, and expressed the gratitude of the committee to the congregation at Essex Church for their collection of £100 on Assembly Sunday, without which the finances would not have been in so satisfactory a condition. The Rev. W. H. Drummond, Minister of the Assembly, then read his report, which dealt with some of the principles and needs underlying the religious work of the Assembly and referred to the activities of several of the smaller churches in detail.

The Rev. H. Gow moved the adoption of the reports, and welcomed the representatives of kindred societies who were present in cordial terms. As they had a long agenda to deal with, he did not propose to deliver what was called a President's address, or to refer in detail to the work of the Assembly as he had done last year. He felt, however, that without moving special resolutions, they would like to express their approval of the resolutions contained in the report recording the deep sense of the loss they had sustained in the death of Mr. John Harrison and Mr. J. S. Beale. Mr. Harrison, whom they held in deep affection, was beloved everywhere; his helpfulness wherever he touched life and humanity was well known, but nowhere would he be more missed than in the work of the Provincial Assembly. Mr. Beale had accepted the invitation to become President without knowing very much about the Assembly, but they all felt how very quick he was to grasp, not only the mere business details, which must have seemed small to one accustomed to things on a large scale, but the principles which underlay their work, and to which he brought much sympathy and insight. A hearty welcome would be accorded to three new ministers who had been admitted to the Assembly, the Rev. T. F. Brockway, of Woolwich, the Rev. D. W. Robson, of Peckham, and the Rev. H. B. Speight, who has now taken up his work as Assistant Minister at Essex Church. Mr. Charles Hawksley seconded the resolution, and added that he hoped they would do something to support the National Conference in the work of increasing the ministers' stipends, in regard to which Mr. Ronald Jones had asked leave to move a resolution.

The Rev. J. Harwood, on behalf of the kindred societies, responded to the President's welcome, and added a few words explaining what had been done in regard to the resolution concerning ministers' stipends which was passed at the meeting of the National Conference at Birmingham. They had been very successful in their appeal up to the present time, and the total received now stood at £36,000. It would be necessary later on to make a wider appeal to the members of the churches. They had felt the death of Mr. John Harrison not only as a great personal loss, but on account of the difficulties with which they were faced when they were deprived of the help he had promised them in collecting the large sum of £50,000, but the results of their efforts so far certainly did not tend to discourage them. Those who had contributed to the fund had done so not from a sense of duty, but with real gladness, and this had considerably lightened their task. The Rev. J. A. Pearson also responded, and gave some details of the work which is going on at Leytonstone, Muswell Hill, Greenwich, and other districts in and around London.

It was then moved by the Rev. F. K. Freeston that the thanks of the Assembly should be given to the President and retiring officers, and that the following should be elected for the next year:—President, Mr. E. Worthington; treasurer, Mr. F. Lawford; auditor, Mr. I. Lister; secretary, the Rev. Gordon Cooper. It was agreed that a message of sympathy should be sent to Mr. Lister in his serious illness. The President proposed that the Rev. W. H. Drummond should be the preacher at the next annual meeting of the Assembly, and the Rev. F. H. Jones was subsequently elected to be supporter. The Rev. Charles Roper moved the election of Mr. E. Worthington, the Rev. H. Gow, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, the Rev. J. Harwood, and Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., as representatives on the Southern Advisory Committee. This was seconded by the Rev. J. M. Connell and carried. The President moved that the congregation at Chichester be added to the Roll; seconded by the Rev. G. Lansdown, and carried. Mr. Gow also moved that the Rev. J. Wood, and the Rev. J. F. Parmiter, be elected members of the Assembly, Mr. Fyson seconding the resolution.

The following resolution was then moved from the chair, on behalf of the Committee :

“The Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, feeling deeply the evils of the White Slave Traffic and the need of further power for dealing with the persons who make it their business to deceive and corrupt young women, urges the Government to take immediate steps to enable the law more effectively to capture and punish the miscreants who are engaged in the organised and hideous trade of corrupting the young and innocent.”

This was seconded by Dr. Carpenter, and passed unanimously, the secretary being instructed to forward a copy of the resolution to the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary.

The Rev. F. H. Jones moved :—

“That the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, realising the necessity for unceasing watchfulness in regard to the treatment of native races by the more powerful nations, and having in view the unspeakable iniquity and cruelty that has been shown to exist in connection with the rubber trade, more especially at the present time in the Putumayo District of South America, where British subjects imported for the purpose have taken an active part in the atrocious cruelty inflicted under the direction of the agents of a company having its office in London, urges the Government to exert its power to put a stop to such practices and secure protection and justice for all men wherever England has either responsibility or influence.”

Mr. A. Wilson seconded the resolution, which was carried, and instructions were given for it to be forwarded to the Prime Minister and Sir E. Grey. It was moved by the Rev. W. H. Drummond :—“That it be an instruction to the committee to consider such alterations in the Rules of the Assembly as would make it possible for lay-preachers to be admitted to membership so long as they are on the active list of the Lay Preachers' Union.” This was seconded by Dr. Tudor Jones and carried. Another resolution which was proposed by Mr. Ronald Jones, and seconded by Dr. Carpenter, was as follows :—“That the Assembly cordially commends to the congregation within the province the appeal agreed to by the National Conference that is being made on behalf of the enlarged Sustentation Fund.” This brought the meeting to a close.

In the evening a paper on “Citizenship and the Churches,” which will appear in our next issue, was read by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, D.D., and a discussion followed in which Dr. Carpenter, who occupied the chair, the Rev. James Harwood, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. E. Worthington, the Rev. H. Gow, and the Rev. Charles Roper took part.

THE HIGH PAVEMENT CHAPEL, NOTTINGHAM.

FAREWELL TO THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

On Sunday, September 29, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas preached for the last time as the minister of the High Pavement Chapel to large congregations. On the following evening a social meeting was held in the schoolrooms, to give the members an opportunity of bidding him and Mrs. Thomas farewell. Among a crowded gathering were the Revs. E. I. Fripp, W. Clark Lewis, J. H. M. Nolan, and F. Heming Vaughan. In the course of the evening the chair was taken by Mr. Warren, chairman of the Congregational Council, who expressed the gratitude of the congregation to Mr. Thomas for his work, alike in the chapel and its institutions and in the town; and offered their warmest wishes for his and Mrs. Thomas's happiness in their new life in Birmingham. He was followed by Mr. Wilford, one of the wardens, and Mr. J. T. Perry. Mr. Warren then, on behalf of the congregation, asked Mr. Thomas's acceptance of a cheque, and also presented Mrs. Thomas with a token of their affection and regard. At the same time he handed Mr. Thomas a number of volumes as a parting gift from the teachers and scholars of the Sunday school. Mr. Thomas, in reply, thanked the members of the congregation and all his friends for their good wishes and their gifts. He could not feel it was “good-bye,” and trusted he might often be able to come among them again. For upwards of twelve years he and Mrs. Thomas had been in Nottingham, and during all that time the congregation had dealt kindly and generously with them, and he thanked them deeply and sincerely. Wherever Providence might take them he should feel that the congregation and he belonged to one another, and would abide always together in the spirit of affection and goodwill. They had presented him with what had been called a “testimonial.” Warmly though he thanked them, he ventured to say that the best and truest testimonial to him would be that, through the disturbing period before them when they had no minister, they held firmly together, were more than ever constant in attendance at the services, and more than ever vigorous and enthusiastic in their work. Now was the time to show they were indeed a living Church. He prayed that God might bless them each and all.

A COURSE of six lectures on “The Labour Unrest and the Control of Industry” will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb at the King's Hall, King-street, Covent Garden, on Tuesday evenings, beginning October 29, at 8.30 p.m. The subjects include “The Legal Minimum Wage” and “Syndicalism and the General Strike.” Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., Mr. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P., Mr. Norman Angell, Mr. Winston Churchill, M.P., the Marquis of Tullibardine, M.P., and the Bishop of Winchester will be the Chairmen.

LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE.

The Autumn Assembly of the League will be held in London on October 21 and 22, and particulars of the meetings open to the public will be found in our advertising columns. We learn that the following new vice-presidents have accepted office :—Rt. Rev. Bishop of Hereford, Principal Estlin Carpenter, the Revs. Dr. Cheyne, Dr. Cobb, Dr. Washington Gladden, J. Glass, Mrs. Snowden, H. G. Chancellor, M.P., which indicates the unsectarian principle of the League.

Another feature of the Assembly is to be an interdenominational private conference of ministers. We understand that sufficient promises of support have been received to ensure a representative gathering. Any minister who would like to be present will please apply to the Hon. Secretary at 28, Red Lion-square, W.C., the new chief office of the League. Full programmes can also be had.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE INQUIRER FUND.

MISS DENDY, Hon. Secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded, acknowledges with thanks the following donations :—

	£	s.	d.
Miss D. Hadfield ..	0	10	6
G. W. Chitty, Esq. ..	25	0	0
The Misses Beard ..	0	10	0
Miss S. S. Dowson ..	2	2	0
Mrs. M. P. ..	2	2	0

HEALTHY CHILDREN FUND.

Mrs. E. de J. du Vallon ..	0	5	0
J. D. D.	0	5	0
Already acknowledged, £149 3s.

Miss Dendy is very grateful for the generous response she has received, but she would like to have small as well as large sums from people who are heartily in sympathy with the work and can only afford a mite to help it on. Donations should be sent to her at 13, Clarence-road, Wirthington, Manchester.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

A WAR AGAINST POVERTY.

THE outbreak of war in the Balkans, which is occupying the attention of the public to such an extent at the moment, ought not to allow us to forget that what its promoters have called a “War against Poverty” has begun nearer home. In furtherance of this campaign a demonstration was held last night at the Albert Hall, over which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., presided, supported by Mr. Sidney Webb, Miss Mary Macarthur, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson and others. It is unfortunately specially necessary to hold such large meetings at the present time, lest public attention be diverted by the hot succession of multitudinous other topics, some important and others less so, from what, by common consent, is the most serious problem or series of problems which we and other industrial nations have to face. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb are to give a course of six weekly lectures, beginning with October 29, which, in a sense, may be said to belong to the same campaign. There is, however, this great difference, that chairmen drawn from all political parties have promised to preside. Mr. Philip Snowden, the Right Hon. F. E. Smith, M.P., Mr. Norman Angell, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, M.P., the Marquis of Tullibardine, M.P., and the Bishop of Winchester have agreed to take the chair on successive evenings, a fact which proves that interest in social questions and an earnest desire to solve them are not confined to one class or party.

A CANADIAN BUREAU OF LABOUR.

In his speech at the introduction of the Home Rule Bill, Mr. Tim Healy, following Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who had stated that the Dominion was in favour of Home Rule, complained that so much information had been given about Moose Jaw and Medicine Hat, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, but very little about Ballyhooley or Kilmallock. At the risk of falling under the lash of Mr. Healy's tongue, we would call attention to the fact that the Saskatchewan Bureau of Labour has issued its first annual report. As the province had in recent years become largely industrialised, it became necessary to establish a department the functions of which should be to collect, assort, systematise, and publish information relating to (a) employment, wages and hours of labour; (b) strikes and other labour difficulties; (c) co-operation, trade unions, labour organisations; (d) the relations between capital and labour; (e) the commercial, industrial, and sanitary conditions surrounding working men, and (f) such other matters as relate to the permanent prosperity of the industry of the province.

* * *

In the first annual report, which has recently been issued, it is recorded that not one strike, lock-out, or other serious labour-trouble occurred within the province during the year 1911. Where differences arose between employers and workpeople they were adjusted before hostilities began. On one or two occasions the Bureau of Labour acted as mediator in threatened disputes. Information is given about the numbers employed, earnings, output, &c., in reference to agriculture, lumbering, woodworking and other industries of the province. Many people feel strongly that in view of the complexity of the problems to be dealt with, and in order to obtain that groundwork of accurate information without which no problem can be solved, it is time that here in the British Islands there was not only a department, but a Ministry of Labour. France, Italy, Holland, have their Ministers of Labour. Saskatchewan has its department. We ought to have both.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Clifton.—A social gathering was held on Friday evening, October 4, under the auspices of the Congregational Society of the Oakfield-road Church, to inaugurate the work of the winter session. Dr. Beckh, in reference to the church, said he felt confident that progress was being made. The congregation recently had certainly been somewhat larger, and the Men's Open Meeting on Sunday afternoons had been restarted.

Hastings: Resignation.—The Rev. S. Burrows has resigned the pulpit of the Free Christian Church, to the great regret of the congregation, and will terminate his ministry in March, 1913.

London District Unitarian Society.—The first Unitarian service was held at 632, High-road, Leytonstone, at 6.30 on Sunday evening last. Publicity was given to the venture by advertisements in the local papers and by the distribution of handbills, which the Stratford young people very kindly undertook. The subject of the sermon was "The Charm of Unitarianism." Other subjects during the next few weeks will be "An Aspect of the Problem of Evil," "From Orthodoxy to Freedom," "The Growing Idea of God," "The Faith of Honest Doubt," and "What is it to be a Christian?" The attendance of friends is desired. Mr. Morley Chancellor was the accompanist.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson writes as follows:—"Last Sunday evening at the Leytonstone service I was happy to make the acquaintance of several Unitarians whom I had not previously known. They came into the district not very long ago, and came, I suppose, when their old church was without a minister. I should be obliged, and take it as a help in my work, if ministers and others would tell me of the advent of any members of their congregations into any district of London where there is no Unitarian Church at present. I could send copies of your paper until such times as I was able to call upon them. It is no use letting friends drop out of fellowship simply because they settle too far away from one of our churches. I have been able to tell some of my brethren in the country of friends of my own who have left one or other of the districts with which I am familiar in London."

It has been arranged that boys of the Boys' Own Brigade and of the troop of Boy Scouts from Stratford shall be posted at various points near the railway stations and tram and omnibus termini to direct people on Sunday evening, October 20, when a united service will be held at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars.

London: Essex Church.—A service for the induction of the Rev. H. E. B. Speight, M.A., as junior minister, was held on Friday evening, Oct. 4. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston. Principal Carpenter, in the course of his charge to the new minister, referred very cordially to his work as a tutor at Manchester College. A simple and earnest charge to the congregation was given by the Rev. T. Rhonda Williams, of Brighton. Subsequently a social meeting to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Speight was held in Lindsey Hall. Mr. C. Hawksley presided over the formal proceedings, and Mr. Ronald Jones gave the welcome on behalf of the congregation. Mr. Gimson spoke on behalf of the Sunday school, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond as representing the Provincial Assembly. The Rev. Joseph Wood also gave a short address. Mr. Speight, in his reply, spoke in simple terms of the high hopes with which he entered upon his work, and the deep feelings of happiness which the proceedings of that night had given him.

London: Hackney.—Harvest festival services at the New Gravel Pit Church on October 6 were conducted by the Rev. E. Stanley Russell, B.A., of Liverpool. At the afternoon service the address was given by Mr. Ronald Bartram. On the following Tuesday evening Mr. Russell gave a Dickens Recital at the Hackney Town Hall. There was a large and appreciative audience, and a vote of thanks to the reciter, proposed by Mr. Lister, and seconded by the Rev. T. Wellard, vicar of St. Luke's Church, Hackney, was carried with applause. The proceeds are in aid of the New Gravel Pit school building extension fund.

London: Islington.—In connection with the Jubilee celebrations of Unity Church, Islington, an Eisteddfod is to be held at Essex Hall, on Saturday, November 30, at 3 p.m. The subjects for competition include music, elocution, literature, art, photography, needlework and cookery, so that competitors have a varied list to select from. The judges include Mr. Richard Walthew, Mr. J. H. Leigh, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. Savage Cooper, Mr. J. C. S. Mummery, and others. All amateurs are eligible. The secretary is Mr. Ronald Bartram, of Fernlea, Kilross-road, Highbury.

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, of Manchester College, Oxford, has kindly consented to give a short course of lectures to the members of the Union on Friday evenings in November. The lectures will be given at Essex Hall. Sunday school teachers, church workers, and any others who are interested are cordially invited to attend. The subjects of the lectures will be as follows:—(1) "Controversy in the Early Church"; (2) "Anti-Trinitarianism and the Reformation"; (3) "Unitarianism in England"; (4) "Unitarianism in America."

London: Wood Green—Unity Church.—A series of services in connection with a special forward movement was commenced on Sunday last, when the Rev. Joseph Wilson, minister of the church, preached in the morning, taking as his subject, "Did Jesus Really Live?" In the evening the pulpit was occupied by Mr. E. Capleton, an old friend of the late Dr. Mummery, of Wood Green. The Rev. Joseph Wilson is to be the preacher at the morning services on the remaining Sundays of this month, and among the preachers at the evening services will be the Rev. John C. Ballantyne, of Stamford-street, the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of Kilburn, and the Rev. W. Moritz Weston, D.D., Ph.D., of Croydon.

Manchester: The Late Mr. R. C. Law.—The Unitarian Church at Chorlton-cum-Hardy has sustained a severe loss by the death of Mr. Robert C. Law, which took place, after a long illness, on September 29. A large gathering of friends joined in the funeral at the Manchester Crematorium, on Wednesday, October 2. The service was conducted by the Revs. E. W. Sealy, M.A., and H. E. Haycock, co-ministers of the First Circuit Church. The Rev. Dendy Agate, whose acquaintance with Mr. Law dates back many years, gave the address. A memorial service was held in the Chorlton-cum-Hardy Church on Sunday last. The Rev. H. E. Haycock conducted the service. At the close of the sermon Mr. Haycock made a personal reference to the high qualities of Mr. Law's character, and on behalf of the church members extended the sincerest sympathy to Mr. Law's family in their bereavement.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street Free Church.—A series of discourses on "Rational Religion" are being held in the church this week, with the object of meeting the inquiries of many who are perplexed by the present religious unrest. The subjects include:—"The Case for a Rational Church," the Rev. E. W. Sealy; "Religious Values," the Rev. John S. Burgess; "A Rational View of the Bible," the Rev. H. E. Haycock; and "The Modern Self: A New Thing, a New Hope," the Rev. W. Whitaker. On Sunday, October 13, the series will be brought to a conclusion by three discourses which will be delivered at the morning, afternoon, and evening services respectively, on "Religious Revivals," the Rev. H. E. Haycock; "Discussion in Social Evolution," the Rev. E. W. Sealy; and "Prayer and Worship," the Rev. H. E. Haycock.

Poole: Welcome Meeting and Presentation.

—The Rev. W. B. Matthews entered on his ministry at Hill-street Chapel on Sunday, in succession to the Rev. H. S. Solly; and on Wednesday, after the quarterly meeting of the S.U.A. Executive and a social gathering for tea, a meeting of welcome was held in the chapel. The occasion was also taken to make a presentation to Mr. Solly, who happily is not leaving the district, but will still reside at Parkstone and remain a member of the congregation. After an opening hymn and prayer by the Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. William Carter, who presided, offered a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Matthews, and at the same time expressed the pleasure of the congregation that Mr. and Mrs. Solly would still remain among them. The Rev. H. S. Solly joined in the welcome, both as President of the S.U.A., and as a brother minister, who had known Mr. Matthews in early days as a worker in his Sunday school at Bridport, and had been instrumental in introducing him to the ministry. Mr. W. Stephens spoke on behalf of the Sunday School and Band of Hope; and the Rev. J. Ruddle for the ministers of the district. The Rev. A. C. Nickerson, as a brother minister from America, expressed his pleasure at being there and joining in such a welcome. He offered some helpful advice to the congregation, and words of earnest encouragement. He emphasised the glory of their position, even if their numbers were few, as making for character, the finest thing in the world, and, as expressed in the words of the late Dr. Edward Everett Hale: "We listen to the present utterance of the present Holy Spirit." The Rev. W. Agar, of Sidmouth, as Mr. Matthews' nearest neighbour in Devon, spoke warmly of the quality of his work, and recalled memories of that congregation, to which he had come to minister as a young man, some thirty-four years ago. The Rev. E. Lockett, also one of Mr. Solly's young men, who had worked with Mr. Matthews in the Bridport Sunday school, and had there been led to the ministry, added his word of congratulation and God-speed, and after an anthem by the choir Mr. Matthews responded to the welcome. Simply and earnestly he spoke of his purpose in taking up that ministry, with grateful thanks for the kindness he and his wife had already received. It would be his aim, and he asked their help, to make theirs a living church of the living God. After the singing of Gill's stirring hymn, "We come unto our fathers' God," Mrs. Belben, on behalf of the congregation, and as a token of their regard and appreciation of his work in their midst for the past five years, made the presentation to Mr. Solly of a gold ring, bearing his monogram and the dates of his ministry at Poole. Mr. Emerson Carter also spoke, and Mr. Solly, with much feeling, acknowledged the gift. A vote of thanks to all who had contributed to the great success of that evening, moved by Mr. Charles Carter, and seconded by Mr. H. Maguire, another hymn, and the benediction, pronounced by Mr. Matthews, brought the meeting to a close. Among the ministers present were the Revs. C. C. Coe, A. R. Andreae, and F. Coleman. The Ringwood and Bournemouth congregations were also well represented at the meeting. Mr. Herbert Carter, J.P., a prominent member of the congregation, has been nominated by the Town Council as Mayor of the borough for the ensuing year. Mr. Carter belongs to a family which has played a large part in civic affairs, and he himself has been a member of the Town Council since 1905. He has been specially prominent as a worker in connection with the Adult School movement.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN ORIGINAL PUBLIC MEMORIAL.

The committee at Godalming responsible for deciding what form a memorial to John George Phillips, the wireless operator of the Titanic, shall take, have hit upon a particularly happy idea which will probably ensure his name being remembered more effectually than the ordinary statue or fountain. A cloister is to be erected, surrounding a small garden, with seats sheltered from the wind and rain, the further wall consisting of an arcading through which a view of meadow-land and wooded slopes may be obtained. This idea is one which might be carried out with advantage in other places, for it appeals both to the sense of beauty and utility, and should afford opportunities for the sculptor no less than the architect, if the design is conceived on a large scale and not limited to the commemoration of one person or event only.

DISCARDED PETS FOR THE ZOO.

We feel very sorry for the discarded pets which are offered to the Zoo in such inconvenient numbers. They consist chiefly of the commoner kinds of monkeys, small baboons, cockatoos, various kinds of parrots, and not infrequently young lions, tigers, and bears. These creatures have been indulgently—though not always wisely—treated while they were young, amusing and harmless, but as soon as they become dangerous or in other ways obnoxious, it is found necessary to get rid of them. Frequently they are not in the best condition, or have developed some unpleasant habit, but the chief trouble, we understand, is that they seldom live well. However careful the keepers may be, they have not time to give to each animal the individual attention that it has been accustomed to receive. If it is kept alone it very often mopes and dies; if it is placed with others it is usually bullied and not allowed to have its fair share of food. People do not think of this when they admit a fascinating little tiger cub or "Teddy bear" to the domestic menagerie, and if it were pointed out to them they might probably reply in the words of the ironical person described in Mr. Galsworthy's recent articles "On the Love of Beasts": "I think you underestimate the pleasure they give. We English are so awfully fond of animals." But a little more consideration for the feelings of the animals themselves would be the best evidence of a real affection for them.

NATIONAL FOOD REFORM ASSOCIATION.

Some remarkable evidence of the need for giving greater attention to the subject of food and cookery is contained in the Fourth Annual Report of the National Food Reform Association, which gives an account of the recent activities of the Association, with special reference to the Guildhall Conference on Diet and Hygiene in Public and Private Schools, and the publication of "Our Children's Health at Home and at School." It also deals with such subjects as the Coal Strike, the Feeding of Nurses, the work of the Parliamentary Committee on Food Reform, the Insurance Act, and the connection between intemperance and diet.

A REMINISCENCE OF DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

Mary Antin, the author of a remarkable contribution to the literature of the Ghetto, which has just been published under the title "The Promised Land," gives a description of Dr. Everett Hale which it is difficult to read unmoved. The young Russian exile, brought up in the United States, who from the first loved the country of her adoption, and counted the days and the years "it takes to make an American," was indebted to Dr. Hale for some of her happiest memories in Boston, and for one of the most inspiring friendships a girl ever had. "That I met Dr. Hale is no wonder," she says. "It was as inevitable as that I should be a year older every twelvemonth. He was a part of Boston as a salt wave is part of the sea. I can hardly say whether he came to me or I came to him. We met, and my adopted country took me closer to her breast." In another place she says, "I enjoyed so many half-hours in the great man's house that I do not know how to convey the sense of my remembered happiness. My friend used to keep me in conversation a few minutes, in the famous study that was fit to have been preserved as a shrine; after which he sent me to roam about the house, and explore his library, and take away what books I pleased. Who would feel cramped in a tenement with such royal privileges as these? Once I brought Dr. Hale a present, a copy of a story of mine that had been printed in a journal; and from his manner of accepting it you might have thought that I was a princess dispensing gifts from a throne. I wish I had asked him, that last time I talked with him, how it was that he who was so modest made those who walked with him so great."

INTERNATIONAL CONCILIATION.

Among the recent pamphlets published by the American Association for International Conciliation is one entitled "The Relation of Social Theory to Public Policy" by Professor Franklin Giddings, of Columbia University. He bases his remarks on "the improbability of man," which involves "adaptation to conditions on which life depends, and ever nicer adjustments of differing interests." In the State, as in the individual mind, "if any interest or coalition of interests is dominant and can act promptly, it rules by absolutist methods. Whether it is benevolent or cruel, it wastes neither time nor resources upon government by discussion. But if interests are innumerable, and so distributed as to offset one another, and if no great bias or over-weighting anywhere appears, government by discussion inevitably arises. The interests can get together only if they talk. So, too, in international relations. If in coming years these shall be adjusted by reason instead of by force, by arbitration instead of by war, it will be because a true balance of power has been attained. If any one Power or coalition of Powers shall be able to dictate, it will also rule, and the appeal to reason will be vain."

* * *

The policies by means of which an equilibrium of international power can be established, Professor Giddings continues, "must be policies that will tend both to differentiate interests and to dis-integrate coalitions of power that create an overwhelming preponderance of strength. The great superiorities that now preclude effective government by discussion throughout the world are, (1) technical proficiency based on scientific knowledge, and (2) concentrated economic power. If we sincerely wish for peace we must be willing to see a vast equalising of industrial efficiency between the East and the West. We must also welcome every change that tends to bring about a fairer apportionment of natural resources among nations and within them, and a more equal distribution of wealth. If these conditions can be met, there will be a Parliament of Man. If they cannot be met, a nominal government by discussion will be but a tournament of words."

North Midland Presbyterian AND Unitarian Association.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD ON

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1912,

AT THE

OLD MEETING HOUSE, MANSFIELD.

PREACHER:

The Rev. E. G. EVANS, B.A., of Dukinfield.

NOW READY FOR OCTOBER.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

Infant Class Teaching. Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
A Good Guide (Poem). Elizabeth Wilson.
A Vote of Confidence. George J. Allen.
Heroes of Faith—Dr. Channing. Albert Thornhill, M.A.
The Teaching of Jesus.—I. G. C. Sharpe.
William Carey, Missionary. W. H. Carpenter.
A. M. D. G. W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.
English Unitarian Churches (Poem). Robert Pearce, [M.P.]
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—III. A. Stephen Noel.
A New Story of Burnley United. William J. Pigott.
Notes for Teachers.—XXXI.—XLVIII.
Arthur Brooke.
Five Lessons for Infants—
Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
The Making of a North Country School. J. Lonsdale Cox.
Children's Services. George Jessel, M.A., M.B.
Friends and Foes—A Morality (A Play for Children).
H. W. Hawkes.
By the Way.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE PRIESTLEY MEMORIAL FUND.

Appeal for Subscriptions to the New Statue to be placed at Birstal,

the town of his birth.

Donations to be sent to—

WALTER BAGSHAW, Esq.,
Birkenshaw, Bradford, Yorks.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAW-RENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE,
F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive
4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges
low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical
Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA. — "Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class
BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS;
most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P.
POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—
Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY,
AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying
Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LEITCHWORTH (Garden City.) —
House to Let, furnished, during Autumn or Winter. Two sitting-rooms, kitchen and servant's room, four bedrooms, dressing-room, and bathroom. One mile from station.—
Apply Miss LAWRENCE, Cloisters Lodge.

BOARD and RESIDENCE for Lady
(not invalid) in Lady's house at Acton.
Exchange references.—E. C., c/o H. G. Scarll, 494, Uxbridge-road, W.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION,

22, Northumberland Avenue, W.C.

THE Society offers to send an efficient Lecturer free of charge to League Meetings, Debating Societies, &c. Autumn and winter engagements should be booked at once.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS.
of every description accurately typed,
1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road,
Hornsey-lane, N.

ABSOLUTELY FREE! — 200
novel Patterns of charming Autumn
Blouse material; guaranteed unshrinkable wool, warm, light, colours fast; fascinating designs, looks smart for years.—Write to-day,
HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art
Irish Linen, suitable for making handsome Teacloths, Traycloths, D'Oyleys. Bundle of big pieces only 2s. 6d.; postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S,
5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH. — We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned.
Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form.
Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.
—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street,
Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office,
3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester
(Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday
October 12, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
Berkeley, California

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3669.
NEW SERIES, No. 773.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

WILLIAMS & NORGATE

Send for complete List of Autumn Announcements post free.

IMPORTANT NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Religious Liberty.

By FRANCESCO RUFFINI,
Rector of the University of Turin.
With a Special Supplementary Chapter for the English Edition, and an Introduction to the English
Reader, by the Rev. J. E. BURY, of Cambridge.
Forming Vol. XXXII. of Theological Translation
Library. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

The Latter Day Saints: A Study of the Mormons in the Light of Economic Conditions.

By RUTH KAUFFMAN and REGINALD
WRIGHT KAUFFMAN.
Medium 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

Within :

Thoughts during Convalescence.

By Sir FRANCIS E. YOUNGHUSBAND, D.L.
Square crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

An Interpretation of Professor Eucken's Philosophy.

By Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D. (Jena).
Translator of Professor Eucken's greatest work, "The Truth of Religion," and for some years a student under Prof. Eucken.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. [Ready shortly.]

Initiation into Philosophy.

By EMILE FAGUET.

Professor at the University of Paris. Translated into English by Sir HOME GORDON, Bart.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net. [Almost ready.]

Character and Life.

A Symposium.

Arranged and Edited by PERCY L. PARKER,
Editor of Public Opinion.

The contents are "Evolution and Character," by Dr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE; "Character and Study," by JOHN A. HOESON; "Bohemianism and Character," by HAROLD BEGBIE; "Art and Character," by WALTER CRANE; "History and Character," by EMIL REICH.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready shortly.]

WORKS BY DR. RUDOLF EUCKEN

Senior Professor of Philosophy in the University of Jena and recently awarded a Nobel Prize.

THE TRUTH OF RELIGION.

Translated for the first time into English from the Second and Revised German Edition by the Rev.
W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D., for some years a Student under Professor Eucken.

The Second and Revised Edition of the English
Translation will be published very shortly.
Medium 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

An Introduction to Philosophy.

Third Impression.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

THE CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

"Popular in form, scholarly in substance, moderate in price, these volumes are indispensable to the man who wishes to know what the best European writers and thinkers are saying about the problems of religion."

NEW VOLUMES TO BE READY IMMEDIATELY.

Bible Reading in the Early Church.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin.
Translated by Rev. J. R. WILKINSON, M.A.
Forming Vol. V. of "Harnack's New Testament
Studies," and Vol. XXXVI. of "Crown Theological Library."
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Protestantism and Progress.

By ERNST TROELTSCH, D.Th.,
D.Phil. (Jena).
Translated by W. MONTGOMERY, B.D.
Forming Vol. XXXVII. of "Crown Theological Library."
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

IMPORTANT RECENT ADDITIONS.

Pharisaism: its Aims and its Methods.

By Rev. R. TRAVERS HERFORD,
Author of "Christianity in Talmud."
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

The Religious Experience of St. Paul.

By PROF. PERCY GARDNER.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

The Scientific Study of the Old Testament.

By Dr. RUDOLF KITTEL.
Crown 8vo, cloth. Illustrated, 5s. net.

The Constitution and Law of the Church in the First Two Centuries.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Fundamental Truths of the Christian Religion.

By R. SEEBERG, Professor of Systematic Theology in Berlin.
Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ.

By KIRSOPP LAKE, M.A. (Oxon).
Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Naturalism and Religion.

By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen.
Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Communion of the Christian with God.

By PROF. WILHELM HERRMANN.
Cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin. Translated by Rev. J. R. WILKINSON, M.A.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net, per volume.

Vol. I. LUKE THE PHYSICIAN.

Vol. II. THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

Vol. III. THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Vol. IV. THE DATE OF THE ACTS AND
OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.

Vol. V. in active preparation.

WORKS BY THE EDITOR OF "THE HIBBERT JOURNAL."

Mad Shepherds: and other Human Studies.

By L. P. JACKS, M.A., Dean of Manchester College,
Oxford. With a Frontispiece Drawing by LESLIE
BROOKE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

Among the Idolmakers.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

The Alchemy of Thought

Medium 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Cambridge University Press

The Gospels as Historical Documents.

By VINCENT HENRY STANTON, D.D. To be completed in four parts. Demy 8vo. Part I. The Early Use of the Gospels, 7s 6d net; Part II. The Synoptic Gospels, 10s net. Now ready.

The Odes of Solomon.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. H. BERNARD, D.D., Bishop of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin. Paper covers. Demy 8vo. 6s net. Texts and Studies, Vol. VIII, No. 3.

Light on the Gospel from an Ancient Poet.

By EDWIN A. ABBOTT, Honorary Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo. 12s 6d net. Ready October 22.

Ecclesiasticus.

In the Revised Version. With Introduction and Notes by W. O. E. OESTERLEY, D.D. Fcap. 8vo. 6s net. Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges.

Twelve Cambridge Sermons.

By JOHN E. B. MAYOR. Edited, with a Memoir, by H. F. STEWART, B.D. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 5s net.

Sociological Study of the Bible.

By LOUIS WALLIS, formerly Instructor in Economics and Sociology in the Ohio State University. 8vo. 6s net. (University of Chicago Press)

Constructive Bible Studies.

A system of graded text-books for religious education in Sunday Schools, Bible Classes, Day Schools, and in the home. Full particulars on application. (University of Chicago Press)

Brasses.

By J. S. M. WARD, B.A., F.R.Hist.S. Royal 16mo. Cloth 1s net; lambskin 2s 6d net. (Deals with monumental brasses). Cambridge Manuals Series.

The Philosophical Works of Descartes.

Rendered into English by ELIZABETH S. HALDANE, LL.D., and G. R. T. ROSS, M.A., D.Phil. In two volumes. Demy 8vo. 10s 6d net each.

Beaumont and Fletcher: Complete Plays.

Edited by ARNOLD GLOVER, M.A., and A. R. WALLER, M.A. In ten volumes. Crown 8vo. Price £2 net. Separate volumes, 4s 6d net each. Cambridge English Classics Series.

Sir Philip Sidney: Complete Works.

Edited by ALBERT FEUILLERAT, Professor of English Literature in the University of Rennes. In three volumes. Volume I. The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, is now ready. Crown 8vo. 4s 6d net. Cambridge English Classics Series.

An Anthology of the Poetry of the Age of Shakespeare.

Chosen and arranged by W. T. YOUNG, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s 6d net. The Cambridge Anthologies Series.

Life in Shakespeare's England.

A Book of Elizabethan Prose. Compiled by J. DOVER WILSON, M.A. With seven illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s 6d net. The Cambridge Anthologies Series.

Lyrical Forms in English.

Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by NORMAN HEPPLE, B.Litt. Crown 8vo. 3s net.

The Literature of the Victorian Era.

By HUGH WALKER, LL.D. Crown 8vo. 10s net.

Cambridge University Press

Fetter Lane, London

DENTS' Autumn List.

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA:

Historical—Pictorial—Colonial.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The LAST LEGITIMATE KING OF FRANCE.

By PHOEBE ALLEN. With Illustrations. Medium 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

Vol. II. By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH. 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net each volume.

JOSEPH CONRAD'S "TWIXT LAND AND SEA."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A haunting power of imagery, an almost physical sense of effort in wresting its secrets out of human nature, and a wonderful command of the English language."—Morning Post.

By the Author of "The House of Prayer." FLORENCE CONVERSE'S NEW NOVEL, 'THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT.'

Crown 8vo, 6s.

PERCEVAL GIBBON'S "THE ADVENTURE OF MISS GREGORY."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"I never want to read a more finished . . . deliciously exciting set of adventures."—Punch.

Channels of English Literature

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A.

Crown 8vo, 5s, net each volume.

A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and English thought.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY.

By Professor JAMES SETH, M.A.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY.

By Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A.

40 New Volumes just added to Everyman's Library Completing 640 Volumes.

1s. net cloth.

2s. net leather.

Send for Full Descriptive Catalogue and Annotated List.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 72, Aldine House, London, W.C.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 691
VERSES: The Peacemaker 692
THE TASK OF RECONSTRUCTION 693
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—
Hymns and their Writers.—VI. 694
The Lord's Prayer in Long and Short Metre 695
CORRESPONDENCE:—
Foreign Policy and Christian Ethics 696
Anglo-German Amenities 696

SUPPLEMENT:—
"The Inquirer," 1842—1912. 698
The Rationality of Spiritual Trust 698
Citizenship and the Churches 701
The Liberal Movement in the Church of England 704
The Liberal Movement in the Evangelical
Free Churches 706
Anglo-German Relations 708
BOOKS AND REVIEWS:—
A Study of Hypnotism 713

The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges: Ecclesiasticus 713
Publications Received 713
FOR THE CHILDREN:—
Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727).—II. 714
MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS:—
South African Notes 715
North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association 716
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES 717
NOTES AND JOTTINGS 718

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE situation in the Balkans has grown steadily worse during the past week, and there has been severe fighting between the Montenegrins and the Turks. Though at the moment of writing no declaration of war has been made, the Greek ambassador has been withdrawn from Constantinople, and the Ministers of Servia and Bulgaria have been handed their passports. The war seems likely to be barren of practical results except as applying a spur to the supineness of the Great Powers, for it is assumed that whatever the result may be they will dictate the terms of settlement. In these circumstances they cannot escape from a heavy burden of responsibility for their distracted counsels and moral inertness. As the Manchester Guardian points out, if the Powers were in a position at this moment to present both to Turkey and to the Balkan Allies a well-thought-out scheme and to say, "Whatever you do, that is the settlement which we are determined to enforce," there would be no war.

THE letter which Sir John Brunner has addressed to the Liberal Associations of the country is something much more than an ordinary manifesto in the warfare of party politics. It is a reasoned appeal to the conscience of the nation. He speaks with grave emphasis of the dangerous entanglements into which we have allowed ourselves to drift and the nervousness which has marked the rapid increase in our naval expenditure. He attributes much of the mischief to diplomacy by secret treaties and dubious understandings, and to "the coldness and pessimism of our own Foreign Office" which have been "a persistent obstacle to that Anglo-German entente which the people on both sides of the North Sea clearly desire."

IN the course of his letter Sir John Brunner makes one practical proposal, which will have the enthusiastic support of all friends of international peace. We give it in his own words:—

"We ask that the British Government shall frankly adopt the policy of exempting from capture all peaceful shipping and all peaceful property on sea in time of war. This is the American proposal, which was supported at the last Hague Conference by Germany and a majority of the Powers. If this policy is adopted, the main reason—the reason which has been accepted and endorsed by the German people—for the expansion of the German Fleet will be removed, and the one great danger to our food supply in time of war will disappear."

THE large and enthusiastic meetings of the Congregational Union, which have been held in Manchester this week, have been remarkable chiefly for the incisive address by Dr. Adeney on the Church in its relation to the Kingdom of Heaven. It was aglow with social passion and quite openly apprehensive that the churches in blind loyalty to their traditional habits, may drift into a condition of impotent alienation from the deepest stirrings of the human spirit.

"It is not to be denied," he said, "that some of the best educated and most gifted and earnest young men and women of our day are deserting the churches, not in pursuit of lower interests, but because they are dissatisfied with the teaching and life they have met with among them, and are aiming as they honestly believe, at something better. If I could I would proclaim a truce to our theological controversies. For what shall we gain by developing the metaphysics of the new theology, or what shall we save by buttressing the orthodoxy of the old, if, after the old age has passed away, the new age is found to care for none of these things?"

PUBLIC criticism of the Mental Deficiency Bill has been concentrated quite naturally upon its compulsory provisions, and there are many people, keenly aware of the need of far-reaching reform, who still hesitate to embark upon legislation which introduces the principle of social control in such a drastic form. In a letter to the Manchester Guardian on Wednesday Miss Dendy pleads very earnestly that it is necessary "to compel parents either to take care of their feeble-minded children or to allow them to be taken care of." While, however, she believes that without these powers of compulsion the Bill will be practically useless, she is anxious to secure every possible safeguard against unjust or undesirable infringements of personal liberty.

IN view of the crusade which is being carried on in the name of science the last sentences of Miss Dendy's letter are very important. "We are hearing," she writes, "a very great deal about the advantage to the race that will ensue from the segregation of the unfit. It is a point that I myself have often made and which must be considered as most important. But I am quite sure that it is not the first consideration with those who are actually working for the feeble-minded and who, like myself, know hundreds of them intimately; to us the first consideration must always be the safety and purity and happiness of our charges. No conditions, we feel, must be accepted, no regulations made that are not in the first instance concerned with the well-being of the feeble-minded themselves. Especially it will have to be clearly understood that no step must be taken that is irretrievable. Segregation, with frequent reconsideration of all cases, will meet every possible need—and this and no more is asked for." To this appeal to the noblest humanitarian feeling we have only a word to add by way of comment. It is much easier to secure this thoughtfulness and consideration in the magnificent private enterprise in which Miss Dendy is engaged, than in a highly organised Government system. Here at any rate is a point where legislators need to be on their guard and administrators must never relax their vigilance.

* * *

A CONFERENCE promoted by the Joint Committee of the Independent Labour Party and the Fabian Society was held in London last week in order to inaugurate a campaign against poverty. The keynote of the speeches was, "If preventable, why not prevent it?" "We are here," Mr. Sidney Webb declared, "to say that destitution is a disease of Society; that it is unnecessary; and that it is within the capacity of the Government next session of Parliament to put an end to the destitution." Some wise people will probably shake their heads over the last sentence and object that it shows little of the temperate caution of the Fabian spirit. Be that as it may, and whatever the schemes of legislation which we may favour as wise and prudent, we have to find some remedy for a desolating social disease. The uprising of men and women against the enslavement of debasing poverty in the midst of unexampled luxury is the most momentous movement of our time. It has in it all the driving force of a crusade. It is a movement which religion can do a great deal to guide and control and inspire. But the one thing it must not and dare not do is to ignore it.

* * *

THE Church of England and the whole country is poorer by the death of Dr. Kitchin, the Dean of Durham. A man of robust character and keen intelligence, he preserved his unconventionality of conviction and utterance at a time when the backwash of the Oxford Movement was tending to produce a deadening uniformity of clerical type. With all the instincts and tastes of the scholar, which are usually associated with a quiet conservatism of thought and habit, he never slackened in his democratic faith, his alertness to questions of conscience in the political field, and his deep interest in movements for the uplifting and education of the people. The non-collegiate students at Oxford and movements for working-class education, like the Workers' Educational Association, have special reason to remember him with gratitude.

* * *

SIR CHARLES BEHRENS presided over an important public meeting held at Bowdon on October 11, when the Rev. John H. Harris, organising secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, spoke upon his recent journeys in Central Africa, and dealt with the efforts the Society is making to secure the emancipation of the slaves in the Portuguese colonies, and reforms in the Putumayo. Mr. Harris said the advertised boast of the former director of the Peruvian Amazon Company, and now liquidator, Julio Caesar Arana, was that so soon as public opinion had died down in England the Putumayo Indians would be set to work again. Everyone would realise what that threat would mean, and his Committee had determined to do all in their power to prevent such a threat being carried into execution. A thorough examination of the legal position disclosed the possibility that it was within the competence of the British Courts to remove Julio Arana, and put in his place a reputable British subject with an order to wind up compulsorily the Peruvian Amazon Company. Mr. Harris was able to inform the meeting that proceedings with this object had been commenced.

* * *

WE cannot allow this commemorative number to appear without some reference to the Rev. Charles Hargrove, who has just put off his armour and accepted the privileges of old age. In early life he passed from the strictest sect of the evangelicals, through the discipline of the Dominican order and the spacious traditions of the Church of Rome, to the Unitarian theology, which he has expounded and clothed with religious power during a ministry of 36 years at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. We desire to join very heartily in the tributes which he has received from his own congregation and many another sphere of public activity. For many years he has been associated very closely with the business management of this paper, and as an occasional contributor he has adorned our pages with his ripe scholarship and the wide intellectual interests which befit a quondam disciple of St. Thomas Aquinas.

* * *

THE general reader seldom pauses to consider the amount of labour and skill of a high order which is employed in the production of a daily or weekly journal. THE INQUIRER has always been singularly fortunate in its relations with its printers, and never more so than at the present time. In issuing this commemorative number the Editor is anxious to express his sense of cordial gratitude to the staff in the printing office, with whom it is his privilege to work week by week. He is deeply indebted to them for their unfailing courtesy, their high standard of accuracy and good workmanship, and their constant interest in the welfare of the paper.

THE PEACEMAKER.

O THOU who veil'st thine anguished face
Before this havoc of red war,
Bereft of Peace that flies so far,
And leaves wild terror in her place;

Too well we knew thy foolish heart
Would pay the price of love and hope,
Passing beyond their natural scope
'Ere man played out his savage part.

And ev'n as He of Galilee
Suffered and died, because too soon
To alien hearts he brought the boon
Of heavenly love—thou, too, shalt see

Once more the soul of good out-thrust,
And patience spurned by hurrying feet;
And taste the sadness of defeat,
Remembering that thou art but dust.

Whereat she raised her eyes, and said:
Though all around me lie the slain,
And every breath is drawn with pain,
My spirit is not with the dead.

Nor is death all though these should die;
But man must reap what man has sown,
Until his spirit, older grown,
Shall put the wasteful weapons by,

And seek the home of lovely Peace,
Who waits beyond our clamorous days
To guide his steps in holier ways,
When all the lust of self shall cease.

I bow my head, my voice is dumb—
I see my path through blinding tears;
But who am I to shrink from fears,
Or languish till my Lord shall come?

Mine must it be to keep my speech
Gentle and true, and still to bless,
Pouring the balm of tenderness
On bruised souls: perchance to teach,

To breathe pure thoughts upon the air,
To pour my life for others' good
(The foes of my own heart withstood),
And succour love amid despair.

At least I must rebuild the walls
Of truth these maddened hordes destroy,
And catch the distant gleam of joy
Ev'n when the darkest shadow falls;

Stirring in hearts that fear to dream
The ecstasy of forgotten spring,
The flutter of a young bird's wing,
And sunlight trembling on the stream.

Or lift the veil from root and clod,
Leaf and fair blossom, blade and ear,
The miracles of the perfect year,
And show the secret thoughts of God.

O then it will not be in vain
That I have given my soul to Peace,
Though still the battle does not cease,
And all the earth is sick with pain.

I will arise as from the dust,
And smile, though rivers run with blood,
As one who dreams that God is good,
As one who knows that He is just.

LAURA ACKROYD.

THE TASK OF RECONSTRUCTION.

FOR seventy years THE INQUIRER has devoted its best thought and labour to the promotion of a broader and more tolerant Christianity. Called into existence to serve the needs and reflect the activities of a group of religious societies, which in spite of theological ostracism cherished a lofty dream of inwardness and comprehension, it has always sought to combine with its more domestic concerns a generous sympathy with all sincere movements of the religious spirit, a steadfast loyalty to freedom of thought, and an ardent hope that along the lines of liberty and love men may find at last the vital fellowship and the interior unity of purpose and affection, which are denied to schemes of external uniformity. We may perhaps claim without undue boastfulness that its distinctiveness is to be found chiefly in this direction, in the cheerful serenity of temper with which it has approached all religious problems and its confidence that the victories of truth are always the victories of God. The controversies aroused by the attack of science, history, and criticism on the entrenchments of traditional dogma have been reflected in its pages. It has been the arena of eager controversy about things which are very precious to men's souls. Being human, it cannot plead that it has escaped the snares of anger or prejudice which pervert just judgment. But through it all it has never yielded to intellectual panic.

It is often maintained that openness of mind and catholicity of sympathy are a source of weakness in religion. May not a fellow-feeling for your enemy, it is asked, and a desire to understand him cause your arm to drop nerveless by your side? Military metaphors are responsible for many of the fatal errors of the Church. It is no small part of discipleship to listen patiently to the teaching of the Spirit undistracted by the clamour of contending factions. The rather coarse and showy virtues of the dogmatist are less admired than formerly. Religious problems have escaped from the theological enclosure into the broad fields of human thinking. There is a growing conviction that there are no infallible answers in religion in which all the truth is on one side. Slowly men are making the triumphant discovery that it is not explanations codified in systems of doctrine which are the essential bond of union among the followers of Christ, but the Spirit of power and of love and of a sound mind. So far as we have played some small part in this spiritual revolution and helped to blunt the edge of the carnal weapons of controversy we are quite unrepentant. In these matters we know in Whom we have believed, and we are not to be moved from our allegiance. But there is another question, or rather a whole series of questions, of very serious import, to which it is not so easy to find an answer. What these questions are we must try to indicate in a few words. Taken collectively they bring us face to face with the searching sense of disappointment and the deep vital need, which we have in mind when we speak of the task of reconstruction.

A great deal of the energy of the liberal movement in the past has been concentrated upon the critical study of traditional doctrine. Simply as an intellectual pursuit it has been so absorbing, and, owing to the nature of the ground to be explored, it has been so strictly departmental in its activities that comparatively little attention has been paid to its relation to the religion of ordinary men. There have been a few minds of comprehensive grasp or prophetic vision, like Schleiermacher or Martineau, for whom the deeper spiritual meanings were always matters of supreme concern. But the liberal movement as a whole has tended to produce scholars rather than thinkers, and to rely more upon rational argument than the spirit of prophecy. The quiet self-confidence of rationalism, not unmixed with intellectual disdain, has been one of its characteristic products, and in the seclusion of its academic groves it has dreamed of the time when all sensible men would be argued out of antiquated beliefs and exploded superstitions. But the expected has not happened. It is true that the effect of this vast amount of labour has been appreciable in several directions, but it has had little transforming and enlarging influence upon the religion of the common people. Two very different reasons may be alleged for this failure and the sense of disappointment which it is creating. On the one hand, we may accuse men of blindness and prejudice, and redouble our efforts to argue them into a new theology. But for that there is little heart left, for the suspicion is gaining ground steadily that the other reason is the real one, namely, that the mistake has been on the side of the rationalists with their preference for incisive argument and theological attack to the direct witness of the Spirit.

As we have pointed out already, the work of theological criticism has been for the most part narrowly departmental. It has assumed a severely technical and professional tone, and it has shown far greater capacity in the examination of traditional forms of belief than in the synthetic presentation of Christian experience in its relation to modern knowledge. There is accordingly no reason for surprise that it has been more successful in removing debris than in building new homes of love and prayer. It does not follow, however, that this work was not necessary because it has failed to accomplish all that its pioneers intended, or that when it stands in the perspective of history it will not be seen as a keen and masterful contribution to the uplifting of the human spirit. We believe that these high claims can be made for it quite justly, and that it would be an act of faithlessness and folly, worthy only of a sentimental obscurantism, to try to belittle its importance. But at the present moment we must face the growing sense of disillusionment in the spiritual field. The idea that we can force men by cogent logic into faith, or that the mere juxtaposition of different opinions will convince them of the truth, is slipping away from us. The whole liberal movement in religion is on its trial, and the test that is being applied to it is not that of intellectual competence but of spiritual efficiency. At the same time we are confronted by an element of strong and fierce reaction which does not scruple to use appeals to religious emotion to discredit rational thought.

And we are here as on a darkling plain Swept with confused alarms of struggle and fight,

Where ignorant armies clash by night.

In these circumstances the man of faith will pray for a deep simplicity of purpose and give himself strongly to the tasks of reconstruction.

In the article by Canon Lilley which appears in our present issue, he insists that we can only be rescued from our present dispersiveness and confusion when a great religious leader arises "capable of indicating successfully the permanent religious values of the Christian tradition in terms of the new habit of mind." It may be argued that reconstruction, especially if it is to have any wide popular appeal, must wait for his appearing. So far as we place our confidence in the analogies of history this is certainly true. And yet it does not follow that we cannot do much to hasten his advent by a clear acknowledgment of past errors, and still more by an earnest cultivation of right habits of spiritual emphasis. Here we can only indicate very briefly the nature of this reform from within, which has become a crying need if we are to conquer the numbing fear that the long labour of thought may end in religious sterility.

(1) Hitherto the liberal movement has owed what influence it possessed chiefly to the efforts of lonely students and thinkers. Its intense individualism has been a source both of strength and of weakness to it. It has pursued its tasks in contented detachment from the common mind, and has paid scant attention either to the working of religion in the heart of humanity or to the soil of racial memories and inherited loyalties, of common experiences and daily habits, in which religious faith finds some of its chief sustenance. The result has been a tendency to regard Christianity from the point of view of a few select individuals, cultivated, thoughtful, and seldom exposed either to coarse temptations or transports of emotion. The college garden as seen from a study window is a part of the real world, but it is an extraordinarily insignificant part of it, and a theology suited to the tranquil people who take tea upon its lawns may have little meaning for the men and women who die in garrets and the sinners who drift down into the hell of despair. This isolating individualism, we had almost said this peculiar type of class-consciousness, must go. There must be a large, a generous welcome for the whole vast range of spiritual fact and need as it exists in the great world outside. Rationalism has tended hitherto to construct a system of religion on the basis of the thoughts and feelings which it considers appropriate to reasonable human beings in the abstract. It can only recover its sanity and its usefulness, and we are anxious that it should do both, by a deep plunge into the living waters of a communal experience.

(2) The attack upon what we conceive to be theological error will occupy only a small place in any movement which is deeply concerned with religion. For a similar reason a theology, however reasonable and well-articulated it may be in its various parts, will have a very limited appeal if it is based chiefly upon critical conflict or dissent. Unless it springs out of the heart of a living faith men will scent in it an essay in scholasticism rather than an interpretation of experience. The technicalities of the theologian and the professional jargon of the philosopher are compassing their own defeat. At least they have a waning significance in the religious sphere, and they are often practised by men who are certainly not conspicuous for breadth of sympathy or clearness of spiritual insight. It seems probable that theology will have to escape from its professional enclosures and exchange the seminary for the world, before it will gain courage to lop off its dead or decaying parts, to regard many of its cherished tasks in their intrinsic insignificance, and to recover the simple directness of speech which is natural to men, when they are conscious that they are at close grips with the deepest experiences of the soul. In their devotion to purely intellectual pursuits our theological schools have almost ceased to practise the habit of right emphasis. Which of them can say that it carries on its work with the same sense of actuality and essential relationship to the primary needs of life which is to be found in most of our medical schools? We plead for this right emphasis and the liberation of theology from the bondage of scholasticism as an important contribution to the task of reconstruction.

(3) In the third place, the liberal movement has preferred hitherto to cultivate sedentary habits, and it has failed almost entirely to arrest popular attention by daring experiments or heroic adventures. The caution of a safe middle-class view of religion seems to run in its blood. It has been a stranger too long to the great happenings of the Spirit. In the article to which we have referred already Canon Lilley speaks of the revolutionary forces in English society which are calling out for the guidance and steady control of the religious spirit, and he asks rather sadly, "Will the Church, with the intensest willingness and eagerness on the part of her ministers, be allowed to penetrate contemporary life as a whole?" What he fears is a paralysing opposition on the part of "all those who either openly resist or secretly dread the unknown forces which the contemporary instinct for reform threatens to release." To these grave and emphatic words we will only add a confession of our profound conviction that any attempt to erect barriers of social theory or economic creed in the way of the onward march of the Spirit of Christ, or to undertake the tasks of reconstruction on the tacit understanding that we may ignore the mighty ethic of the Gospel whenever it touches our own pocket or position, can only result in strangling the liberties of the spirit and enslaving the religion of redemption far more effectually than any of the dogmas of the past.

In what we have said in this article, which is to be taken as merely a first sketch on a theme of almost infinite magnitude, we desire to make it perfectly clear that we have no sympathy with the foolish and fatuous attacks upon reason which have become fashionable in some quarters and are supposed by our modern sentimentalists to be a sign of returning faith. Those who believe that the world was made by the Word or Reason of God, and that in Him it subsists, will also believe that when they think, as well as when they love, they are partakers of the divine nature. Among all the branches of human knowledge theology is still queen, but men will only acknowledge her sovereignty when she stoops to serve and confesses that the works of God in nature and in grace are greater than she. Theology explains; the Gospel kindles and inspires; and theology without the Gospel is dead.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS.

VI.

"City of God, how broad and far."

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

THE friendship of Samuel Johnson and Samuel Longfellow is a beautiful thing to remember. Longfellow was the elder of the two by three years, and had graduated at Harvard, and had two years' experience in teaching, before they met in the autumn of 1842 as students for the ministry in the Harvard Divinity School. There they were drawn together in close brotherly affection, and in the intimacy of common interests and common work, which remained unbroken for forty years; and it was only death that brought the separation. The younger of the two was the first to be called away, and to Longfellow remained the sorrowful task of writing the memoir of his friend for the volume of his "Lectures, Essays, and Sermons," published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, 1883.

Samuel Johnson was born October 10, 1822, at Salem, "the mother city of Massachusetts," on the coast some fifteen miles to the north-east of Boston. He was the son of a physician, and his father's house at Salem remained his home for all but the last five years of his life. His one settled ministry, from 1853 (the year in which Longfellow went to Brooklyn) until 1870 (with an interval of the year they spent together in Europe), was with the Free Church he established at Lynn; but even then he continued to live at home. Lynn was a busy industrial town about five miles away, between Salem and Boston, on Nahant Bay, and he simply went over for the Sunday service, and during the week to visit his people. Like his friend Longfellow, he was never married. Up to the close of his ministry, Johnson's publications had been confined to separate sermons, and pamphlets, and contributions to papers and reviews, except for the hymn-books the two friends brought out together, the "Book of Hymns," 1846, and "Hymns of the Spirit," 1864; but afterwards he concentrated on a work to which he had long been devoted, and brought out two volumes of his "Oriental Religions and their Relation to Universal Religion," the first on "India" in 1873, the second on "China" in 1877. A third volume on "Persia" appeared after his death. In 1876, on his father's death, Johnson left Salem, and with a younger sister moved to the old family homestead, a farm near Andover, inland on the Merrimac, and not far from the Whittier homestead at Haverhill. There he died, February 19, 1882, ten years before his friend, and not quite sixty years of age.

Johnson went as an undergraduate to Harvard in 1838, the year of Emerson's Divinity School Address, and he and his friend entered the Divinity School in the year of Channing's death, a few months after the appearance of Theodore Parker's "Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion." They had both gone up as young men trained in the older school of Unitarian piety, but the quickening impulse of the Transcendental Movement took hold upon them during their student years, and they were found among those who were ardently with Parker in the early controversies and troubles which arose over his outspoken heresies. They both preached for him at West Roxbury during their last year at College, after he had begun to preach in Boston, but was still responsible for his old pulpit, and threw themselves with increasing resoluteness upon the side of progress and the wider outlook in religion. Their "Book of Hymns," the fruit of those last months at College, included Parker's "O Thou great Friend to all the sons, of men," and was adopted by his Boston congregation. Parker liked the book, Longfellow says, because "it recognised more than was usual in the Unitarian hymn-books the idea that there is a Holy Spirit and that God is really present with and in the soul of man." Johnson, as his friend records, was a transcendentalist by nature and a born idealist. Instinctively he sought spiritual truths by direct vision, and found his deep convictions of God, duty, and immortality as the immediate inward experience of his own life. Three of his own hymns are in that early book, including "Father, in Thy mysterious presence kneeling"; and a fourth, "God of the earnest heart," which he wrote in 1846 for their graduation exercises, is in the later supplement. For that occasion his class-mate O. B. Frothingham also wrote his well-known hymn, "Thou Lord of hosts, whose guiding hand." During the years of his ministry Johnson lectured a good deal on the Anti-Slavery, Temperance, and Women's Rights platforms, and for the Free Religious Association. In May, 1859, John Brown, the Abolitionist, was in Lynn, and gave an address in the hall where Johnson's congregation met. The substance of his later books on Oriental Religions he gave as lectures both at Lynn and at Brooklyn. It was Lloyd Garrison who said of Johnson: "In his presence ignoble thoughts were impossible, and conversation held a fitting level. To be with him was to increase one's self-respect and resolution. Great things seemed easily possible under the stimulating influence of his abounding faith and spiritual insight."

In the early summer of 1860 the two friends sailed together for Europe, and at Nice spent a rainy November arranging the material for their "Hymns of the Spirit," published four years later. During the winter they were at Florence, and in the Boboli Gardens gathered ivy to plant on the newly-made grave of Theodore Parker. It was at Nice that Johnson wrote what is perhaps his finest hymn:

City of God, how broad and far
Outspread thy walls sublime!
The true thy chartered freemen are
Of every age and clime.

One holy Church, one army strong,
One steadfast high intent,
One working band, one harvest song,
One King Omnipotent.

It is the hymn of a brave reformer, strong and clear in its vision of the true ideal, with a broad outlook upon human history. The form of the verse answers to the quality of the thought. The lines are strong and satisfying throughout, and give noble utterance to the faith that lifts men up in exultation amid the conflicts of the world. Here the prophet's and the psalmist's vision of the "City of our God" takes on a new form. "Beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth" it still is, "the city of righteousness, the faithful city"; but now the King has his faithful men in many lands.

How purely hath thy speech come down
From man's primeval youth!
How grandly hath thine empire grown
Of freedom, love, and truth!

They are one people, these free men of the City, one in aspiration, one in fearless and devoted purpose. Every true man understands his brother's speech and sees the light of the same consecration and enthusiasm in his eyes. The vision gathers up into one great host all who from the earliest time and in many lands have dared to stand for freedom and truth, and have known the power of love. For God they all have striven, even though they knew it not; strong in His strength, who is eternal Righteousness; and now in the vision of faith they are seen to be all together within the walls of the mystic City of God.

Let the man who stands alone, and has to suffer for the truth, take courage. Here is the great company of witnesses; he belongs to them. Their strength will nerve his will, their rejoicing song of victory refresh his heart. It may be a distant vision that comes to him in the field of his sore conflict, but the watchfires are there, gleaming from afar. Comrades are watching with him through the night, and the lonely sentinel on outpost duty is glad and unafraid.

How gleam thy watchfires through the night

With never-fainting ray!

How rise thy towers, serene and bright,
To meet the dawning day!

In vain the surge's angry shock,

In vain the drifting sands;

Unharmed upon the Eternal Rock
The Eternal City stands.

One image follows quickly on the other, but each is clear and beautiful. After the night watch the dawn, and the city "beautiful in elevation," clearly seen in all its noble strength; and then finally amid the tumult of the world, and the insecurity of those who have not set their feet upon the true foundation, the city of those who trust in God and His truth, immovable, because it is founded upon the rock. "The eternal God is thy dwelling place, and underneath are the Everlasting Arms."

V. D. D.

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN LONG AND SHORT METRE.

AMONG the curiosities of American literature we must place the translation of the Psalms made by Dr. Cotton Mather, but issued without his name. The title reads: "Psalterium Americanum: the Book of Psalms in a Translation Exactly Conformed Unto the Original; But all in Blank Verse, Fitted unto the Tunes Commonly used in our churches. Which Pure Offering is accompanied with Illustrations, digging for Hidden Treasures in it. And Rules to employ it upon the glorious and various Intentions of it. Whereto are added some other portions of the Sacred Scriptures to Enrich the Cantional: Boston in N.E. 1718. Printed by S. Kneeland for B. Eliot, S. Gerrish, D. Henchman, and G. Edwards, and sold at their shops."

Mather translated direct from the Hebrew, and each psalm is printed as prose, without being broken up into lines. Notwithstanding this appearance the version is, as the title-page declares it to be, in blank verse. The author declares that many of his predecessors put in poor matter of their own "merely for the sake of preserving the clink of the rhyme which after all is of small consequence unto a generous poem, and of none at all unto the melody of singing." He has hit upon an ingenious device by which to accommodate the varying tastes of those who liked short metre best, and also of those who preferred long metre. This may be shown by the example of the Lord's Prayer, which is printed so that it can be sung to any short metre, but by the addition of parenthetical words printed in black letter can also be sung to any long metre tune.

Our Father who art in the Heav'n's

(O let) thy name be sanctify'd;
thy Kingdom, oh, may it arrive;
Thy will, may it be (fully) done—
Done here upon the earth below, as it is done in Heav'n (Above). This day bestow thou upon us, what is (to be) our Daily Bread. And us our debts forgive, as we, our Debtors (freely) do forgive. And to temptation lead us not, but us from (the worst) evil save. Because the Kingdom, it is thine. The Power too,
'tis thine (Alone). And thine the glory still will be, For evermore.
Amen. (Amen.)

"The Director of the Psalmody need only to say: 'Sing with the Black Letter, or sing without the Black Letter,' and the tune will be sufficiently directed."

Notwithstanding their economical adaptability to the long and the short of congregational music, these palms and spiritual songs of Cotton Mather did not attain a world-wide popularity.

To show fairly the quality of Cotton Mather's version, let us set out its longest form as it would appear in any modern hymn-book into which it found its way:

Our Father Who art in the heav'n's
O let thy name be sanctified;
Thy Kingdom, oh, may it arrive;
Thy will may that be fully done.

Done here upon the earth below,
As it is done in heav'n above.
This day bestow Thou upon us
What is to be our daily bread.

And us our debts forgive as we
Our debtors freely do forgive.
And to temptation lead us not
But us from the worst evil save.

Because the Kingdom it is Thine,
The power too it is Thine alone,
And Thine the glory still will be
For evermore. Amen, Amen.

If the metrical versions of the Lord's Prayer now existing in the English language are ever collected, that of Cotton Mather will not be found to be the worst.

W. E. A. AXON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.

FOREIGN POLICY AND CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

SIR,—Which of us does not know the words of the prayers for our nation in the "Ten Services"?

Thou hast gathered our people into a great nation, and sent them to sow beside all waters, and multiply sure dwellings on the earth. Deepen the root of our life in everlasting righteousness; and let not the crown of our pride be as a fading flower. Make us equal to our high trusts; reverent in the use of freedom, just in the exercise of power, generous in the protection of weakness.

And again:

Thou hast planted us as a people, in quiet resting places, and stretched out our branches over the sea, and laid upon us a mighty trust. Never through vain conceit may we be blind to the unchanging conditions of thy blessing. The world and its fullness are thine; our portion thereof may we hold, not in wanton self-will, but reverently, as of thee; making it the stronghold of right, the refuge of the oppressed, and the moderator of lawless ambition.

Which of us who breathe such prayers and cherish such aspirations can contemplate with any kind of equanimity our recent and present foreign policy? We have had treaty rights by the assertion of which we might, at any time have broken up the hideous system by which the late King Leopold plundered and tortured to death his and our fellow creatures literally by the million, but the oppressed found no refuge in our power. We allow ourselves at this moment (see the current number of the Anti-Slavery Reporter) to be bound by a treaty with Portugal which under easily imaginable circumstances might mean our armed defence of slavery. Where then is our justice in the exercise of power? It is under a company formed with the protection and prestige of English law that the nameless horrors of Putumayo have been, and perhaps are being, perpetrated. Where is our generosity in the protection of weakness?

"But these matters are not so simple as you seem to think" we are told. Perhaps not. Perhaps also they would be simpler if we were more single-hearted, and really cared more. Can we not at least make our rulers and administrators feel that it is their business, second in importance to none, to make the power of England felt as a refuge to the oppressed, and a protector of the weak? Can we not make them feel that complications and difficulties are to be met and disentangled, not welcomed as excuses for inaction?

But in these cases it is in the main inaction, not action, which we have to lament. The cry of the wretched goes up and there is none to hear it. Is this the limit of our faithlessness? We have, and we can have, no confidence that it is so. We are in league with Russia, and in spite of official assurances we can have no confidence that we are not arranging with her for the practical partition of Persia, and affixing an indelible stain on the name of England. We know that we have passively condoned our partners' acts of hideous barbarism and have actively supported her in crushing the most hopeful promise of renovated life in her victim, and the official announcement of her withdrawal of foreign troops as one of the objects to be secured by the late conference at Balmoral is closely followed by the news that the Russian forces in Persia are immediately to be strengthened!

We have but just heard a shamefaced-apology made in Parliament for joining in an attempt to hamper and perhaps mutilate and enslave China at the dictate of her foes and rivals, taking advantage of her weakness at the very moment when her venerable civilisation is endeavouring to throw off the incubus that has oppressed it for centuries.

We are bewildered to find the allies of our better aspirations just where we should last expect them—amongst the professional soldiers, who denounce our subservience to Russia in Persia, and the professional financiers, who have made our attempted action in China appear as ridiculous and feeble as it is sinister. Our diplomats seem to lag as far behind intelligent force and enlightened commercial self-interest as they do behind the more generous impulses of a democracy still sound at heart.

And in the midst of the horrors that impend over Macedonia and the Balkans, what confidence can we have that England is on the watch for an opportunity of atoning for the ghastly blunder of the supersession of the treaty of San Stefano by the treaty of Berlin, which has subjected Macedonia to confusion and outrage for a whole generation?

And all this time we have been helping steadily to divide Europe into two great hostile camps, and to identify ourselves with one of them independently of the rights or wrongs of any quarrel that may arise between them, till men are further and further driven towards a fierce and gloomy fatalism in which destruction seems to loom up as the final goal of all construction, and even the doubtful "conquest of the air" is contemplated almost exclusively in its bearings upon conflict, jealousy, and murderous animosity.

Does all this represent the heart and intelligence of England? Absit! Demos sits in the carriage and pays the bills, but the men who wear his livery and sit on the box and drive, neither ask for nor obey his orders, and will never tell him where he is being driven till he has got there. "Never show a thing to a fool till it is finished" is evidently the diplomatic motto; and Demos—the well-meaning, but preoccupied and perhaps indolent Demos—is the fool.

Joining Persian and German friendly committees and Congo and anti-slavery societies, signing petitions, attending meetings, writing to harried and jaded Members of Parliament, is weary work. If that is all we can do, we must do it. But our goal must be something beyond that. It must be to send a purifying blast of indignation and inspiration through the purlieus of officialism and diplomacy, and let our servants know that they grossly and foully misrepresent us when they play the diplomatic game in which truth and honour, justice and mercy, are mere phrases and labels, and the fates of nations are but pawns. If they will not drive where we want to go we must risk the blunders and complications that may arise, and, making a clean sweep of "diplomacies," must see what common sense, high principle, and openness of aim can do at the Foreign Office. Is it not time that Auguste Comte's motto, Vivre au grand jour—live in the daylight—were applied there too?—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

Childrey, near Wantage,
October 13, 1912.

ANGLO-GERMAN AMENITIES

SIR,—In connection with the article on Anglo-German Relations, which appears elsewhere in this issue, Professor Sieper is doing all he can to induce his own pupils as well as students from other Universities to visit the British Islands and spend some time there. As one of the best means of getting to understand English life and ways is to live in an English home, Professor Sieper would be glad to know the names and addresses of cultivated people who could conveniently receive German students, male and female, as paying guests in their homes for periods of several months. The students will gladly pay the normal charge paid for accommodation such as they wish, and in the intervals of mastering our language would willingly impart a knowledge of their own to such as may desire to acquire it. May I suggest that you receive at your office the names and addresses of such as could accommodate paying guests. If you consent, it would probably facilitate matters, if those who write would at the same time state their charges, whether they prefer ladies or gentlemen, and other details. The names could then be handed over to Professor Sieper. Hoping that you will see your way to help in this small, practical contribution to the growth of a better understanding between two nations whom some people seem to be endeavouring to embroil in conflict.—Yours, &c.,

R. P. FARLEY.

Bigwood-road, Golder's Green, N.W.,
October 16, 1912.

[We shall be glad to receive names and information as our correspondent suggests, and to forward them to the right quarter.—ED. of INQ.]

WE have received the second number of La Riforma Italiana, the monthly magazine which has been started under the auspices of Signor Conti to represent the association of "Liberi Credenti." One of its objects is to stimulate a desire for good reading as a method of mental liberation. The present issue gives prominence to a survey of Italian public libraries, with a view to their improvement and their greater usefulness in the cause of popular education.

1842

SUPPLEMENT.

1912

At all Booksellers and Bookstalls.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s New 1s. Net Series.

- | | |
|--|----------------------------|
| 1. Deeds that Won the Empire. | Dr. W. H. Fitchett. |
| 2. The Cruise of the "Cachalot." | Frank T. Bullen. |
| 3. Fights for the Flag. | Dr. W. H. Fitchett. |
| 4. The Log of a Sea Waif. | Frank T. Bullen. |
| 5. The Gamekeeper at Home. | Richard Jefferies. |
| 6. A Londoner's Log Book. | Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell. |
| 7. The Sowers. | H. S. Merriman. |
| 8. Jess. | H. Rider Haggard. |
| 9. Vice Versâ. | F. Anstey. |
| 10. Woodland, Moor, and Stream. | J. A. Owen. |
| 11. The Tale of the Great Mutiny. | Dr. W. H. Fitchett. |
| 12. Sixty Years in the Wilderness. | Sir Henry W. Lucy. |
| 13. A Vision of India. | Sidney Low. |
| 14. The Defence of Plevna. | Capt. F. W. von Herbert. |
| 15. The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes. | A. Conan Doyle. |
| 16. Nelson and His Captains | Dr. W. H. Fitchett. |
| 17. With Edged Tools. | Henry Seton Merriman. |
| 18. The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. | A. Conan Doyle. |

ARTHUR C. BENSON'S WORKS.

Large post 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each.

- The Child of the Dawn.
Leaves of the Tree: Studies in Biography.
Ruskin: A Study in Personality.
Paul the Minstrel, and Other Stories.
The Silent Isle. 3rd EDITION.
At Large. 2nd IMPRESSION.
The Altar Fire. 3rd IMPRESSION.
Beside Still Waters. 4th IMPRESSION.
From a College Window. 16th IMPRESSION.
The Upton Letters. 14th IMPRESSION. With a Preface.

Large post 8vo. 6s. net each.

3rd EDITION. With a New Preface.

- The Gate of Death: A Diary.
Thy Rod and Thy Staff. [Just Published.

New "3s. 6d. Net" Edition.

- The Upton Letters.
From a College Window.
The Altar Fire.

 OTHER VOLUMES TO FOLLOW.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

MR. FIFIELD'S FIRST LIST.

By
GREVILLE MACDONALD,
M.D.

5s. net.
Postage 4d.

TRYSTIE'S QUEST; or, Kit King of the Pidgwidgeons. A Fairy Tale. With Cover Design, Title Page and Thirty-one Illustrations by Arthur Hughes.

Dr. MacDonald's new fairy tale is in the same vein as his amusing and successful story last year, The Magic Crook, and parents and friends may be quite satisfied they are getting the right book to engross and stimulate the children when they order TRYSTIE'S QUEST.

Now ready.

By
PETER ROSEGGER.

2s. net.
Postage 3d.

THE FOREST FARM. Autobiographical
Tales of the Austrian Tyrol. With Appreciation by M. E. King and Biographical Introduction by Dr. Julius Peterson. Large cr. 8vo, cloth, with Portrait.

These stories of the fast disappearing peasant farmer's life in Styria are among the most beautiful and individual pictures produced to-day, and they have all the charm of novelty to English readers.

Now ready.

By
M. A. TAYLOR.
1s. 6d. net.
Postage 2d.

DELFINA OF THE DOLPHINS.

Delfina is a charming girl born in Rome, and this is the story of her life there as child, girl, and woman artist.
It is an intimate picture of Rome as seen by the people rather than by the tourist.

Now ready.

By
ETHEL GATE.
1s. 6d. net.
Postage 2d.

THE BROOM FAIRIES, and other Stories.

Mr. Fifield has very much pleasure in introducing this new young writer to the book-loving public. He believes that she has a most unusual and delightful touch, and that children will be fascinated by the stories.

Now ready.

By
DR. LIONEL TAYLER.
3s. 6d. net.

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

A Biological and Sociological Study.

This fresh and intensely interesting work on a subject of increasing importance will now be published on November 1st. Orders can be placed at once.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

WORKS BY WILLIAM JAMES

Late Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University.

ESSAYS IN RADICAL EMPIRICISM.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Just Published.

CONTENTS:—Does 'Consciousness' Exist?—A World of Pure Experience—
The Thing and Its Relations—How Two Minds Can Know One Thing—
The Place of Affectional Facts in a World of Pure Experience—The Experience of Activity—The Essence of Humanism—La Notion de Conscience—
Is Radical Empiricism Solipsistic?—Mr. Pitkin's Refutation of Radical Empiricism—Humanism and Truth Once—Absolutism and Empiricism.

THE VARIETIES OF RE-LIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

8vo, 12s. net.

MEMORIES AND STUDIES. A Selection of Essays and Addresses. 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

A PLURALISTIC UNI-
VERSE. 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

SOME PROBLEMS OF PHILOSOPHY.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

TALKS TO TEACHERS ON PSYCHOLOGY, and
TO STUDENTS ON
SOME OF LIFE'S
IDEALS. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

PRAGMATISM: A New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking. 8vo,
4s. 6d. net.

THE WILL TO BELIEVE,
and other Essays. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE MEANING OF TRUTH: A Sequel to 'Pragmatism.' 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM JAMES.

By EMILE BOUTROUX, Membre de l'Institut.

Authorised Translation by ARCHIBALD AND BARBARA HENDERSON.

8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.
NEW YORK, BOMBAY, and CALCUTTA.

"THE INQUIRER."

1842—1912.

THE INQUIRER was founded in 1842, and its first number bore the legend "Truth, Freedom, Charity," as the watchwords of its career. Its original staff included, in addition to the editor and sub-editor, a dramatic critic and a writer on the money-market, a sign of the variety of interest which its promoters thought suitable for the religious press. During the seventy years of its existence THE INQUIRER has remained faithful to this largeness of aim, and it has played a considerable part in the widening of the meaning of religion so as to include the hallowing and uplifting of life in all its aspects. It has always sought to promote an attitude of cordial co-operation between the finest human culture and the interests of a tolerant and spiritual Christianity.

At one time news and criticism of a distinctly political character appeared regularly in the columns of THE INQUIRER. But the enormous development of the daily press, combined with the acute cross-divisions in political opinion have led it to forego the doubtful advantage of party allegiance and to claim the support of men and women of all parties, who believe in the application of a high-minded Christian morality to public affairs, the promotion of international peace, and the raising of the mass of the population to higher levels of happiness and well-being. In fulfilment of this purpose it devotes increasing attention to the spiritual significance of the social movement, and the promotion of the various forms of social service in which modern Christianity finds its most characteristic expression.

THE INQUIRER has always been supported by Unitarians, and it has never flinched in its advocacy of the rights and liberties of religious minorities. The best thought and the noblest activities of the Unitarian movement for the past seventy years are reflected in its columns. But it has never been narrowly denominational either in feeling or outlook. Supported by men nurtured in great traditions of tolerance and freedom, it has sought to promote the cause of mutual co-operation and understanding among the various sections of the Christian Church, and to lay more stress on the things which unite than on those which divide. This attitude of wide religious sympathy has won for it recognition in many quarters, and writers of eminence have been glad to contribute to its columns quite irrespective of denominational allegiance. At the present time it supplies an interesting object-lesson in the possibility of cordial co-operation of this kind.

It may seem invidious to make any selection among the names of those whose labours have given to THE INQUIRER the position of influence which it occupies to-day as a Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress. But mention may be made of JOHN LALOR, RICHARD HOLT HUTTON, WALTER BAGEHOT, THOMAS SADLER, and Sir J. R. ROBINSON among the great names of the past. A special word of gratitude is also due to the services of three of its former editors, the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, 1856-88, still living in honoured old age; the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, 1888-1897, and the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, 1898-1909. With such a record it may surely plead that it has filled a worthy place in the annals of English journalism, and if length of years bring wisdom that it has still a noble mission to fulfil.

THE RATIONALITY OF SPIRITUAL TRUST.

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

THIRTY years or so ago the prospect immediately in front of the liberal movement in religion appeared to be a bright and promising one. As against what may be called the conservative attitude, its adherents were conscious of having been victorious all along the line. The work of clearing the ground of a number of antiquated doctrines had been proceeding with vigour and determination. Bodies of experts, thoroughly equipped for the task, had all at once undertaken that work. Scholars, who had spent their lives in tracing the genesis and growth of the Christian and other religions of the world, scientists, who had been winning truth after truth in the laboratory and in the fields of empirical research, were then ready and willing to combine with their occupation as specialists the rôle of the popular writer and lecturer. Nothing, for example, could well be more admirable, either in the way of scientific exposition or in the way of literary persuasiveness, than the non-technical essays and addresses of Huxley and Tyndall, to which so many inquiring minds in those days owed their initiation into the principles of the nineteenth century Aufklärung. With a force and lucidity rarely equalled, these authors swept the curve of discussion through the really significant questions that were in dispute, and left no excuse for misunderstanding or confusion. The untenability, from the point of view of natural science, of the Biblical accounts of the origin of the universe, of the creation and fall of man, and the like, was demonstrated with logical cogency. The whole conception of the miraculous, on the basis of which the orthodoxy of the time reposed, seemed futile in face of the overwhelming evidence that was being exhibited of the reign of law in nature, now a commonplace in physical science. It looked, therefore, safe to predict that another generation would witness the downfall of established dogma, and that the little band of religious folk who had been prepared in advance for the advent of the new knowledge might count upon an early entry into their Canaan. Probably the wiser heads of those days knew better; I doubt, however, whether any of them anticipated the particular trend of events which we have lived to see.

For there is no disguising the fact that the splendid stand made at the time of which I am speaking against traditional creeds and dogmas did not succeed in producing anything like the result which might reasonably have been expected from it. The orthodox communities could not, it is true, proceed upon their way as if nothing had happened. They have been compelled to adapt their theology, in a measure, to the altered conditions. They lend no countenance now to a reconciliation of the early chapters of the Book of Genesis with modern geology, such as was attempted even by Mr. Gladstone, and Bishop Wilberforce's mode of disposing of Darwinism has long since ceased to find imitators. But, on the other hand, the Church of Rome has recently been drawing to its fold a much larger number of converts than previously, Neo-Catholicism has been tightening its hold upon the Established Church of England, a vague mystical Christology has been in course of development among the evangelical Nonconformists, and new sects have been springing up in abundance, each with some special dogma to guard and cherish. And meanwhile the liberal religious movement has been making but comparatively little headway, if, indeed, in certain respects it has not actually lost ground.

How are these things to be accounted for? Doubtless a variety of circumstances would call for mention in any attempt to answer the question fully. I lay stress now upon two circumstances only, which, however, unless I am greatly mistaken, are mainly responsible for what has happened.

In the first place, we need to bear in mind the character of the standpoint from which most of the negative criticism was done. It was that of a rationalism which, if I may so express it, was not thorough-going, a rationalism that had not learnt to confide in its own wings. Underlying its destructive work, much of it eminently necessary and needful, there was a consciousness of impotence when it came to doing anything further. A sceptical distrust in the very principle it was wielding to such effect as an instrument of attack lay at the root of its procedure and doomed it to sterility. Human reason, which it had shown to be capable of tremendous exploits when it was a matter of pulling down the erections of the world's childhood, it treated as a mere babe in the matter of evincing its own constructive power. Though competent enough so long as it continued under the leading strings of sense-perception, human thought was judged to be too hopelessly immature to venture into regions of super-sensuous realities. And not only too immature. A radical defect of a constitutional kind incapacitated it from the start, and there was, therefore, no likelihood of its ever reaching the stage of adult independence. The relatively simple function of tracing back to their farthest antecedents the facts and events of the material world it could discharge fairly well. But set it the task of rendering to some extent intelligible the plan or meaning which these countless groups of sequent occurrences exemplify, and its utter inaptitude at once became manifest. The part of wisdom lay in candidly recognising the limits of rational inquiry, and in relinquishing the dark mysterious realm of the Unknowable to form a sort of playground for the emotions and the imagination to disport themselves at will. So far as the interests of liberal religion were concerned, it amounted, therefore, to this—that what this particular phase of scientific criticism had accomplished for it with the one hand, it nullified with the other.

In the second place, the supporters of the liberal movement in religion were themselves too little aware of the real drift of the sceptical tendency to which I have been alluding. They did not clearly apprehend the nature of the obstruction that had been flung up to block their progress along the road they had hitherto been traversing. Some few of their leading thinkers were certainly alive to the danger of the situation, and by one great mind at least the agnostic challenge was fearlessly accepted and magnificently met. Had Dr. Martineau's larger works seen the light earlier the outcome might have been very different. But, as a rule, the liberal theologians of those days did not deem it a duty of theirs to devote attention to the basal principles of knowledge and morality. With their time largely occupied in developing their objections to the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement and the like, they were diverted from the more vital and fundamental issues which had been raised by the men of science. One thing, however, is certain. Thoughtful minds amongst the laity were interested in these issues much more deeply than in the controversies of the theologians, and, to a far wider extent than was at all suspected at the time, doubts had spread as to the possibility of having a religion based on the normal intelligence of man and apart from a supernatural revelation. Such doubts were not to be allayed by an appeal, only too frequent, to an extra-rational authority, variously described as faith, or intuition, or immediate experience. It was a rational vindication of the religious consciousness that was needed; and when at length that vindication came, in the shape of the great volumes of Martineau and Caird, it came, for the object I am here indicating, too late. The current of thought had turned.

The current of thought had turned, but not appreciably in the direction of scientific agnosticism. The truth is, there is nothing in humanity so ineradicable as its religiousness; and religious experiences, native to the human soul, simply refuse to be argued out of existence. That being so, one can, I think, readily understand how it happened that the agnostic attitude led to a reverting of many to the folds of orthodoxy. To throw discredit upon the powers of reason is for rationalism always a suicidal act, and it proved to be so in this instance. "If you elect to abide by reason, you must put up with its shortcomings, and not expect from it a testimony it cannot give," had been the burden of the agnostic message.

"Very well, then," has been the reply in numerous cases, "we take your word for it; we acknowledge, with you, the impotence of the unaided reason in the presence of matters about which we, as men, are most in need of guidance. If reason can supply us with no satisfactory theory of life, how can you blame us for accepting what we require from other hands? Why should we suppose your critical methods of testing the contents of what purports to be a miraculous revelation are so infallible when in other respects the methods at your disposal are so lamentably defective?" In short, the net result of the agnostic argument was to strengthen rather than to weaken the position of orthodoxy, and to yield it an effective means of repelling the criticism to which it had been subjected. A defence of philosophic doubt may be undertaken in order to save theological dogma from the danger to it that might result had it to encounter philosophic knowledge.

The agnosticism of the last generation reappears again, in a different guise, in the "anti-intellectualism" of the present time, and it is not impossible that, in regard to it, liberal theologians may repeat the mistake of allowing the comparatively trivial matters of sectarian propaganda to obscure the important and fundamental question that is now being forced upon us. Most educated people are familiar with the fashionable antithesis between intellect or reason on the one hand, and instinct or intuition on the other, but perhaps not many will be prepared to recognise its kinship with the old contrast, drawn, for example, in the famous Belfast Address of 1874, between "objective knowledge" and "the region of poetry and emotion." That the two theories are closely related is, however, easily discerned. Intellect evinces, it is true, according to M. Bergson's conception of it, an even more radical defect than the scientists to whom I have been referring would have granted. For they were willing to trust to its guidance in interpreting the facts of the natural world; they disputed only its sufficiency for the interpretation of aught beyond, whilst M. Bergson finds it almost equally disqualified for the one purpose as for the other. Nature, so the great French writer insists, is everywhere an inward process of change and becoming; its central and fundamental characteristic is fluidity, life, creativeness. But intellect, fashioned by evolution for the exigencies of human practice, must needs work with stable elements and invariable conditions, and so singles out from the flowing stream of reality those factors which, taken in abstraction, have the aspect of identity or sameness. After the manner of the camera, which in the hands of enterprising journalists is becoming so tantalising an apparatus for rendering permanent what one would wish to be transient, the intellect takes a number of snapshot views at the passing procession of concrete individuals, makes these the contents of its picture, and then, entrenching itself in a network of concepts obtained in this artificial way, is for ever vainly attempting to entangle and retain in its stationary web the moving reality that is meanwhile hastening on. Hence emerges the violent opposition which

THE MEANING OF CHRISTIANITY

BY THE

REV. FREDERICK A. M. SPENCER.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

(Inland Postage 4d.)

The patristic theology has become antiquated through the subsequent experience of mankind and the extension of science. This book is an attempt to give the principles of a Christian theology more in accord with the thought and practical idealism of the present age. This theology springs out of two fundamental ideas—namely, evolution, and the higher life, called "the spiritual," which is attained in the course of evolution. The main doctrines of Christianity are proved and developed by means of this central thought—humanity evolving through many thousands of generations, and in the course of its evolution acquiring a new kind of life, the spiritual or Divine, which is destined to transform human nature into a condition of immortality.

CONTENTS.

Chap. I. The Spiritual; II. GOD; III. CHRIST; IV. THE HOLY SPIRIT; V. Sin; VI. The Atonement; VII. The Doctrine of Grace; VIII. The Institutions of Christianity; IX. The End of the World; X. The Resurrection; XI. The Judgment; XII. The Kingdom of God.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

MAIN CURRENTS OF MODERN THOUGHT

A Study of the Spiritual and Intellectual Movements of the Present Day.

By RUDOLPH EUCKEN.

12s. 6d. net. (Inland Postage 5d.)

There are two main reasons why this book ranks as one of Professor Eucken's most important works. In the first place it is an illuminating study of the great movements which are now shaping the future of the human race, and in the second place it forms an admirable introduction to Rudolph Eucken's own Religious Idealism.

THE GOSPEL OF FREEDOM

BY THE

Rev. H. D. A. MAJOR, M.A.,
Vice-Principal of the Clergy College, Ripon.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

(Inland Postage 4d.)

"One of the easiest and safest ways of following the course of religious thought is to read all the writings of the Rev. Henry D. A. Major, M.A. For Mr. Major is in touch with all the great movements, and he writes with clearness."—The Expository Times.

"It is impossible to think of anyone who could read it carefully, and with an effort at sympathy, who would not find any amount to set him thinking, and any amount to feel thankful for."—Manchester Guardian.

At all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

M. Bergson and his followers would constitute between intelligence and life. Life is more than intelligence, and knowledge of life comes not by way of intellectual apprehension. The intellect killeth; intuition alone giveth life. By the intellect the world is mechanised and deadened; by intuition it is quickened and vivified. And intuition or instinct, which in its unconscious phase is sympathetic action, becomes in its conscious phase sympathetic insight, a mode of divining sympathy, which requires to be sharply distinguished from intelligence, round which, as a luminous nucleus, it forms, even when amplified and purified, "only a vague nebulosity."

Two obvious considerations suggest themselves at once. In the first place, if the character of reason or intellect be such as is here depicted, if it is constantly falsifying the reality it represents, leading us to suppose that what is moving and living is inert and lifeless, then surely it is a peculiarly unpractical instrument to serve the ends of practical utility, and the clan de vie must be perpetrating upon us a strange and inexplicable trick in evolving it as our means of actively carrying on the business of existence. And in the second place, if the truth of life is revealed to intuition, whilst the intellect is characterised by a natural inability to comprehend the truth of life, it is, to say the least, a curious circumstance that, as a matter of fact, all we really know of life and evolution has been discovered by the latter, in spite of its natural inability, and that the former, in spite of its capacity, has contributed to such knowledge not the smallest iota. The intellect, it is alleged, breaks up what is really continuous into fragments apparently discontinuous. Yet all the same it would have to be admitted that the continuity of the oak with the acorn, or of the mammalia with the lower species of organic beings, are facts which have been hidden from the wisdom of intuition and revealed to the blundering faculty of conceptual thinking!

I am concerned now, however, with Bergson's speculation in so far only as it brings before us a view of the nature of thought or reason which is becoming increasingly prevalent, and which calls certainly for earnest consideration on the part of those who have been wont to base their religious trust on rational grounds. Reason, it is urged, and from various quarters, moves and must necessarily move within a sphere of abstractions. It operates, and can only operate with concepts or notions, and a concept or notion is formed by a process of analysis by which some limited feature or characteristic is artificially severed from the concrete whole to which it belongs, and is then considered for itself alone. We thus lose touch with the rich and varied reality which always has countless aspects, and we content ourselves by singling out some salient feature of that reality. Reason, moreover, cannot correct itself and atone for its own deficiency; it is condemned to roam among shades, and to expend its strength in barren inferences and logical demonstrations. Particularly, it is argued, with respect to religious conviction, does the dissecting process of reason become disastrous, for it murders religious experience in the very act of dissection. Religious conviction is founded in immediate intuition or feeling; and the recesses of feeling, the darker, inarticulate strata of consciousness, are the only places in the world where we catch real fact in the making and are in contract with such absolute realities as we actually know. Compared with this world of vivid individualised feelings, the world of general notions or concepts which reason contemplates is without substance or life. Whilst no logical demonstration ever engendered serious belief in God's existence, the personal assurance that comes from the affective side of our nature may be overwhelming.

The voice is, as I say, largely the voice of the old agnosticism over again, and the error it conveys may be brought to the surface in the following manner. In the first place, it does not follow because reason operates with abstract or general notions, that it is thereby disqualified for the apprehension of concrete living realities. Without general notions, no knowledge, in the ordinary sense of the term, would be possible at all; refuse to use abstract notions, and you must remain, as Aristotle put it long ago, for ever dumb. But knowledge, though itself composed of general notions, may none the less be knowledge of particular individual facts. Just as the word "blue" may mean blue, although the word itself is not blue, so a notion or concept although itself abstract may mean something that is extremely concrete. In the second place, reason is by no manner of means the mere power of forming and using abstract ideas; it is no less essential to recognise the unification and synthesis involved in the process of thinking or reasoning than to recognise the analysis which is perhaps its more obvious external feature. Reason is not only the power of distinguishing and discriminating; it is the power likewise of seeing widely and steadily and connectedly. Even in ordinary speech we call a person unreasonable whose point of view is narrow, who is only conscious of one thing at a time, and who is consequently the prey of his own caprice, whilst we describe a person as reasonable whose outlook is comprehensive, who is capable of looking at more than one side of a question, and of grasping a number of details as parts of one whole. Thus it is that every great scientific generalisation carries with a more accurate and definite individualising of the particulars in which it finds exemplification. If, for example, Newton abstracted from the particular event of a falling apple the universal law of gravitation, the falling apple must instantly have become transformed for him into a much more pronounced and distinctive individual than it had ever been before. By discerning in it an identity with all other moving bodies, he was at the same time determining with greater insight and precision its specific nature and significance. Abstraction is undoubtedly one feature, and a most important feature, of the activity of thought, but its importance consists largely in this, that it renders possible modes of intuition, forms of immediate experience, that would be absolutely unattainable without it. An intuition which at a lower level is vague, confused, and inarticulate, becomes at the higher level clear, distinct, and articulate; an experience once blind and meaningless reveals at length its purport and significance.

There is, then, no real antithesis between intuitive insight and rational insight, between thought and life. Intellect may, of course, degenerate into a cold and merely logical process of ratiocination, that seeks to pass all things in heaven and earth through the sieve of its narrow formulæ of elimination or excision, but it is as absurd to allow this abortion to usurp the name of reason as it would be to take the emaciated body of a helpless cripple to be typical of the human organism. The best expression of life is found in reason when it is actualised in the wide, deep insight that sees life steadily and sees it whole, a culmination which it alone can reach. The rational life presupposes the natural life, and could not exist without it, but the latter does not continue to exist in all its original crudeness side by side with the former. The natural self lives on, with all its feelings, appetites and passions not in mere outward mechanical combination with the higher self, but transformed into the organ of its spiritual life.

Only in the rational life of man, conceived in the sense I have been trying to explain, do we find the trusts and aspirations of religious experience making their appearance and exerting their influence. The rational human consciousness cannot be broken up into separate and independent departments; there is within it no feeling that is not rationalised feeling, nor is there on the other hand any thought that is not suffused with feeling and with willing. But it is intelligence or thought or reason that runs through, characterises, and gives organic relation to all the other aspects of the mental life of man. For the rational mind so constituted, capable, as it then is, of taking a broad, far-seeing, synthetic view of the universe, the fundamental distinction is possible between existing fact and value or worth, and the disparity is recognised between the present actualities of things and the values which may be realised in or through them. This means that in the midst of our life's changes there comes breaking through the changeless—the eternal—in the form of the consciousness of that which is intrinsically worthy. That which is supernatural in the legitimate sense of the term then stands forth to view, and bears along with it an authority which cannot be derived merely from that which is as natural fact. When in intellectual apprehension the inquiring mind subjects its ideas to the stringent norm or standard of truth, and tries to understand what is really significant in the rhythm of events, when it surrenders itself without reserve or stipulation to what is borne in upon it as right or good, when it enjoys with unselfish enjoyment a thing of beauty—in each and all these cases that which ought to be is recognised by the rational consciousness as having no less claim and title to be called real than the stones of the hills or the waves of the sea. And in the long run spiritual trusts rest upon the supreme assurance of rational insight that, in this the universe of being, the reality of values is no whit less certain than the reality of natural facts, and that it can only be so because the ground of such reality is a mind that is divine.

CITIZENSHIP AND THE CHURCHES.

BY THE REV. L. P. JACKS.

THERE is a verse of Henry Vaughan's which seems to me to strike the keynote of my subject, and though it is only the first line that I need for my illustration, you must allow me to quote the verse entire.

O holy Hope ! and high Humility,
High as the heavens above !
These are your walks, and you have shown them me,
To kindle my cold love.

"Holy hope and high humility." These two qualities, taken in combination, are the essential outfit of the perfect citizen. I do not deny that other qualities are required. I would allow the importance of intellect and knowledge, I would agree to all that might be said about the necessity of political science, and I would not quarrel with a certain measure of the combative spirit in fighting for his own and others' rights. If you added the various recognised political virtues, such as public spirit, patriotism, or humanitarianism in its widest sense, I should still be with you. But unless all these qualities and acquirements were held together, encircled and permeated by holy hope and high humility, I should not admit that the ideal citizen was before me.

In listening to the political utterances of various parties I seldom recognise the ideal citizen as I have described him. I perceive a person who possesses many of the qualities I have named; he is able; he is instructed; he has public spirit; he has the courage of the fighter. But I am looking for a man who bears a closer resemblance to King Arthur's knights than he does. He seems to me to lack one and sometimes both of the qualities which I believe essential to the perfect citizen. He lacks that combination of holy hope and high humility which belonged to Sir Galahad.

In vain do we look for this combination in the newspapers, or the movements, the currents, the propaganda of the political life of the time. Perhaps one ought not to look for it there. A man deeply imbued with holy hope and high humility would not make a good leader-writer according to the standards of modern journalism. He might not even make a good speaker according to the standard of modern audiences. The combination is certainly to be met with; but not often in high places, nor in public places. It is met with oftenest among obscure individuals. There are plenty of such, and they are at all times the foundation of the State.

It is the combination of these two qualities that seems to me lacking in the social movements of our time. Looking, however, at the two in separation there is one of them of which no one could say that it fails to appear. Hope, even holy hope, is present everywhere. The modern citizen is full of hope, fuller indeed, than the citizen of any previous age. There never was a time when men's expectations were higher, nor when the things expected were so good. If instead of "hope" I speak of "social aspiration" you will understand what I mean. The whole civilised world, especially Great Britain and the United States, is aflame with social aspirations of one kind or another. In America I think the flame burns even brighter than it does here; but here it burns very bright. Who of us is not a reformer, and a confident reformer at that? Who of us but believes, and believes ardently, in better days soon to be.

But what about "high humility"? Perhaps you may be disposed to think that such a quality is not needed in this connection. Given social aspiration, enough of it, and of the right kind, and we have all we need to mend the world of its most pressing ills. This, however, I cannot accept. I shall try to persuade you that hope, even holy hope, is ineffective in social affairs unless conjoined with high humility. But before giving my reasons for this belief I ask you to notice the plain fact, that high humility, which Burke called "proud submission" and "dignified obedience," is not present among modern citizens to anything like the same degree that social aspiration is present.

Let me give you an example. A friend has recently sent me a copy of the New York Evening Mail, containing a full report of the speeches made in Chicago at the recent launching of Mr. Roosevelt's campaign. These speeches are all aglow with social aspiration. I think it fair to say that never since democracy was born has such a sweeping tide of reforms been offered to a great people all at once. Everything is to be reformed from top to bottom. Nor is there the slightest doubt, to my own mind at least, that the authors of all this mean intensely and mean well. To look on even from a distance is inspiring; to participate in such endeavours must be more inspiring still. Everything that you can wish for in the way of social aspiration is there. But "high humility" is lacking—just as it is on similar occasions at home. Perhaps you will say again that high humility is not to be expected in such things. But I do not think you would maintain that after reading all these speeches, as I have done. For example, on one page of the paper you would find a bold headline indicating one of the chief points in a Senator's speech. The headline runs thus: "The American conscience and intelligence are irresistible." Turning over the page you will find a still bolder headline to the following effect: "Plain statement of facts as to the stealing of the National Convention for Taft." Obviously, therefore, the Senator was wrong. The American conscience is not irresistible any more than the British conscience, or the German conscience, is. Had the American conscience been as irresistible as the Senator thinks it is, it would have prevented the National Convention from being stolen for Taft. Here one feels at once the need for high

T. & T. CLARK'S NEW BOOKS.

ETERNAL LIFE. A Study of its Implications and Applications.

By Baron FRIEDRICH VON HÜGEL, Member of the Cambridge Philological Society. 8s. net. [Ready in October.]

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PERSON OF JESUS CHRIST.

By Prof. H. R. MACKINTOSH, D.Phil., D.D. New Volume of "The International Theological Library." 10s.

THE RELIGIONS OF MODERN SYRIA AND PALESTINE.

By Dr. FREDERICK J. BLISS. 4s. 6d. net.

THE SOURCES OF RELIGIOUS INSIGHT.

By Prof. JOSIAH ROYCE, LL.D. 4s. 6d. net.

THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL UNDER THE KINGDOM.

By Rev. ADAM C. WELCH, Theol.D. 7s. 6d. net.

"The work exhibits throughout a clearness of insight, sanity of judgment, and reverence of tone which entitle it to a prominent position among the newest books on the Old Testament."—Christian World.

GREECE AND BABYLON. A Comparative Sketch of Mesopotamian, Anatolian, and Hellenic Religions.

By LEWIS R. FARNELL, D.Litt. 7s. 6d.

"Of the matter of the book it is impossible to speak too highly: in fact, Dr. Farnell's work in this new and most fruitful field is beyond all praise. We have read it with the greatest interest and pleasure."

Journal of Hellenic Studies.

TYPES OF ENGLISH PIETY.

By Rev. R. H. COATS, B.D. 4s. net.

"He has interpreted the religious tendencies of our day with a balanced judgment and with a fine literary finish which make his book delightful and profitable reading."

—London Quarterly Review.

AN ANGLO-SAXON ABBOT. Ælfrie of Eynsham.

A Study by Rev. S. HARVEY GEM, M.A. 4s. net.

"Mr. Gem handles his matter as a scholar writing for plain readers, and he is to be thanked for giving us at once a contribution to the history of our Church and a popular introduction to our earliest literature."—Guardian.

FAITH AND THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Rev. A. W. F. BLUNT, M.A. 2s. net.

"As a lucid and scholarly attempt to face the main problems arising out of the conclusions of modern Biblical scholarship, it should be widely appreciated."—Athenæum.

THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT CELTS.

By Canon JOHN A. MACCULLOCH, D.D. 10s. net.

"Dr. MacCulloch is greatly to be congratulated on producing a valuable work, for which Celtic scholars and students in other fields of learning will be very grateful."—Journal of Theological Studies.

COMMUNION WITH GOD: The Preparation before Christ and the Realization in Him.

By Principal DARWELL STONE, D.D., and Rev. D. C. SIMPSON, M.A. 4s. net.

"A beautiful, reasonable, sympathetic book."—Expository Times.

Three New Volumes of the

"INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY"

HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, MALACHI, AND JONAH.

By Profs. H. G. MITCHELL, D.D., J. M. P. SMITH, Ph.D., and Prof. J. A. BEWER, Ph.D. 12s.

THESSALONIANS.

By Prof. JAMES E. FRAME, M.A. 10s. 6d.

THE JOHANNINE EPISTLES.

By Rev. A. E. BROOKE, B.D., Cambridge. 10s. 6d.

An Indispensable Book of Reference.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS.

Edited by JAMES HASTINGS, M.A., D.D.

"No book more generally indispensable to the student or to the thoughtful man has been attempted in this generation. It is a library in itself, its writers are men of world-wide reputation, its general arrangement is admirable, and its possession must be a boon and a privilege."—Liverpool Daily Post.

Four volumes ready. Vol. V. nearly ready. Price per volume in cloth, 28s. net; and in half-morocco, 34s. net.

Complete Prospectus free.

T. & T. CLARK, Edinburgh & London.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Ltd.

humility in dealing with great affairs. It is as fatal for a nation as it is for a man to regard its conscience as irresistible. All our troubles as nations and as men arise from the ease with which our consciences can be resisted: and it is the function of high humility to make us recognise this humbling fact. We feel the awfulness of conscience just in proportion as we feel our ability to resist its commands. Were it irresistible all would be easy. Because it is not irresistible all is difficult. We have to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, trusting neither ourselves nor anybody else to do right merely because conscience tells us that right ought to be done. There was once a man who coveted his neighbour's ass. "It is harmless to covet," he said to himself, "because my conscience forbids me to go further and steal." And immediately he went forth into the field and stole the ass.

None the less the introduction of conscience in this connection is vitally important, and the American Senator was right in the main. It is impossible to doubt that the principle at work as well in our social aspirations as in current law-making is a principle of conscience. Social reform at bottom is neither more nor less than an effort to be just. If the law of England as it stands to-day and as it promises to stand to-morrow be compared with the law as it stood a hundred years ago, none but a blind soul could overlook the vast increase in the moral tendencies of legislation. The oratory of Mr. Roosevelt and his supporters, as well as of his opponents, leave upon the mind, at least they leave upon my own, the impression that in American politics also conscience is profoundly at work. It is true that I should feel deeper confidence in the righteousness of Mr. Roosevelt if he would give up the habit of asserting in public that his motives are righteous. It is the only thing that makes me suspicious; but when allowance is made for the difference in temperament between the Americans and ourselves, the suspicion does not amount to much. Taking a broad view of the situation I cannot doubt that American public life is seething with ethical enthusiasm, just as our own is, and that Mr. Roosevelt, but not he alone, is a true spokesman of the people in that respect. So then I think we may conclude that a great wave of social aspiration is at the present moment passing over the entire Anglo-Saxon race, and that these aspirations owe their origin to moral forces. A new vision of the good has been revealed to the eyes of the peoples. The life of the race is strong in hope, and in hope that is holy.

This very circumstance, splendid as it is, has its own dangers. I do not allude to the fact that reforms which originate in conscience may yet be wrong-headed and mistaken. That danger is real; but statesmen are well aware, perhaps too well aware, of its presence. The danger I am thinking of springs from another source, from the very source, in fact, which led the American Senator to speak of the national conscience as irresistible. People are too apt to think that the victory of progress is won when conscience stands behind the laws. The goodness, the righteousness of the laws satisfies them. If only they can get that they will have all they want. Of course, we differ as to what exactly would constitute a righteous law; but behind our difference lies the common agreement that righteous laws, if only we could get them, would set us right. Now that, I venture to think, is a delusion, and a very dangerous one.

To make good laws is one thing: to get those laws obeyed by the people is another. The difference exists in a democratic community quite as truly as in a community ruled in any other way. Obedience to law does not follow from the fact that the people have imposed them on themselves. How often have you and I made laws for ourselves which we have soon found an excuse for breaking. Nor is obedience secured by the goodness of the law, by its obvious justice, by its complete expression of the conscience of the people. A perfectly just system of laws, when you come to think of it, would be very hard upon us all. It would have a pleasant side, no doubt, so far as it removed the wrongs and the unjust burdens we have to bear. But it would have a difficult side too; because in the strange complex of modern civilisation we are all parties, often unwilling and even unconscious parties, to inflicting wrongs and burdens on other people. Were the laws made perfectly just to-morrow we should all be intensely surprised at the amount of renunciation we should have to practise, and the number of arduous things we should have to do. No class of persons would be more surprised than those of us who are now most eager that law should be perfectly just. We should be surprised in the first place at discovering how much harm we had done without knowing it. We should be still more surprised to find that many persons whom we now regard as doing more harm than ourselves are in point of fact not doing so much. A day of judgment, full of strange reversals, would come for everybody. Many that are first would be last, and the last first. Nobody would go scot-free. Amusements that we consider necessary, conveniences that seem innocent, privileges we regard as sacred would have to be given up. Should we consent? I am doubtful for myself. If I consented it would be by the grace of God, and not in virtue of any qualities I now possess as a citizen or a man. Taking myself as I am I feel pretty sure that I should cry out that it wasn't fair, and I should begin to join myself with others who were of the same opinion. There would be plenty of them. And among them there would certainly be a few clever scoundrels, calling themselves patriots, or lovers of liberty, or what not, who would soon teach the rest of us how these just laws which seemed so unjust upon ourselves, could be made of none effect. We should develop a wonderful ingenuity in inventing excuses for our disobedience, and modes of escape from its penalties.

But the mention of penalties suggests a possible weakness in my argument. I may be told that there is no real analogy between the laws which private conscience lays down for the individual, and laws which public conscience lays down for the community. It is true that the individual may resist the legislation of his private conscience without suffering any penalty beyond that which conscience itself imposes. Not so with laws established by the State. If I break a public law which bids me do justice to my fellowman all the world may know of it, and I shall then be promptly clapped into jail. There is therefore no playing fast and loose with the public conscience, as there is with the private, when once it has expressed itself in law. Is not the State armed with powers of coercion adequate to prevent such things? And does not this destroy the analogy?

I wish I could persuade myself that it did. I am just as ready as any man to reason, in my ordinary moments, on the supposition that the will of the community makes the laws, and the policeman does the rest. But at other moments, which I believe to be better informed, this supposition seems to me a fond illusion. The policeman can really do no more than a law-abiding people are willing that he should do. If they are not law abiding the very first person to become infected with their lawlessness will be the policeman. When I was in America my American friends told me that in many great cities the police are the principal agents in defeating obnoxious laws which have been passed by the conscience of the community. The policeman is effective just in so far as he is backed up by the proud submission and dignified obedience of the citizens. A good policeman is possible only in an atmosphere of high humility. Where that spirit does not exist there are no good policemen. And a bad policeman is worse than none at all.

Believing, then, as I think we must, that the public conscience is becoming more powerful in the shaping of law, the community must be on its guard against supposing that the police can save it from unfaithfulness to its own moral decrees. If the spirit of unfaithfulness is abroad the police are more likely to abet than to hinder the moral weakness of the citizens. On that ground alone I would maintain that the analogy with the private conscience still holds good.

Again. The problem of coercing the disobedient, which, of course, is what I have in mind in speaking of the policeman, assumes very different aspects according to the different degrees of control which the law assumes over the citizen. Coercion is practicable only within narrow limits; when, for example, the law confines itself to the protection of life and property, and the enforcement of contracts. The exact point at which law begins to outrun its own power of compulsion cannot be defined; but such a point unquestionably exists, and is probably much sooner reached than most of us seem to imagine. And for my own part I cannot doubt that all the great social movements of our time are concerned with creating systems of legislation, so vast in extent, so complex in application, that it would be wholly impossible to police their working. Assuming that these systems fail to carry the antecedent goodwill of the people, and require to be enforced by the strong arm of the law, they are one and all doomed to come to naught. Even as things are the problem is difficult enough. The mass of legislative enactments which control the ordinary operations of trade and employment has grown of late by such large and rapid additions that the powers of the State are taxed to the uttermost in looking after the recalcitrant, who are certainly numerous. Ask any village policeman to describe the change which has come in the scope of his duties during the last ten years. Said one of them to me, "What with this new pig-fever law and these 'ere sheep-dippin' regulations, I can tell you, Sir, that it's not often I get a good night's rest. Why, it wants two policemen to look after every farm in this parish." Well, "this new pig-fever law and these 'ere sheep-dippin' regulations" are only a drop in the bucket of recent legislation, and the bucket itself is only a drop in the ocean compared to the vaster systems of legislative control towards which our social aspirations are pointing. Please understand that I am not arguing against the extension of legislative control. I am only pointing out that the vast systems contemplated by our social idealists will either work of themselves or not work at all. They cannot be worked by coercion. Take, for example, the stupendous programme outlined by Mr. Roosevelt in his Chicago speech. Mr. Roosevelt proposes to put the entire business life of the United States under strict legislative control. Production, distribution, consumption, employer and employed, manufacturer, buyer and seller, must all submit to laws enacted by the conscience of the community. Now just imagine what all this would mean, if the community having obeyed its conscience by enacting these laws in a moment of moral insight and enthusiasm, shall fall a little later into a mood of moral apathy, just as an individual is apt to do, discovering the irksomeness of these just restraints it has imposed upon itself, and reverting once more to its devil-take-the-hindmost attitude of mind. The problem of coercion would then arise, and coercion on so vast a scale is, I venture to think, impossible; or even if possible an appalling thing to contemplate. The same thought applies to the legislative programme of Socialism, which I need hardly remind you is entirely different both in principle and aim from that of Mr. Roosevelt. Socialism as a system willingly accepted by the people seems to me practicable enough; but Socialism as a system to be enforced or even policed, is a manifest absurdity. Whichever of the two forms our social aspirations may take what we have to provide for is not merely a moral enthusiasm which will bring the desired system into existence, but a moral enthusiasm which will sustain it in being after it has been created. Unless we can do this second thing we effect very little by doing the first. And the second thing is much more difficult to do than the first. The first, however, is all that most of us are thinking about. We are, as I have said, too apt to rest content as soon as we see the public conscience at work in making the laws. We are too little concerned to bring the public conscience into a state which will faithfully maintain, in spite of all hardships, the laws itself has made. Such a state of the public conscience is precisely what I mean by that high humility, which is proud submission and dignified obedience.

Were I called on to answer the question so often raised of the relation of the churches to the social problems of the time I should try to answer on the line of those reflections. Of all the qualities that go to the make-up of the perfect citizen high humility is the one that lies nearest to religion. If you tell me that holy hope—social aspiration—lies very near to religion, I shall agree. But I shall add, that high humility lies nearer still, and I shall try to persuade you, and I think you will not require much persuasion, that in social affairs holy hope is a vain thing until combined with high humility. Yet high humility, essential though it be, is the neglected factor in the social life of the time. Unless the churches make themselves responsible for its cultivation, I do not know who else will. And if nobody cultivates it our brightest dreams will come to naught.

The peculiarity of religion is that it exhibits the good under personal forms which enlist the permanent loyalty of the human heart. Religion does more than rouse moral enthusiasm; it maintains the moral enthusiasm that it rouses. Here it is that religion and good citizenship join hands. The essence of both is loyalty. I need not say permanent loyalty; because the very point of loyalty is its permanence. And the great defect of the various non-religious ideals of our time seems to be precisely there. They are efficient enough up to the point of the rousing enthusiasm to carry reform; but they make no provision for that enduring self-submission which alone ensures the result. I will say no word to depreciate by one grain the good that is being done by non-religious social ideals. I will only point out one thing they are failing to do. They are failing to produce the type of character which can sustain the burden involved in what they propose. They are proposing to the world schemes of life for which existing loyalty is wholly inadequate, and they do nothing to provide the loyalty that will be required. Something more than humanitarian economics is needed. And it were better that those schemes, admirable as they are, should not be tried at all rather than be tried and then come to naught for want of loyal souls to carry them through. That is the danger that overclouds the future of democracy; and it seems to me to indicate pretty plainly a function for the churches in relation to the social problems of the time.

THE October number of the Hibbert Journal contains an important article by Dr. L. P. Jacks on "Democracy and Discipline," which should be read in connection with his discussion of "Citizenship and the Churches," which appears in our present issue. Among other articles of special interest in the same number we may mention "The Essence of Religion," by the Hon. Bertrand Russell; "Modernism and the Protestant Consciousness," by Professor Lobstein; "The Pessimism of Bergson," by J. W. Scott; and "The Gnostic Redeemer," by Edwyn Bevan.

New & Recent Books

ECCE DEUS: Studies of Primitive Christianity. By Prof. W. B. SMITH.

Cloth, xxiv. + 352 pp., 6s. net; by post, 6s. 5d. [Ready 25th October.

This scholarly work by the Professor of Tulane University, New Orleans, originally appeared in German. It has now been for the first time translated into English by the author, who has made extensive and important additions to the text.

The distinguished critic, M. SALOMON REINACH, wrote of the original edition: "I have read this great book from cover to cover. It is a possession for ever. The author may not live to see it, but it will be read by myriads and shed light on millions."

RADICAL VIEWS ABOUT THE NEW TESTAMENT. By G. A. VAN DEN

BERGH VAN EYSINGA. Translated from the Dutch by S. B. SLACK, M.A., with an Introduction by the Translator. Cloth xvi. + 128 pp., 2s. net. [Ready 25th October.

The various sections of this thought-provoking work deal with the Beginnings of Radical Criticism in Holland; the Character of the Gospel Story; the Spuriousness of all the So-called Pauline Epistles; Paul and Jesus; Early Christian Writings. The whole problem of the historicity of Jesus is discussed and elucidated.

WITNESSES to the HISTORICITY OF JESUS. By ARTHUR DREWS, Ph.D.,

Professor of Philosophy at Karlsruhe. Cloth, xii. + 319 pp., 6s. net; by post, 6s. 4d.

This is a revised version, specially prepared for English readers, of the work written by Prof. Drews in continuation of his "Christ Myth." The book became quite a storm-centre in Germany, and in the present work Prof. Drews replies to his numerous critics. Mr. Joseph McCabe is responsible for the translation.

TWELVE YEARS IN A MONASTERY.

By JOSEPH McCABE. Cloth, 256 pp., 9d. net; by post 1s.

"The book represents most interesting autobiography. It is quietly written, and, while the ultra-sensational is avoided, remarkable revelations are given of the monastic life, while the criticism of the system is severe and searching."—Edinburgh Evening News.

HISTORY OF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY. By A. W. BENN, Author of

"The Greek Philosophers," "The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century," &c. Cloth, vi. + 154 pp., with 9 Illustrations, 1s. net; by post, 1s. 3d.

HISTORY OF MODERN PHILOSOPHY.

By A. W. BENN. Uniform with the "History of Ancient Philosophy." Cloth, 1s. net; by post, 1s. 3d.

[Ready 25th October.

THE EVOLUTION OF STATES: an Introduction to English Politics. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P. Cloth, 496 pp., 5s. net; by post, 5s. 5d.

[Ready 25th October.

THE R. P. A. ANNUAL FOR 1913.

Containing contributions by EDEN PHILLPOTTS, E. SIDNEY HARTLAND, Rev. R. ROBERTS, JOSEPH McCABE, A. W. BENN, and others. In Paper Cover, 6d. net; by post, 8d.; cloth, 1s. net; by post, 1s. 3d. [Ready 25th October.

Complete Catalogue, with Copy of "Literary Guide" (16 Large Pages), free on receipt of Post Card.

London:

WATTS & CO.,
17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

By CANON A. L. LILLEY.

It is easy enough for the interested observer to record the evidences of what is called Liberalism in any existing Christian community. It is, indeed, much more easy than profitable. For the question that is of decisive importance remains, viz., what chances of success within the particular Communion and as a permanent contribution to the further development of its religious life such a movement is likely to have. And the answer to this question depends on changes which are now at work in the attitude and essential constitution of churches, changes which have nothing to do with theology, yet whose results upon the particular theology of those churches may be important and even decisive. I shall ask leave, therefore, in dealing with the Liberal movement in my own Church to consider these two questions separately.

I.

I propose then, in the first place, to indicate the tendencies in actual Anglican theology which seem to me to have an essentially Liberal direction. To do even this it is necessary, before everything else, to take account of the general change of attitude which has characterised the history of the English Church during the last seventy years. It is useless, for instance, save for the purposes of bare historical record, to dwell upon the Essays and Reviews discussion, or even upon the controversies that arose round the militant person of Colenso. Their results have, indeed, long since passed into the general mind of Christendom. But the type of Liberalism which was represented by these pioneers has no point of contact with the present theological temper of the Church. The only Liberalism that exists, that has at least any chance of fruitful action within the Anglican Church, is one which can make effective appeal to that Church as modified by Tractarianism. The Tractarians recovered for Anglicanism the idea of the corporate Christian Society, with all its implied religious values, the value of tradition, the value of continuity, the value of a Divine-human mediation of grace as typified and concentrated in the sacramental system. They no doubt conceived of and represented those values in the most rigid and exclusive manner. For them tradition was the ipse dixit of the Fathers, continuity depended on a quasi-mechanical succession of ecclesiastical orders, sacramental grace was mediated exclusively through this miraculous order. Yet the values had been definitely recovered, and henceforward the function of religious Liberalism had become the universalising and religious deepening of these values.

It may be admitted at once that this positive and essentially religious function of Liberalism has hardly yet dawned upon the general consciousness of the English Church. It is to certain members of the Roman Church that the honour of conceiving it clearly belongs. That is not to be wondered at. The Church which is just recovering long abandoned religious values is less likely to see their universal import than the Church whose religious heritage they have always been. Yet if this positive function of Liberalism has hardly as yet been desiered within our own borders, the preparation for it has gone on apace through the mere pressure of increasing historical knowledge. That preparation dates definitely among us from the appearance of Lux Mundi. The importance of that work is indeed to be measured less by the intrinsic worth of its contribution to the solution of the religious problem of our day than by the position of commanding influence which many of its authors have won in the counsels of the Church. Conclusions of a revolutionary character as to the nature of Biblical inspiration which might otherwise have had to fight their way hardly to recognition obtained an immediate prevalence among large sections of the younger clergy during the Nineties. And as always happens in such cases, the initial modification of established positions speedily led to a more radical application of the principles which had determined that modification. It is noteworthy that practically all the members of the English Church who are now identified with a more advanced Liberalism were formed, theologically, by the Catholic movement which issued from Tractarianism and maintain an obstinate loyalty to what they conceive to be the permanent substance of its tradition. Lux Mundi forced a breach in the ramparts of the orthodox tradition. Those who next took up the implements with which the breach had been effected, found that they were possessed of weapons which they could not control. The demolition proceeded apace.

It is unnecessary to insist on the nature of the orthodox tradition. It was a structure of massive and imposing solidity, built up with unexampled skill and loving devotion, in sweat of mind and soul, by the greatest minds of Christendom throughout the Christian centuries. But practically the building had been completed by the great Schoolmen of the thirteenth century. Since then it may be said that no stone has been added to its walls. Only a little necessary pointing has been done here and there, with the same logical cement which the Schoolmen had used, by both Roman and Protestant theologians in those parts of the building in which each was specially interested. The safety of this imposing structure depended solely on the soundness of its foundation, the belief, viz., that God had communicated to man in a series of inerrant and infallible revelations His purpose of redemption. The whole of the orthodox Christian scheme was in danger of collapse if this foundation of an infallible Bible were to prove insecure. But the historico-critical movement of the nineteenth century had declared just this insecurity in the foundations. The Liberals of the Lux Mundi group, men of the most earnest faith and devotion, finding themselves faced by the necessity of conceding a large measure of the critical conclusions as to the human and therefore fallible element in the Bible, set to work to underpin the foundations. The metaphor is defective. It would be more correct to say that with all the colossal enterprise of the American architect they attempted to lift the whole structure bodily and plant it on a new foundation. The Divine Revelation, they claimed, is not in the mere letter of Scripture, but in the Divinely-guided selective faculty of the Universal Church, which has chosen from Scripture what is fundamental in it. The Creeds are the result of that selective effort. The Creeds, therefore, not the Bible, are the infallible foundation of the Christian system.

This, however, was a position which could hardly fail to provoke further criticism. If, as is admitted, the human character of the individual prophet, marked out by his special holiness, interfered with the revealing energy of the Holy Spirit in him, so that his prophecy can no longer be regarded as having exact literal truth, but must be taken as merely symbolical, how can we be justified in asserting that that human interference was done away in the case of excited assemblies to which at least one of the Creeds, and that the one which has most universal authority in Christendom, is due? Obviously, the theory of a Divinely-inspired faculty, selective of saving truth, in the Church, is subject to exactly the same limitations here as hold for every other instance of Divine inspiration. But, further, how can this theory serve as a foundation for the Scholastic theological structure, since it is itself but an integral part of that structure? The Scholastics, too, believed that the Church was divinely inspired to select what it needed for its saving work from Divine Revelation. But they believed it not as a fact of immediate and underived knowledge, not as a kind of new Divine Revelation, but as a logical conclusion from the fact of the original and immediate Divine Revelation contained in the Holy Scriptures. The infallible Church was a deduction from the infallible New Testament, and the New Testament was infallible because it was the fulfilment of a long series of precise and infallible prophecies in the Old. Pius X. has rightly seen that the Scholastic or infallible theory of the Church could not be maintained for an hour if the Scholastic or infallible theory of the Bible were tampered with, and has therefore through his Biblical Commission condemned as an arch-heresy the slightest modification of the traditional doctrine of Scriptural infallibility and inerrancy.

These are considerations which ever since the days of Lux Mundi have been working in the minds of the younger generation, and have determined the character of the newer Liberalism in our Church. With this purely critical point of view there has co-operated a much more important but less easily definable feeling after a more universal or positively religious value in dogma. Briefly, it may be said that the younger Liberals in the English Church are dominated by two main conceptions, that of religion as a universal human fact witnessing to God's universal redemptive action, that of Christianity as the unique expression of this human fact witnessing to a unique revelation of that redemptive action. As they look for a redemptive revelation where alone it can be proved and tested, in the complex movement of life itself, in what is most personal and least passive of logical analysis, they find it natural that a unique human personality, unique in its holiness and in its inmost self-identification with the Divine Will of Righteousness, should be the supreme Mediator of that redemption among men. They find the religious value of tradition in the corporate influences of actual holy living which pass on from age to age, not only undiminished but with continual increase, incorporate above and beyond their temporal separateness with the eternal action of the Divine-human Spirit of Christ. They value the merely theological tradition more for its actual variety than for the fictitious uniformity which is read into it, finding in that variety the manifold intellectual attempts to express or to justify different, sometimes opposing, aspects of the same complex religious experience. They value even the outward continuity of Church order, but only as the human instrument for fostering and safeguarding the inner continuity which is the immediate work of the Spirit of holiness. They value the sacramental system as the most adequate symbol and instrument of the penetrative action of the Divine grace throughout the Christian community, of the over-individual quality which the Divine grace generates in the individual life, annihilating mere individuality and releasing forces which are of universal effect throughout the world of spirit.

II.

I have left myself but little space for the discussion of the further question, what chances of success such a Liberalism is likely to have in the Anglican Communion. It is obvious that, even if it should ultimately succeed in justifying itself as a movement within the English Church, it cannot in any case hope for the immediate success which attended the Tractarian movement. That was a movement of concentration upon certain definite aspects of religious truth which there was no mistaking. Modern Liberalism is a dispersive movement towards the unproved or unknown, working in different minds from different starting-points; recording different interests, some purely critical and speculative, others religiously constructive, but all of them from the orthodox point of view revolutionary; and again depositing those whom it carries with it at very different points on its forward course. Of such a movement it is impossible to say much more than that it exists as a general tendency or habit of mind at work upon religious problems. From its present dispersiveness and confusion it will not be rescued until a great religious leader arises capable of vindicating successfully the permanent religious values of the Christian tradition in terms of the new habit of mind.

But there are other considerations which make it still more perilous to prophesy. The idea, once so prevalent and powerful, and still more the fact, of national churches is everywhere ceasing to exist. Even up till the Separation Law of 1905 both the fact and the idea, and the fact still more than the idea, existed in the French Church. Six short years have abolished it utterly as fact, and as idea too it must gradually disappear. Unconsciously for the most part the same process of decay is being repeated in England. With Disestablishment, or the new Establishment on terms dictated solely by the Church for which certain ecclesiastics are clamouring, this process would be practically complete. Now it is impossible exactly to forecast how such a change of view as to the relations of the Church to the national life would affect the present Liberal theological movement. Certain aspects at least of the changing situation are clear. One and indeed the only justifying effect of Establishment is that it provides for the control of general national feeling in the Church which represents the religious life of the particular nation. But in order that this control may be at once religious and effectual, the nation as a whole must care for religion, and care for it specially as represented by the national Church. Now in the history of the English people during at least the last half-century there have been two forces at work which have completely nullified this effectual religious control of the nation in the life of the National Church. On the one hand, a growing religious indifference has given free play to the growing tendency towards ecclesiasticism in the Church. On the other, the growing political influence of Nonconformity, introducing increasingly into the national temper a religious interest which is, if not individualistic, at least antipathetic to the idea of a nation-embracing Church, has conspired to the same result. So it has come to pass that the Establishment no longer procures the only effect which would justify its existence, and that the spirit of ecclesiasticism, the spirit which practically identifies the closed religious system with the Kingdom of God, is now in unchallenged possession of the Church.

Now just as, perhaps just because, ecclesiasticism is the necessary consequence of popular indifference to religion, so it is itself inspired with a sincere and ardent, if also narrow and exclusive, zeal for religion. The English Church during the last half-century, the French during the last half-decade, have both witnessed marvellous outbursts of this zeal. It is a zeal which, as I have said, is sincerely religious, but it is at the same time a zeal for a closed and finished system regarded as the absolute vehicle of religion. When in England the Establishment goes, as it must go, sooner or later, in obedience to both the political and the religious tendencies of the age, the last and that a merely legal and external barrier to the triumph of ecclesiasticism in the English Church will have been removed. If Liberalism has not begun effectively to penetrate the whole clerical mind before that event happens, it is doubtful whether it could afterwards, from within, resist the tendency to identify the free action of the Divine Spirit in the complex world of life with the traditional Church system whose supreme honour it ought to be that it is a chosen but most imperfect and ever perfectible instrument of that Spirit.

On the other hand, there is much hope for Liberalism in the fact that the new clerical zeal and devotion is bringing the Church right into the heart of contemporary life. The effect of this closer contact ought to be a widening and deepening of the Church's religious instinct which would inevitably carry it in the direction of a really religious Liberal-

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

DR. H. B. SWETE.

The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church. A Study of Christian Teaching in the Age of the Fathers. By HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and Hon. Canon of Ely. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

The Church Family Newspaper.—"The author's name has long been a guarantee for the best qualities to be found in theological writing. None of them will be missed in his latest work."

SECOND AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. By Sir FREDERIC G. KENYON, K.C.B., Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum. With Sixteen Facsimiles. Second Edition, thoroughly revised. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.

The Second Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians. Introduction, Text, English Translation and Notes. By ALLAN MENZIES, D.D., Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism, St. Mary's College, University of St. Andrews. 8vo. 6s. net.

Christian Faith and Worship. A Series of Sermons. By JOHN GAMBLE, B.D., Vicar of St. Mary's, Leigh Woods, Bristol, Author of "Christ and Criticism," "The Spiritual Sequence of the Bible," &c. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Signs of the Times. Sermons delivered in St. Mary's Church, Oxford. By Rev. E. M. WALKER, Fellow and Tutor of Queen's College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVELS.

Marriage.

By H. G. WELLS. 6s.

Mrs. Lancelot.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. 6s.

By the Author of "The Charwoman's Daughter."

The Crock of Gold.

By JAMES STEPHENS. 5s. net.

The Standard :—"There is not another book like this 'Crock of Gold' in English literature. There are many books like pieces of it, but the humour and the style, these things are Mr. Stephens's own peculiar gift."

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

ism. The Church Socialist movement is an evidence that that effect is actually being produced among us. But even here there are hesitations and demurrers. Will the Church, with the utmost willingness and eagerness on the part of her ministers, be allowed to penetrate contemporary life as a whole? There are enormous forces of resistance to such an attempt which it will need sustained and courageous faithfulness on her part to overcome. The Church as closed system, and it is so that it is regarded by the great masses of men, has no attraction for, even where it does not actually repel, the most progressive and revolutionary forces in contemporary life. And again, it is just as system that it increasingly attracts all those who either openly resist or secretly dread the unknown forces which the contemporary instinct for reform threatens to release. The clergy must count on the most determined hostility and opposition from this type of ecclesiastical layman, the only type that now wields any influence in the counsels of the Church, in their efforts to make the religious spirit as mediated by the Church the leaven of progress. The leaven, however, is at work, thanks even more to the devoted and self-sacrificing labours of the Socialist clergy than to the work of the solitary Liberal thinker, and chiefly on its continued working the success of Liberalism, of a confident and progressive religious spirit, in our Church depends.

A SERIES of five "Lindsey Hall Lectures" will be given on Thursday evenings at Lindsey Hall, the Mall, Notting Hill Gate, as follows:—November 14—"Religion and the Need for Salvation," Dr. L. P. Jacks; December 12—"Modernism—Roman and Anglican," the Rev. Canon Lilley; January 16—"Theology and Philosophy," Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A.; February 15—"Christianity in the Light of Comparative Religion," Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter; March 13—"The Higher Naturalist," Dr. J. Moffatt. These lectures are offered to all thoughtful people, to readers of the Hibbert Journal, and to those in quest of Faith and Truth. They have the approval of the Hibbert Trustees.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE have just issued, at the popular price of one shilling, a collection of papers on England and Germany. They may be regarded as an enlightened and clearly reasoned contribution to the cause of mutual understanding and international goodwill. Among the contributors on the English side are Lord Haldane, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, Sir Rufus Isaacs, and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald; while Germany is represented by such names as His Excellency von Holleben, late German Ambassador to the United States, Herr Theodor Wolff, editor of the Berlin Tageblatt, and last, but not least in a matter where questions of international finance are so important, Herr Arthur von Gwinner, Director of the German Bank and member of the Upper House.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN THE EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCHES.

BY THE REV. H. E. B. SPEIGHT.

Soon after the passing of the Toleration Act (1689) a movement arose, which had for its goal the union of the old Nonconformist bodies into a "dissenting interest" in which Presbyterians and Independents should stand together as Protestant Dissenters. This enjoyed a temporary success, and a document entitled Heads of Agreement (1691) was circulated. Doctrinal differences, however, soon became apparent, and the Independents were suspicious of heterodoxy among the Presbyterians. Controversies ensued, and Dr. Daniel Williams, after whom the well-known library is named, was one of the Presbyterians involved. Trouble arose at Exeter, where James Peirce and other Presbyterian ministers were under suspicion of Arianism. The managers of the Exeter churches dismissed Peirce and Hallet, and the controversy became so prominent that the London ministers met at Salter's Hall in 1719 to review the situation. The proposal that those present should declare their belief in the Doctrine of the Trinity and in the Divinity of Christ divided the company into subscribers and non-subscribers, the majority of the non-subscribers being Presbyterians, the subscribers being mainly Congregationalists and Baptists. The suspicions of the Independents as to the unorthodoxy of the Presbyterians appeared to be justified, though the real issue did not lie in the doctrines referred to so much as in the principle of subscription as a basis of co-operation. They were more fully justified by the subsequent spread of Arianism amongst the younger Presbyterian ministers, and by the demand (from 1730 to 1740) for the modification of the Shorter Catechism of the Assembly.

Such is the first chapter of the history of the growth of theological liberty in the Protestant Dissent. The division which arose was accentuated by the Evangelical revival associated with the names of Wesley and Whitefield. Low Churchmen and Congregationalists were both stirred by the movement, and stood together as Evangelicals. The dissenting Evangelicals resisted an attempt that was made in 1772 to obtain from Parliament a modification of the terms of subscription demanded by the Toleration Act from dissenting ministers before they were licensed to preach. Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, a staunch Calvinist, gave her strong support to the objectors, who assured Parliament that they desired no relief whatever. The Bill was carried in 1779, a declaration of adherence to Christianity and of belief in the Scriptures being substituted for the Articles of the Church of England. The latter half of the century was marked by a gradual growth of a public opinion favourable to religious liberty; but into the question of the relation of Evangelical Dissent to the Established Church, or the struggle for the liberty of public office and of education, we cannot enter here. When we come to the nineteenth century, as Dr. J. E. Odgers well says in an unpublished essay which it has been my great privilege to consult, "the history of progress mainly consists in a record of things that will not occur again." We have few landmarks, and the changes that have taken place are not tangible, nor have they yet found expression in any very widespread acknowledgment of their own existence.

The churches united in the Congregational Union of England and Wales have been particularly open to influence. Their members are, generally speaking, recruited from the more educated of the middle classes, and the nineteenth century progress in natural science and in the history of man has been responsible for a general theological reconstruction. One of the first achievements of the Union was a Declaration of Faith (1833), setting forth the "Faith, Church Order, and Discipline of the Congregational or Independent Dissenters." This Declaration has been described recently as a "moderate popular statement of Calvinist doctrine." In a preliminary statement we are told that, "disallowing the utility of creeds and articles of religion as a bond of union, and protesting against subscription to any human formularies as a term of communion, Congregationalists are yet willing to declare, for general information, what is commonly believed among them, reserving to every one the liberty of conscience." Let us see what light subsequent events throw upon this admirable repudiation of doctrinal tests. The Union as such has never arrogated to itself the power of excluding anyone; it has generally had recourse to a reaffirmation of the doctrines endangered by any given preacher's utterances, and the offender has been free to withdraw or to submit to the implied reproof. At the same time the Union has been representative of and the instrument of a general opinion which has more than once violated the principles affirmed in the 1833 Declaration. Principal Selbie aptly enough describes the Rivulet controversy, the Davidson case, the Leicester Conference, and the New Theology movement as the "growing pains" of the advance in theological reconstruction, but we must remember whose have been the pains and penalties. Lynch, Davidson, Wood, Alanson Picton, and Campbell, not to speak of others, have been the sufferers, not the body as a whole. Since the conscious life of a religious community centres in the parts rather than in the whole, the analogy of "growing pains" of the animal organism breaks down.

The Rev. T. T. Lynch was boycotted after a controversy which raged in 1855-6 over his book of poems entitled "The Rivulet: Hymns for Heart and Voice." The hymns were held to contain no Christ and to be pantheistic. Dr. Samuel Davidson, a Professor in the Lancashire Independent College, was compelled to resign his chair in 1870 as the result of an agitation in the denominational press. In 1877 the Congregational Union met at Leicester, and at the same time some of its members called a meeting designed to promote "religious communion in worship and work amongst those who, while retaining their individual beliefs, agree in recognising the existence of spiritual life outside the limits of their own creed." The Union accepted the challenge, and a committee submitted in 1878 a Declaration of Faith, reasserting the original principles of the Union and reaffirming its adhesion to certain Christian doctrines. The Incarnation, the Atoning Sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ, His Resurrection, Ascension, and Mediatorial reign, are among the doctrines regarded as essential conditions of religious communion in Congregational Churches. The leaders of the day seem not to have hesitated to regard these doctrines as determinative. In a letter to Mr. Henry Lee (February 4, 1878) Dr. Dale said: "It is alleged that we have in the Union men who reject the supernatural altogether; if the Union has not vitality enough to throw off men of this kind, the sooner it is dissolved the better." The Rev. Joseph Wood and the late Rev. J. Alanson Picton withdrew from the Union. It is interesting to compare with this language of Dr. Dale, which is not less significant because it is contained in private correspondence, words written in 1878 which I have good authority for attributing to Dr. Forsyth, then a restive member of the left wing. "We profess to believe in free thought. But we have yet to secure the blessing of free thought for the loftiest matters, the matters where it is most absolutely needed. We have yet to have free trade in theology. At present it is a protected industry. Artificial premiums are put upon certain forms of the article, penalties are attached to other than particular conclusions. I say penalties." Or again, "all artificial defences of truth, such as the exclusion from communion of those who deny them, are based on the latent scepticism of those truths. No wonder men suspect our truth if we show such a distrust of it as is involved in the licensing of some, and the prohibition of others of its forms." If Dr. Forsyth was rightly reported by the British Congregationalist, he said in 1907, on the question whether a man should make his own theology, "of course not. Every man should be provided by the Church with a theology that controlled and fascinated him." Utterances such as this, together with an assumption of almost episcopal authority, compel us to believe that whatever has been the movement of opinion in the Congregationalist Churches generally, Dr. Forsyth himself has negated the position he apparently took up in 1878.

This brings us to another of the growing-pains. In the early days of 1907, I think it was, the so-called New Theology movement arose. The name was in some senses at least a misnomer, for one reason because Mr. Campbell's most able and energetic supporter, the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, not to speak of others such as the Revs. G. T. Sadler, Bernard Snell, J. A. Hamilton, and Hugh Wallace, had been preaching essentially the same evangel for years before it suddenly gained world-wide publicity. Some leaders of religious life in non-conformist circles systematically and most shamefully misrepresented both the evangel and its exponents. One prominent Free Churchman, indeed, afterwards publicly apologised to a "brother" whom he realised he had not dealt with in love, but he did not withdraw the misrepresentations to which he had given currency in his important London pulpit. Mr. Campbell was stated to deny the transcendence of God, to belittle Christ, to rob the Christian of the power of prayer, of personal immortality, and of responsibility for sin. These charges were demonstrably false, and they really failed to accomplish their purpose. Indeed, they simply advertised teaching they were intended to depreciate. I have said that Mr. Campbell's teaching was not a novelty, though it had the air of novelty. What was really new in his position was his attitude to the conception of the Church. The Church is for him not a "gathered" community of saints or saved persons, but a society of men and women who are seeking God, who cherish ideals of conduct, of service, and of brotherhood, and who seek to realise the Spirit of Christ and the presence of God in their lives. Mr. Campbell has been reconciled to those whom he had previously offended by his teaching and air of novelty. At Nottingham last year Dr. Forsyth welcomed him back to the Union platform, from which he had been excluded, in terms which suggested that he had authority to judge whether or not the erring brother had expressed himself at last in a sufficiently evangelical manner. The question as to the relation of the Union to preachers who depart radically from the doctrines described in the Declarations of 1833 and 1878 as "commonly believed" among Congregationalists may never again be raised so acutely, but the £250,000 Central or Sustentation Fund, and the regulations as to the training of the ministry in denominational colleges, are certain to raise fresh problems. In these two directions, the effective control of funds from which small churches are aided in the support of their ministers, and denominational control, through County Unions, of the training of the ministry, the Union has departed from its original limited aims. It is no longer a body of ministers and laymen meeting for conference; it is more closely related to a Presbyterian Assembly with (indirect but actual) executive powers. I do not suggest that the splendid Central Fund will be used as a weapon against men who depart from the generally accepted doctrine, but obviously the question of the grounds on which individual churches and ministers may claim membership of the Union will arise.

This leads us to what is the root of the difficulty which faces "liberal" men in Congregational Churches. The particular or local congregation is a law to itself in matters of doctrine as in matters of church management. There can never be any direct control in such matters by the Union. Each congregation is bound only by "such doctrinal restrictions as may be embodied in its own constitution or charter or deed of trust." So far this question of trust deeds has never become really prominent. There are churches within the Union which have trusts allowing considerable latitude in doctrine, but these are relatively few, and, as was pointed out during the New Theology controversy with special reference to the City Temple, the trustees of many Wrappers, 8vo. Price 6d. net, post free 7d.

CREATIVE THOUGHT.

By SIR WILLIAM BARRET, F.R.S.

THE PORCH

contains Reprints from the Writings of famous Mystics; original Articles on Mysticism; Short Studies on the Mystics; Translations from the Works of Oriental Mystics. It is pocket size, well printed in a clear and readable type, on good paper.

Price 3d., post free 4d. each.

- No. 1—THE OVER-SOUL. By RALPH WALDO EMERSON.
No. 2—A THEOSOPHICAL LETTER; or, A Letter of Divine Wisdom, wherein the life of a True Christian is described, showing what a Christian is, and how he cometh to be a Christian, etc. By JACOB BÖHME.
No. 3—ON THE GOOD OR THE ONE. By PLOTINUS.
No. 4—THE MIND TO HERMES, and the Secret Sermon on the Mountain.
No. 5—Extracts from the Life and Letters of JOHN G. GICHTEL.
No. 6—THE SEVEN VALLEYS. FARIDUDDIN ATTAR.
No. 7—A SERMON FOR WHIT-SUNDAY. JOHN TAULER.
No. 8—THE MIRROR OF SIMPLE SOULS. Introduction by EVELYN UNDERHILL.
No. 9—A KEY TO THE UNDERSTANDING OF THE MYSTICS. By the Rev. G. W. ALLEN.
No. 10—FROM THE THEOLOGICA GERMANICA.
No. 11—JALĀLU'DDIN RŪMĪ, PERSIAN SAGE AND SAINT.

Fcap. 8vo. Price 2/- net, post free 2/2.

FLOWERS OF A MYSTIC GARDEN.

SELECTIONS FROM THE WRITINGS OF JOHN RUYSBROECK.

Translated by C. E. S.

Wrappers, 8vo. Price 6d. net, post free 7d.

THE TREND OF PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

By H. A. DALLAS.

In the essay under review, she briefly states some of the evidence upon which these conclusions are based. It is of a most interesting nature, and the writer's arguments are well (if of necessity briefly) put. Knowledge.

Cloth, fcap. 8vo, pp. 302. Price 3/6 net, post free 3/10.

THE WAY TO CHRIST

DESCRIBED IN THE FOLLOWING TREATISES:

- OF TRUE REPENTANCE.
- OF TRUE RESIGNATION.
- OF THE SUPER-SENSUAL LIFE.
- OF REGENERATION.

By JACOB BÖHME.

THE QUEST.

A Quarterly Review.

Edited by G. R. S. MEAD.

Price, 200 pp.: Single Copies, 2/6 net; 2/9 post free. Annual Subscription, 11/- post free.

Vol. IV. OCTOBER, 1912. No. 1.

- A GUESS IN ANTHROPOLOGY. WILLIAM WATSON.
TELEPATHY AND THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE OF NATURE. Sir WILLIAM F. BARRETT, F.R.S.
THE MYSTICISM OF A RATIONALIST. C. DELISLE BURNS, M.A.
PSYCHOLOGY AND TROUBADOURS. EZRA POUND, M.A.
ARCHAIC ROMANTICISM: The Dawn of Nature Philosophy. Prof. KARL JOEL, Ph.D.
THE MEANING OF TAOISM AND THE BOOK OF LIEH TZU. LIONEL GILES, M.A.
CEREMONIAL GAME PLAYING IN MEDIAEVAL CHURCHES. THE EDITOR.
THE TRIPLE BAPTISM OF THE LAST DAYS. ROBERT EISLER, Ph.D.
BUDDHIST AND CHRISTIAN ORIGINS. R. F. JOHNSTON, M.A.
THE CRUX OF SIN. HAROLD WILLIAMS, M.A.

JOHN M. WATKINS,
21, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road,
London, W.C.

churches would be legally justified in declining to permit modern preachers and congregations to continue occupying their church buildings. It will become an important question for many trustees whether they are morally justified in deferring action, especially in the more conspicuous cases of departure from Calvinistic standards. The time cannot be far distant when Congregationalism must pass through a period of readjustment; honest and honourable men cannot indefinitely continue to administer trusts with a complete disregard for their terms. If such readjustment should take place, perhaps the dream that some have cherished may come true, and we may find men of the Independent tradition agreeing with those of Presbyterian or non-subscribing tradition in their non-subscription, and, on the other hand, the modern representatives of the old Presbyterian Dissent ready to lay more stress on their common Christianity than upon doctrinal qualifying epithets. The movement towards closer understanding and sympathy is already in existence; it is illustrated in actual achievement by the foundation of the Doncaster Free Christian Church. This is very recent and has been reported in these columns, so that I need do no more than refer to it in passing. Had this case been carried to a higher court for decision, it is not too much to say that there would have been many similar cases following in its wake, and the existence of wide discrepancies between trust deeds and present-day teaching would have been made clear. The movement received generous support in Dr. Horton's speech at the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Jubilee, which was also reported in THE INQUIRER. Principal Selbie, Dr. Fairbairn's successor at Mansfield College, Oxford, echoes the hope of better relations in his volume on "Nonconformity" in the Home University Library (page 248), though he makes what is to-day an inaccurate generalisation when he says that Unitarians are "intellectualists pure and simple, and with them religion is a thing of the head rather than of the heart." That statement is typical of the misunderstanding which has prevailed, and the misunderstanding is itself due to the absence of co-operation in religious work and life.

I have been digressing, and I must return to what is more precisely my subject. I have not been asked to discuss the relation of Evangelicals to those who have stood apart from the Evangelical tradition; but I could not resist the temptation to plead for a recognition of two closely related facts—first, that Evangelicals must understand the non-subscribing position better before they can ever be expected to extend the right hand of full and complete fellowship to Free Christians, Free Catholics, or whatever name non-subscribers use; secondly, that those who by conviction or tradition reject the older theological formulations of Christianity, especially that embodying the doctrine of the Trinity, should see that there is every year less justification for the perpetuation of the historic cleavage which has exposed them to injustice and left their theological opponents the poorer.

Amongst the Baptists, who were not part of the Old Dissent till 1701, we have little to record. Allowances were made from the outset for differences. In 1770 the New Connection General Baptists separated from the main body, disapproving of latitude in the question of the Trinity. The Old General Baptist body became Unitarian in theology, but after a hundred years it was united in 1879 to the New Connection. Amongst Particular Baptists Calvinism has prevailed, but there have been considerable changes. The "down-grade" controversy in which Mr. Spurgeon took a prominent part was one of the "growing-pains" in this communion.

The Wesleyan Methodists are evangelical to-day as they were in the middle of the eighteenth century, and they are not eminent for their readiness to "prove all things," preferring rather to "hold fast that which is good," that is, the faith once delivered. Their system of preparation for the ministry is one calculated to eliminate restive, inquisitive spirits, for practical tests (which in use become doctrinal tests even when they are not expressly such) are made at frequent intervals, and heresy is dealt with in its incipient stages. Occasionally a tried and proved minister and scholar is put on the defensive, as when Dr. Agar Beet was charged with unsoundness on the question of eternal punishment. Primitive Methodists are very progressive, and the educational equipment of their ministers has been greatly improved under the stimulus of men like Sir William Hartley and Professor A. S. Peake. But even amongst these there was not many years ago a case of heresy. The Hartly Lecture on Immortality was banned, and the lecturer, the Rev. J. Thompson, was forbidden to publish it until certain omissions and modifications had been made. The general improvement in respect of education, of which the Primitive Methodists are particularly typical, must undoubtedly do much in time to make for theological liberty. The growing interest in the study of comparative religion, a study which is as safe in the hands of Professor Hope Moulton, the Wesleyan scholar, as it could be in those of a disinterested layman, is only one among many symptoms of the breaking down of the isolation in which the average Nonconformist minister has studied the origins and history of his own faith.

The Society of Friends can only be most summarily dealt with in the space that remains. The Quakers have consistently rejected all authority save that of the inner light. There is no other religious fellowship of any size so comprehensive in practice, and its members enjoy complete spiritual liberty. There is no "stated" or professional ministry, and the meetings for worship are, as is well known, not conducted by appointed leaders, but left to the spontaneous "openings" of those present. The strong ethical note, evidenced in the lead which Quakers have given in social service of all kinds, is one of the many fruits of that free spirit which Quakers have held in trust for the whole world, and their influence has been in direct proportion, not to their numbers, but to their sincerity and their sanity. Their freedom is the result of their life, and they cherish it not for its own sake, but that they may have more abundant life. The Society of Friends may continue to increase in numbers or it may cease to exist; but in either case its contribution to the religious life of the world is a permanent one, and the Society will continue to live, as it lives to-day, in those outside its membership who have come under its influence.

I will close with a statement which represents the general conclusion of a gathering of young Free Churchmen which a few months ago met to discuss informally the modern situation of the Free Churches. "Our reconstructed theology will set out from the recognition of the fact that the very conditions under which Christian truth is apprehended require that no formal statement of it should be regarded as the last word about it. The system must henceforth always be left open, at least, at one end."

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

An Interview with Professor Sieper, of Munich.

BY THE REV. R. P. FARLEY.

IT chanced that, holiday-making in the literary and artistic metropolis of Southern Germany, I had the great good fortune to find Professor Sieper at home. When one lifted up one's eyes to the hills, one merely became aware that the floods were making a mighty noise—it was in August, and there was no chance of making an outdoor expedition, so we contented ourselves with tea and talk in the Professor's study. Knowing his love of England, and his great desire to improve Anglo-German relations, and feeling that the removal of misunderstanding between the two countries is the most important international question of the day, I naturally wished the conversation to be devoted to a theme that is very near to his heart.

"In so far as there is any friction between England and Germany, what is at the root of it?"

"Such hostile feeling as there is on one side the German Ocean and the other is largely to be traced to the Press of both countries, which exercises an immense influence in forming public opinion—not to the whole press, I am glad to say, but a certain class of papers whose ignorance, whose love of sensation and scandal is, I am afraid, greater than the zeal for truth. Many widely circulated newspapers purvey to their readers information (?) which is grossly inaccurate and misleading, if it is not absolutely false. A notorious instance of the latter is the myth that in every officer's mess on board German ships of war and on festal occasions at the German universities the toast 'to the day' (i.e., of the declaration of war against England) is enthusiastically and unanimously drunk. As regards the officers, Prince Henry, head of the German Navy, bluntly characterised the statement as 'a beastly lie,' and neither I nor anyone else who has ever seen the inside of a German university has ever heard such a toast at any banquet or social gathering."

"Another regrettable circumstance," continued Professor Sieper, "is the fact that some old-established English newspapers, and one outstanding instance of more recent growth seem sedulously to try to create anti-German prejudice where it does not exist, and to foster it where it does. Every ill-balanced outburst of every obscure Pan-German, which in our country is either ignored by responsible people, or is laughed out of court, is magnified in these papers into the settled conviction and permanent policy of the whole German people. What is more astounding is that some of the most violent anti-German diatribes, which appear in the London Press (by far the worst offender in this respect) are penned by people whose parents' names were Goldschmid, Eltzbacher, Binswanger, Schlesinger (metamorphosed to Ellis Barker, Byng, Sinclair), who have become naturalised in England, and are 'päpstlicher als der Papst,' more Jingoistic than the Jingoists. To us the standing wonder is that sensible English people do not see through all this."

"In fact," I suggested, "it would be as true to say of Germany that the Anti-British tendency of a portion of the Press as little represents general and responsible feeling as the Anti-German hysterics of some British papers represent sober British opinion." "Of this there can be no doubt whatever," was the reply.

This point led by a very easy transition to another—the question how far the official foreign policy of both Germany and England has any support from the best elements of the two nations or from the mass of the people. A curious anomaly has arisen, I remarked, that in England, which in some directions has in recent times become more democratic, foreign policy is less under the control of Parliament than it was, with the result that important questions of foreign policy are not discussed by the representative House until something has been settled, and then it is too late. May it not be said that in recent times the most successful diplomatists have been men who have had no diplomatic training, like Mr. Bryce and Baron Marschall von Bieberstein?

"With regard to Sir Edward Grey, whom no doubt you have in mind," Professor Sieper replied, "I myself in common with many of my fellow countrymen have not only great esteem for him, but great belief in his own personal desire to maintain peace. Nevertheless, I am bound to say that some doubt is expressed whether in a critical situation he would be strong enough to set at naught the devious methods of the permanent officials and the diplomatic services. As regards the relations between England and Germany, a curious example of the ways in which diplomatists sometimes advance (?) the interests of their country is to be found in the following incident. Some years ago, when representatives of English municipalities were on a friendly tour of inspection amongst the great German towns, they visited amongst other places, Munich. When they arrived, I stood on the platform beside the English Minister Resident to receive his fellow-countrymen. He said to me 'I don't know these people, and I don't want to know them!' This is only one of many instances, unfortunately, not

BAD HANDWRITING.

THE PERFECTION OF THE NEW HOME ALUMINIUM BLICK TYPEWRITER.

ONE TO BE LENT FREE FOR A WEEK TO EVERY BRITISH HOUSEHOLD.

The following article appeared in The Daily Mail, September 23:—

A prominent London business man, recently interviewed by the Press on the subject of handwriting, expressed the belief that neat writing is neither taught nor encouraged in our secondary schools; but he was of opinion that the deficiency does not much matter so long as the boys can write their own names.

"The time is already close at hand," he said, "when no business letters, very few other letters, and no documents of any length will be written by hand. . . .

"In every walk of life the need for writing is diminishing. . . . Formal business is always typewritten. The Post Office telegram, in which formerly the handwriting of the clerk who received the message over the wire was of great importance, is being sent in the form of two or three strips of automatically printed tape gummed on the telegraph form. The busy man who travels about carries his own light typewriter."

This gentleman evidently referred to the new Aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter, which is carried by many in its leather case.

And why, pray tell us, in this age of progress, this age of busy hustle and social and commercial activity, should we, like our grand-parents, waste valuable time in trying to write a copper-plate letter?

No, those days have passed, and we are entering, or, indeed, have entered, a new era—a new age, when we wisely go with the times, employing the productions of genius—the mechanical labour-saving devices of our Edisons, Marconis, and Parsons (of turbine fame), our Blickensderfers, and men of like celebrity.

THE NEW ALUMINIUM 'BLICK.'

You ask, What is this new Aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter. The answer is, A wonderful little typewriter, that has supplanted the pen and ink in the home, on the train, the boat, or wherever you may be. A bright, strong, and compact little machine weighing 5 lbs., all packed in a handy little leather case, with compartments for your stationery, stamps, &c.

You can write with it in any language required, and in any character of letter, in script type for social correspondence, or in type very similar to what you are now reading. You can have large or small sized type, the former, of course, preferable for the use of Ministers, Orators, and others who speak from notes, but you can use them all on the same machine, changing from one to the other at will and in an instant.

PORTABILITY OF THE 'BLICK.'

But the portability of the machine is one of its chief merits. It has no ribbon to tear or tangle and soil your fingers, and it is always ready for use.

The journalist, the author, the naval and military man, the doctor, the commercial traveller—in fact, in every walk of life the 'Blick' Typewriter is now employed.

You can take it in its leather case from place to place as easily as you would a book. It is aptly described by a certain lady of title as her ever-ready and ever-handy secretary.

By writing or applying personally to the 'Blick' Company, Ltd., 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or the West-end office, 369, Oxford-street, you will be sent a 'Blick' Typewriter for a free week's trial. When writing ask for Booklet (No. 92), which tells all about the machine.

THE 'BLICK' TYPEWRITER FOR SOCIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

The typewritten letter for social use has grown to be as important as for commercial and professional use, and the time is not far off when every well-regulated household will possess a 'Blick' Typewriter, either the home model or the more up-to-date Aluminium 'Blick,' just as they now possess a sewing machine. With the new Aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter two, three, four—yes, five, and even more—copies can be taken in the one operation and filed away for future reference, which is too tedious an operation with the pen.

To the traveller who is now here, now there, on important professional or commercial business, the new and portable Aluminium 'Blick' is indispensable. The speed or the lurching of the train makes no difference, you simply keep typing away, and at the finish you have a clean, clear, business-like letter that every recipient appreciates.

A 'BLICK' FOR A WEEK'S FREE TRIAL.

So sure are the makers of the new Home Secretary—the Aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter—that if you see it you will like it, that by special arrangement readers can have one sent to their homes in its handsome leather case, and then you have it to use to your heart's content for a whole week free of cost. The mastery of the 'Blick' can be accomplished in an hour; a child can learn to use it. Only a very little practice, and you will be able to write with the speed of an expert, and the 'Blick' Company guarantee to teach any purchaser how to use any of their models.

NOW READY FOR OCTOBER.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

Infant Class Teaching. Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
A Good Guide (Poem). Elizabeth Wilson.
A Vote of Confidence. George J. Allen.
Heroes of Faith—Dr. Channing. Albert Thornhill, M.A.
The Teaching of Jesus.—I. G. C. Sharpe.
William Carey, Missionary. W. H. Carpenter.
A. M. D. G. W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.
English Unitarian Churches (Poem). Robert Pearce, [M.P.]
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—III. A. Stephen Noel.
A New Story of Burnley United. William J. Pigott.
Notes for Teachers.—XXXI.—XLVIII.
Arthur Brooke.
Five Lessons for Infants—
Dorothy Tarrant, M.A.
The Making of a North Country School. J. Lonsdale Cox.
Children's Services. George Jessel, M.A., M.B.
Friends and Foes—A Morality (A Play for Children).
H. W. Hawkes.
By the Way.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

without parallel on the part of German diplomatists which show that it is high time that the nations should take the management of international affairs out of the hands of professional diplomatists."

As the tortuous stupidity of the chancelleries of the nations did not appear a very profitable theme, we proceeded to discuss the real feeling of the two peoples towards each other. "So far as the British Islands are concerned," I said, "there can be no doubt that the vast majority of the nation have no wish for anything but friendship with Germany. The foremost names in literature, science, art, education, medicine, many captains of industry, even party politicians in their sane moments, and practically the whole of the organised working classes desire peace and concord, and mutual helpfulness between the two nations. How does the real German feeling towards us compare with this?"

"The feeling most predominant in the minds of thoughtful people among us is the immense debts we already owe to Great Britain and the vast amount we still have to learn from her. Great Britain gave us Shakespeare" (here the Professor's audience repeated a remark made by a bookseller in one of the most modern German towns that "Shakespeare had become the German national poet," and expressed his own shame that Shakespeare is more read, oftener played, better understood and more revered in Germany than in the land of his birth); "Great Britain gave us Shakespeare, the supreme dramatic poet; Bacon, the founder of modern science; Ossian, who inspired Goethe and Herder; Burns and Shelley, who have been a consolation and a strength to the seeking, striving spirits of our Fatherland; Carlyle, the preacher of sincerity. Ruskin and Morris, the apostles of the beautiful, now exercise an immense influence in Germany. In England first began the feeling of responsibility on the part of the possessing classes towards the disinherited and the defenceless. It was an Englishwoman who wrote the 'Vindication of the Rights of Woman' more than 100 years ago. In England more than any other country political freedom has been developed. England sets other nations an example by its passion for 'fair play,' its love of justice, its self-control, the purity of its domestic life. Even in education, in which in some respects Germany is far in advance of England. We are more and more beginning to see that English schools and universities turn out complete men, well-rounded, self-sufficing characters, who know how to carry themselves in face of great tasks either at home or in the colonies." Similarly you have learnt much from us and will learn still more."

"As to the future it appears to me that the two countries are entering on a new phase of development. Germany has become great by her methodical scientific spirit, her centralisation and her state organisation, England by her practical capacity, her individuality, and her private initiative. Germany has an aptitude for speculation, England for affairs."

"In fact," said the interviewer, "Germany has die reine Vernunft, England die praktische Vernunft, and we need, so to say, another Kant to give us another Kritik of both."

"The development of both countries," continued Professor Sieper, "has had something onesided about it, and this onesidedness is beginning to be felt by both. England needs to learn how to organise from the centre, Germany to allow more personal freedom and private initiative. England should devote more attention to technical education; Germany must become less abstract. In social reform England ought now to perceive that private effort cannot by itself solve the social problem. Germany has to recognise that mere state legislation without personal service and discriminating sympathy is insufficient. England and Germany, therefore, will only reach their complete development and fulfil their world mission by understanding, helping, and learning from each other."

"What practical means do you suggest of attaining this desirable end?"

"Much has already been done and more will be done to bring members of the two nations into direct contact with each other, and, therefore, to a better mutual understanding. Interchanges of visits, which have had the happiest effects, have taken place between the representatives of British and German municipalities. British members of Parliament have been our welcome guests; visits of clergymen and journalists have been exchanged. I think that such visits should be regularly organised, and that not merely public officials, but the students and men of business of each nation should be invited to make themselves personally acquainted with the other."

"You have not mentioned," I said, "the largest class of all, the working class. In Great Britain, so far as the working classes are organised and articulate, they are on the side of peace. This observation would apply with greater force to Germany, where 4,500,000 Social Democrat voters, besides many in other parties, are staunchly in favour of friendship with England."

Professor Sieper assented and continued: "In connection with the Anglo-German Friendship Committee, to which I am devoting every moment of time that can be spared from my professional work, I am anxious to see a permanent bureau established, the object of which would be to provide accurate information about each nation for any applicant from the other. This would leave journalists and publicists no excuse for the grotesque statements which they frequently make, and which it is difficult to think that they themselves seriously believe. There should also be, as there already is between the United States and Germany, an exchange of University professors, who would explain their own country to students of the other. I wish also to arrange, if possible, that German students shall make visits of six months or longer to England to study English institutions and English character, and to reside as paying guests in English families, as hotel or boarding-house life does not afford the same opportunity for getting to understand the natives of a foreign country and still less for forming, as is desirable, permanent friendships. The teachers of the primary schools in each country, who have so much to do with fashioning the minds of the future generation, must be encouraged to know each other, possibly by interchanges of visits, and, above all, the school text-books of each country must be purged of chauvinism."

I parted with Professor Sieper in amazement at his extraordinary acquaintance with English life, his shrewd judgment of English character, and in admiration for his powerful advocacy of a better feeling between his own country and one which he knows so well. My only regret was that the whole of the British public could not be made aware of a state of feeling which is much more representative of the real attitude of the German nation towards us than scores of ill-balanced statements which find their way into the British press.

In England, many of us have already heard of the series of books, projected by Professor Sieper and issued under his general editorship, with a view to expounding English life and character to German readers. The books are all by experts, are published at very moderate prices, and deal with such subjects as "The main tendencies in modern English Literature," "Wm. Morris and the Revival of English Craftsmanship," "The Social Question in England," "English Art," "English Architecture," "The Modern English Theatre," "England as a Colonising Power," "The Character and Domestic Life of the English." Some of these give better descriptions and criticism of our English life and institutions than anything that has appeared in English, and cannot but have an immense effect for good in Germany.

AMONG the recent books published at Essex Hall by the Sunday School Association are "Stories for the Little Ones," selected and retold by Grace Spears and Dorothy Tarrant, a delightful collection of tales treated very brightly and simply, and "Favourite Stories," selected from Young Days, and edited by E. Pritchard and J. J. Wright, who assure us that they are "all interesting." We cordially commend these books to Sunday-school teachers and parents. The little volume of "Moral and Religious Lessons for Infants," by M. C. Martineau and Caroline A. Martineau, some of which originally appeared in our columns, will also be welcomed, together with "The Story of Isaac Hopper," the Quaker abolitionist and friend of Lloyd Garrison, briefly told by the late Henry Rawlings. For older and more thoughtful readers, especially teachers who are preparing lessons for adult classes, Dr. Mellone's "Belief in God," a suggestive study of a great subject in the form of a pamphlet of 31 pages, will be found extremely useful. It should form an admirable starting-point for many helpful discussions and more advanced studies. The Sunday School Association has also issued a Report of the Eighth Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers, which was held at Manchester College this summer.

THE MORAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

THE Moral Education League announces a series of meetings in connection with the Moral Instruction Circle, which will be held on Mondays, October 28, November 25, and December 9 at 5.30 p.m., at Prince Henry's Rooms, 17, Fleet-street, E.C., opposite the Law Courts. Mr. A. J. Waldegrave will give a Demonstration Civics Lesson at the first Circle on October 28. All who are interested, especially teachers, are invited to attend and take part in the discussions after the lessons. The Moral Education League Quarterly gives some account of the Moral Instruction Circle, which did such admirable pioneer work years ago, and is about to be revived. The main object of the experiment is to discover further efficient teachers for demonstration, and it is hoped that it may, in a measure, help to prepare the way for the School of Ethics and Moral Education, the need of which Professor Millicent Mackenzie emphasises in a leading article in another part of the paper.

PROFESSOR EUCKEN AT HARVARD.

A VERY warm welcome has been accorded to Professor Eucken in America, especially by the adherents of the liberal religious movement, and great interest was aroused by the lecture which he gave on September 27 in Emerson Hall, Harvard University. This lecture was the first of a course on "Leading Ideas of the Present Time," which Professor Eucken is giving in addition to two courses dealing with the history of German philosophy and the philosophy of religion. "More than any other great teacher of to-day outside the churches," says Dr. Wendte in the Christian Register, "Professor Eucken maintains and promotes the spiritual life, emphasises the ethical element of man's nature, and vindicates the essential and eternal qualities of true Christian faith. His visit among us ought to result in a quickening of the ideal interests of American society and advance the fraternity of large-minded and progressive Christians beyond and above all the limitations of creed or sect. The only barrier to the full appreciation of Professor Eucken's teachings is that of language, his addresses being delivered in German." His large and attentive audience seems to have followed him with enjoyment notwithstanding, and "the speaker sought to do his part towards a mutual understanding by a notably alert, distinct, and deliberate delivery."

AMONG the greetings which have come to us on the completion of our 70 years we have received a particularly cordial one from Professor Boros, Dean of the Theological Faculty of Kolosvar, in the name of the Unitarian Church of Transylvania. We reciprocate it most heartily. The international mission of THE INQUIRER is one of peculiar interest to us, and we treasure very gratefully the assurances that reach us from various parts of the world that it is a welcome guest among isolated groups of liberal thinkers in many lands.

THE fact that last Wednesday, October 16, was the centenary of the death of Henry Martyn, gives special interest to the volume on Missions, which Mrs. Creighton has contributed to the Home University Library. The story which she has to tell is one of absorbing interest, and it contains no more heroic figure than that of the young Senior Wrangler, who abandoned a brilliant University career for the mission field. "He studied Sanscrit, Persian, and Arabic to prepare himself for his work, and when he reached India his linguistic faculty enabled him quickly to learn Hindustani. He died at the age of 31, after only five years' work in the East, but his burning zeal produced an immense impression on all who knew him, and made his example powerfully effective after his death, when his letters and diaries were published." (London: Williams & Norgate, 1s. net.)

THE Sunday School Quarterly for October, published by the Sunday School Association, is as bright and varied in contents as usual. The first place is given to a paper by Miss Dorothy Tarrant on Infant Class Teaching, which was read at the recent Summer School at Manchester College, Oxford. Biography is well represented in sketches of Dr. Channing and William Carey, the Missionary, and there is a good selection of Lesson Notes for teachers. The editor, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, is to be congratulated upon the continued success of his efforts to improve Sunday-school teaching both in matter and method.

RIDERS' LATEST PUBLICATIONS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo. Cloth. Gilt Tops, 2/- net.

The Transparent Jewel

By MABEL COLLINS,

Author of "Light on the Path," "When the Sun Moves Northward," &c., &c.

Being an essay upon the Yoga philosophy of Patanjali, to which is added a translation of the Aphorisms of the sage.

Patanjali taught the power of the mind and will and instructed his disciples that inasmuch as matter is entirely controlled by spirit, man can become "yoked" with the Supreme Spirit by arousing his own spiritual nature, and may thus obtain perfect happiness. The Aphorisms are extremely difficult to render into English. The author has adopted the translations of two of the best known commentators for this purpose. The Bhagavad Gita, that great Sacred Book of the East, is founded upon this teaching. Patanjali's philosophy contains the kernel of the true Practical Occultism which is now so much in demand, and the volume by Mabel Collins gives a survey of the system which, it is anticipated, will help the student to a clear understanding of its basic principles.

NOW READY.

HYPNOTISM AND SUGGESTION.

A Practical Handbook.

By EDWIN ASH, M.D., B.S. LOND., M.R.C.S.

Crown 8vo., 137 pp. and Index. Cloth. 1/- net.

NOW READY.

WHAT IS HEALTH?

By GRACE DAWSON,

Author of "How to Rest and be Rested."

Small Crown 8vo., 72 pp., 1/- net.

The Great Initiates.

Complete Edition of EDOUARD SCHURÉ'S "Les Grands Initiés," with an Introduction to Esoteric Teaching, and a Frontispiece Portrait of the Author. Translated by FRED ROTHWELL, B.A.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2 vols., about 400 pp. each, 7/6 net the two volumes.

N.B.—Volumes not sold singly.

"The fact that this work has reached its twenty-fourth French Edition may well stir the interest of English students of the esoteric aspects of religion."—Literary World.

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Open Secret.

Intuitions of Life and Reality.

BY

CHARLES J. WHITEBY, M.D.

Author of "Triumphant Vulgarity," "The Wisdom of Plotinus," "Makers of Men," etc.

Crown 8vo, 136 pp., Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS: The Role of the Thinker. The Unknowable. The External World. The Ethics of Theory. The Problem of Space. The Extent of the Astral System. The Problem of Time. The Problem of Force. The Problem of Evil. Is Nature a Machine? The One and the Many. Solidarity. The Ideal and the Actual.

An exposition of the various problems of life, showing that the ideal and the actual are complementary factors of the One Reality—a reality not final or static, but progressive and self-transcendent.

Health for Young and Old.

ITS PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

AN UNCONVENTIONAL MANUAL.

By A. T. SCHOFIELD, M.D., M.R.C.S.

Author of "Nervousness," "How to Keep Fit."

Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 272 pp. 3/6 net.

"Dr. Schofield has dealt learnedly and exhaustively with his subject, and his manual should be welcomed by every household."—The Academy.

CREATIVE THOUGHT.

By W. J. COLVILLE.

Being Essays in the Art of Self-Unfolding.

Crown 8vo, 304 pp., cloth gilt, gilt tops, 3/6 net.

SELECTION FROM CONTENTS.

Personal Experiences of Mental Healing—Our Bodies, what are they? How shall we govern them?—True Views of Occultism—Concentration of Thought and Control of Memory—The Power of the Spoken Word—What is the Human Aura?—Sleep, Dreams, and Visions—Genius: What and Whence? Idealism and Realism—Human Unity through many Nations—Destiny—Heredity.

"His lucid style, depth of penetration, and obvious sincerity of conviction make his work invaluable to all who find it worth their while to think on these and kindred subjects."—T.P.'s Weekly.

MARJORIE BOWEN'S NEW NOVEL.

THE RAKE'S PROGRESS

By the Author of "The Viper of Milan," "I Will Maintain," &c., &c. 2/- net.

"A brilliant romance, well worthy of its gifted author."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"THE RAKE'S PROGRESS" is a feast of colour, of grace, and scenery."—Westminster Gazette.

"THE RAKE'S PROGRESS" is an entertaining story with some very exciting chapters and a vividness of description which is always a notable characteristic of all Miss Bowen's works."—The Tatler.

Write for Complete Catalogue to

WILLIAM RIDER & SON, LTD., 8, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

LINDSEY PRESS PUBLICATIONS

Cr. 8vo. 168 pages. Cloth, 2/- net.

HOW TO WIN

ADDRESSES BY

H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P.

CONTENTS:—(1) How to Win. (2) The Freedom of Faith. (3) The Omnipotence of Faith. (4) The Divine Revelation in Humanity. (5) Moral Backbone. (6) Jealousy. (7) Courage. (8) God is Light. (9) Worship. (10) The Parable of the Talents. (11) Workers with God. (12) An Ideal City and How to Get it. (13) Labour Problems and the Influence of Religion. (14) The Temperance Movement and the Pulpit.

Cr. 8vo. 226 pages. 3/6 net.

SECOND EDITION.

Pillars of the Temple

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE, D.D.

Introduction by

ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

CONTENTS:—(1) The God we Worship. (2) The Christ we Love. (3) The Heaven we Hope for. (4) The Hell we Fear. (5) The Bible we Accept. (6) The Divine Inspiration. (7) The Salvation we Believe in. (8) The Church we Belong to.

In this volume Dr. Savage deals with the cardinal points of religious belief from the Unitarian point of view.

Cr. 8vo. 65 pages. Cloth, 1/6 net.
Paper covers, 1/- net.

Towards Religion.

BY
